ABC World News (9/15, story 3, 2:10, Snow) reported, "To Cuba where Fidel Castro's Government took over the leadership of the so-called nonaligned Nations the organization, taking regularly takes anti-American stances and today was no exception." ABC (Avila) added, "America's short list of antagonists -- Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, Iran's Mamoud Ahmadinajad, and Bolivia's Evo Morales -- all bashing the United States for opposing Iran's nuclear program, all together in Cuba, capital of anti-Americanism. … Cuba's venom was delivered by Castro's young brother, 75-year- old Raul."

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "At the top of tonight's news briefing, a who's who of President Bush's adversaries on the world stage all together in one place. Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad are among the leaders in Havana for the non-aligned nations. Raul Castro is playing host. His older brother is still recovering from intestinal surgery."

The New York Times (9/16, Lacey, 1.21M) reports, "Raúl Castro, who is standing in as Cuba's leader while his brother, Fidel, recuperates from surgery, railed at the United States during a summit meeting in Havana of nonaligned nations on Friday." This "first public speech since taking power in July was just as stridently anti-Washington as those offered by his elder brother." Meanwhile, "In Miami…the Bush administration's top Cuban-American official, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, delivered his own rebuke to Cuba's government" as he "called on Cuba to hold a referendum on its future leadership, a proposal that the Communist government would surely dismiss." The AP (9/16, Gresko) also noted Gutierrez's proposal.

The Financial Times (9/16, Frank) adds, "Cuba…and its close ally Venezuela sought to steer the group towards more a more radical anti-US line," but "Many observers…believe it will be impossible to link the movement, formed in 1961 by developing countries anxious to define themselves as independent equally of the Soviet Union and of the US, to such a radical geopolitical agenda." Still, "Delegations from the Non-Aligned Movement on Friday began negotiations over a final document sharply critical of Israel and supportive of Iran's nuclear ambitions." The AFP (9/16, Moser) writes that "Raul Castro, and Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez, also delivered blistering condemnations of the United States." The Washington Times/AP (9/16, Arrington) adds, "Raul unleashed a stream of anti-American rhetoric in his inaugural speech, saying the world today is shaped by the United States' 'irrational pretensions for world dominance.'" The AP (9/16, Snow) also covers this story.

Indian PM Urges "Conciliatory Tone" For NAM. The AFP (9/16, Langan) reports, "Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has urged Non-Aligned Movement leaders to take a conciliatory tone as they work to counter terrorism, and try to keep the Mideast peace process on track." He also "argued that 'as a group we have rejected extremes. We must spread the word of Gandhiji, the apostle of peace.'"

Cubans Find Fleeing Cuba More Difficult. NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 6, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We are back now from Cuba with 'NBC Nightly News' 'In Depth.' the Cubans who are willing to risk their lives to leave here and start a new life north of here in the United States. It is just 90 miles from here to Florida and under America's immigration policy a Cuban who makes it to American soil can stay in America. In recent years the business of smuggling Cubans has gotten more expensive and more dangerous as we see tonight from Mark Potter." NBC (Potter) added, "No longer are they just getting on rafts and homemade boats, now organized crime rings used high powered speedboats to sneak into Cuba and bring them to the US they are usually paid by Cuban exile families. The price is up to $10,000 meaning one small boat like this with 25 migrants aboard can bring the smuggler's up to a quarter million dollars. They often cut on safety to maximize profits. … Federal prosecutors are charging some with manslaughter, the same tactic used in mafia and drug cases."

IMF, World Bank Meetings Tense. The New York Times (9/16, Weisman, 1.21M) reports, "The world's finance ministers gathered Friday for their first annual meeting in East Asia since the region was gripped by an economic crisis in the 1990's, with their most urgent order of business being to overhaul the institutions that safeguard the global economy and help the poor" at "what appeared likely to be one of the most contentious" annual meetings of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. There was "tension between Western leaders and the government of Singapore, their host, over Singapore's last-minute denial of visas to some of the leaders of the 'civil society' groups that were invited to participate in the meetings." While "the government relented at the last minute" on most of the visa, "Paul D. Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, was especially embarrassed by the visa problem because he has repeatedly called on developing countries to open their political processes to dissent." While he "and others sounded a note of optimism about the world economy by saluting the records of Singapore and other Asian countries in recent decades," Wolfowitz "stirred a furor inside the World Bank with proposals to crack down on corruption in bank lending." Still, "the main issue of contention is a proposal backed by the Bush administration to change the governance of the International Monetary Fund to give more votes to China and three other developing countries, and to give dozens of other countries more votes in a restructuring over the next two years." Bush "administration officials say plainly they cannot afford to have another debacle involving another global economic institution" following "the failure of the recent round of global trade talks."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Phillips, 2.03M) adds," At a series of meetings here this weekend, top financial officials from the Group of Seven major industrial nations are expected to press for new IMF rules that would make it easier for the global economic watchdog to brand a country for manipulating its exchange rate -- and, in theory, embarrass it into stopping."

US, Europe React To China's Economic Power With WTO Case, Possible Free Trade Zone. The Financial Times (9/16, Beniot) reports, "Spurred by concern about China's growing economic might, Germany is considering a plan for a free-trade zone between Europe and the US. A senior aide to Angela Merkel said the chancellor was 'interested' in promoting the idea as long as such a zone did not create 'a fortress' but rather 'a tool' to encourage free trade globally." This "testifies to the rapprochement between Washington and Berlin since Ms Merkel's election last November." Also, "As German perceptions of China have grown more American, Washington's approach has shifted too. Speaking before his first trip to Beijing, Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, this week outlined a more balanced policy mixing traditional US criticism with praise for China's reforms." Still, "the US, Canada and the European Union complained to the World Trade Organisation about China's tariffs on car parts, raising the prospect of Beijing facing its first WTO dispute. The three said they had lost patience with Beijing's refusal to further open the $19bn-a-year market."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, A2, Miller, Hitt, 2.03M) adds, "Teaming up with Europe and Canada, the Bush administration moved to turn up pressure on Beijing to end tariffs that critics say put foreign-made auto parts at a competitive disadvantage in China's domestic market." This "raised stakes significantly in the long-simmering dispute over auto parts" and "reflects a tougher U.S. trade stance toward China, and comes a few days before Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson arrives in China." U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said, "While we are open to settling this dispute, China's current stance leaves us no choice but to proceed with our WTO case." McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Hall) also covers the auto parts complaint.

China To Announce Nuclear Plant Construction Company. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Oster, 2.03M) reports, "China will announce by year end which company has won a contract potentially worth $8 billion to build four nuclear-power plants," according to Assistant Secretary of Energy Karen Harbert. Still, "Industry observers had expected a decision on the contract as early as December 2005. But Chinese officials have said they needed more assurances about what they describe as untried technologies."

Technology Helping Free Discourse In China. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Magnier, 918K) reports, "The growing appreciation among young Chinese for unfettered news — and their ability to convey their opinions rapidly across cyberspace — is a key reason why Beijing will ultimately lose the information war, analysts say, even if it wins some near-term battles." However, "analysts say the change appears to be as much a New China News Agency profit grab as a state bid to control information." Meanwhile, "the European Union and the State Department weighed in against Beijing's new plan, which gives the state-run New China News Agency censorship authority and exclusive distribution rights over foreign wire service competitors."

India's Richest Man Calls For US To Open Markets. The New York Times (9/16, Rai, 1.21M) publishes an interview with Azim H. Premji, chairman of Wipro, India's third-largest outsourcing firm, and India's richest man. He says, "The debate in the United States" over outsourcing "is significantly more balanced. But what is not getting adequate focus is that globalization is a two-way street. If the United States wants access to Chinese, Indian or Vietnamese markets, we must get access to theirs. U.S. protectionism is very subtle but it is very much there."

WHO Endorses DDT To Fight Mosquitoes Carrying Malaria. The New York Times (9/16, Dugger, 1.21M) reports, "The World Health Organization on Friday forcefully endorsed wider use of the insecticide DDT across Africa to exterminate and repel the mosquitoes that cause malaria. The disease kills more than a million people a year, 800,000 of them young children in Africa. Dr. Arata Kochi, who leads the group's global malaria program, unequivocally declared at a news conference on Friday that DDT was the most effective insecticide against malaria and that it posed no health risk when sprayed in small amounts on the inner walls of people's homes. Expanding its use is essential to reviving the flagging international campaign to control the disease, he said." The Washington Times (9/16, Carter, 88K) writes that Who "reversed 30 years of policy" with the decision.

Annan To Release Details On Personal Finances. The New York Times (9/16, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "Secretary General Kofi Annan reversed course on Friday and said he would file a new financial disclosure form. Although completing the form is not mandatory in his case, his top aides considered it advisable to avoid misunderstanding." His "earlier decision not to supply the form emerged Wednesday in a news conference and exposed him to criticism that he was not living up to the standards of openness that he was demanding of others in the organization."

Koizumi Said Be One Of "Most Influential Leaders" For Post War Japan. The McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Johnson) reports that Japan's Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is being cast by "commentators…as one of the most influential leaders in Japan's postwar history." He "changed Japan in ways that could be long lasting, but Shinzo Abe, the likely new prime minister, will face pressures to ease off some of the reforms." Also, "Japan's newly steady economic course may slow momentum on reform, and some experts say the Koizumi era could be an intermission in politics-as-usual." Still, "Koizumi's departure will be felt in Washington. The Japanese leader bucked his nation's decades-old pacifist tradition and stretched long-unused military muscle by deploying troops to Iraq in 2004," and "shared an unusually strong bond with President Bush."

Holocaust Doubting Party Showing Gains In Germany. The Washington Times (9/16, Crossland, 88K) reports that in Germany, the National Democratic Party (NPD) "a far-right party that shares Iranian President Mahmud Ahmadinejad's doubts about the Holocaust and wants to deport foreigners," as well as opposing immigration, "is expected to make strong gains in elections in an eastern German state tomorrow." Its supporters have "little awareness or guilt about the Holocaust…because Germany's Nazi past wasn't addressed under the communist regime in the east." Other parties charge "that NPD backers intimidate opponents and disrupt campaign events."

Sweden Expected To See Close Elections. The New York Times (9/16, Lyall, 1.21M) reports, "Sweden holds its most closely contested national election in years" on Sunday. "The Social Democratic Party, with its policies of high taxes, big government and generous benefits, has run the country, alone or in coalitions with other parties, for 65 of the past 74 years," but the opposition's Fredrik Reinfeldt "has found the government's Achilles' heel in the issue of unemployment, arguing with some success that the government's rosy figures hide a much darker reality." His proposed response is "to cut unemployment benefits, decrease payroll taxes for low-income workers and provide tax breaks to businesses that hire the chronically unemployed." However, the "Social Democrats are portraying him, essentially, as a traditional conservative hiding behind a falsely mild facade."

UN Officials Support Migration Forum Despite US Opposition. The AP (9/16, Gamel) reports, "Top officials from dozens of countries supported a U.N. initiative to create a new global forum on migration on Friday," as "U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan…proposed a Global Forum on Migration and Development as an informal, non-binding way for countries to debate the issue and come up with solutions." However, "U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey said the United States is committed to confronting the challenges of migration but prefers to do so via existing forums and agreements with neighboring countries," adding that the U.S. believes, "that creation of additional structures will hinder, not help, international cooperation on these issues."

Latvian President Now Running For UN Secretary-General. The AP (9/16, Lederer) reports, "Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga joined the race to become the next U.N. secretary-general on Friday, becoming the first woman vying for the U.N.'s top post," but she "faces an uphill struggle because most members states generally agree that the next secretary-general should come from Asia, part of a tradition to rotate the job between regions." Notably,

"China — a veto-wielding council member — has repeatedly said it wants an Asian candidate." Still, "U.S. Ambassador John Bolton…argued that the job should go to the best qualified candidate regardless of nationality."

Clinton Global Initiative To Verify Pledges. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, McGinley, 2.03M) reports, "On Wednesday, more than 1,000 people will gather in New York at the second annual Clinton Global Initiative, a project led by former President Clinton, to tackle problems involving global health, poverty, religious strife and threats to the environment." Most attendees "must pledge to fund and carry out an initiative to help address one of the problems." However, "a few participants at last year's fest 'pledged' to carry out programs that already were under way," and "not all participants followed through on their commitments." Therefore, this year "CGI's 10-person 'commitments team' has been working with participants to develop pledges for this year's conference," and "those who don't follow through on their pledges won't be invited back."

Cohen Says Britain's Brown Faces Dilemma On Iraq War Position. Roger Cohen writes in his column in the New York Times (9/16, 1.21M), "Britain's 'stable and orderly transition,' the Labour Party's favored phrase, has turned into the 'Tony and Gordon Show,' a TV soap opera mixing farce and venom and featuring two middle-aged men who've used a decade of intimacy at the pinnacle of power to rehearse the finer points of mutual loathing." Now that PM Tony Blair announced he will resign within a year, Brown faces a "central conundrum." He might "outmaneuver his Labour Party rivals and get Blair's job," and even "tone down his impatience, suffer fools more easily, and inject a touch of humanity into his zombie-Presbyterian image." However, "what does he do about marking his distance from Bush and Iraq, moves that seem critical to his chances in the next election?" while "if he doesn't turn Britain into a more critical ally, and doesn't demonstrate that he's not in the pocket of the most unpopular politician here (Bush), he's in deep trouble," but should he be "too critical of the United States, he will be branded a left-winger" and "appear to move closer to the European Union, a direction he dislikes." Although "the answer would appear to be constructive criticism of Bush," Conservative leader David Cameron "has already staked out that position."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Calls For Congress To Pass Bill Clarifying Detainee Rights. President Bush challenged Congress to pass a bill spelling out the rules for interrogating terrorist suspects in an energetic press conference. Media coverage focused almost exclusively on Bush's remarks about terrorist interrogation and characterized the GOP debate over policy as a serious split on a key 2006 election issue. Bush's remarks received significant attention by prominent media outlets as it was covered in full segments by all three network TV news programs early in their broadcasts and by the major US newspapers. ABC World News (9/15, story 2, 0:50, Snow) reported, "There were fireworks at the White House today where President Bush reacted to a rebellion on Capitol Hill, a group of Republican Senators opposing his attempts to clarify part the Geneva Conventions which spell out the rights of terror suspects. President Bush said the current relations written more than 50 years ago are too vague and could effectively end an effective interrogation program."

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 4, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported Bush "stepped up the pressure big time, warning that time is running out. From the White House, here's Jim Axelrod." CBS (Axelrod) added that "an adamant Mr. Bush said the dispute threatens to shut down a CIA interrogation program he says has stopped terror plots in the planning." President Bush: "So Congress has got a decision to make. You want the program to go forward or not?" Axelrod: "But a chorus of critics has emerged, led by Republican senator John McCain" and former Secretary of State Colin Powell and if Bush "was trying to get everybody back in line today, he didn't. Late this afternoon, Senator McCain said there is nothing in his bill that would require the CIA interrogation program to be shut down. So, Katie, President Bush is now locked in a dispute about how to handle prisoners of war with America's best known prisoner of war, and a Republican at that."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "there is a battle going on in the United States within the Republican party over the treatment of terrorism suspects. In an often contentious news conference President Bush laid down the law as he sees it." NBC (Gregory) added, "Mr. Bush shot back at his former Secretary of State Powell who criticized the White House in a letter writing the world is begin to doubt the morale basis of our fight against terrorism." President Bush: "It is unacceptable to think that there is any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children to achieve an objective."

The New York Times (9/16, Rutenberg, Stolberg, 1.21M) describes Bush as "impassioned" and "combative" and says, "It was also a debate Mr. Bush had hoped to have this week exclusively with Democrats as he and his party's leadership set out to draw unflattering distinctions between Republicans and Democrats on fighting terrorism for the fall elections." But "Bush spent Friday in a second day of heavy debate, casting some of the most respected voices on military matters in his own party as hindering the fight against terrorism. As of late Friday there seemed to be no break in the impasse, even as White House officials worked behind the scenes to build new support in the Senate for the legislation the president wants."

Casting Bush's remarks in a negative light the Washington Post (9/16, A1, Baker, 748K) reports, "An irritated Bush, raising his voice and gesturing sharply at a Rose Garden news conference, excoriated legislation passed by a Senate panel Thursday that is intended to conform U.S. detainee practices with the Geneva Conventions. Bush insisted on legislation more specifically defining what is banned so intelligence officers would not worry about being charged with war crimes." But Bush's "threat to end the interrogation program seemed to make little impression on the Republican dissidents" and "a fifth Republican senator, Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), joined the rebellion against the president." Meanwhile Democrats "seized on the president's remarks yesterday. 'Instead of picking fights with Colin Powell, John McCain and other military experts, President Bush should change course, do what the American people expect and finally give them the real security they deserve,' said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.)."

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Gerstenzang, Levey, 918K) reports Bush "in animated and unusually forceful language, urged members of Congress to approve his plan for interrogating detainees and trying them before military commissions." His "pointed declarations underscored the gap between the White House and the rebelling Republican senators at a time when the GOP hoped to enter the fall election season with a unified position on national security. In particular, Bush's comments emphasized his differences with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a former Vietnam prisoner of war and likely candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, who has opposed Bush's interrogation policy in the past as overly harsh."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Hutcheson) in an article titled "Bush Threatens To Shut CIA Interrogation Program" says Bush was using "fear to pressure lawmakers" and "Bush cast the dispute as a choice between protecting the nation or leaving it vulnerable to another terrorist attack. His critics, including many retired military officers and former Secretary of State Colin Powell, say his approach violates American values, undermines the moral foundation of the war on terrorism and increases the risk that U.S. prisoners of war will be abused."

The AP (9/16, Hunt) in an article titled "Bush Fights GOP Revolt Over Terror Bill" reports, "Bush fought back Friday against a Republican revolt in the Senate over tough anti-terror legislation and rejected warnings that the United States had lost the high moral ground to adversaries. 'It's flawed logic,' he snapped." As part of its coverage the AP listed the military records of Sens. McCain, Graham Warner and former Secretary of State Powell.

Bloomberg (9/16, Dodge, Rowley) reports details similar in other coverage of how "Bush raised the ante" and notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters that the Supreme Court decision created 'confusion and concern' about Central Intelligence Agency interrogation techniques." Gonzales said, "We're going to capture additional high- value detainees" and "we will need to get information from them." Meanwhile, "Graham, in a statement, took issue with the president's characterization of the legislation. 'What is being billed as "clarifying" our treaty obligations will be seen as "withdrawing" from the treaty obligations,' he said."

The Washington Times (9/16, Curl, 88K) quotes Sen. Charles Schumer saying, "When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is. … These military men are telling the president that in the war on terror you need to be both strong and smart, and it is about time he heeded their admonitions." And "Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid…said Mr. Bush should bow to the 'bipartisan process under way in the United States Senate.'"

The Financial Times (9/16, Daniel, Dombey) in an article titled "Bush On Defensive Over Anti-terrorism Measures" notes the EU "added to the pressure on the White House when it denounced as 'illegal' the secret CIA prison whose existence Mr Bush acknowledged last week." But "Bush appeared to create room for negotiations with Congress when he sidestepped the chance to pledge that he would veto any bill if it matched the one passed by 15 votes to 9 in the Senate armed services committee, and said his key criterion for success was one question: 'That the intelligence community must be able to tell me this bill enables this vital programme to continue.'"

Administration Seen As Using Rules To Skirt Compliance. The Washington Post (9/16, A3, Smith, 748K) in an analysis of the notes, "On the surface, Bush's proposal requires that interrogations in the previously secret CIA prison system comply with legal rules written by Congress last year. Privately, the administration has concluded that doing so would allow the CIA to keep using virtually all the interrogation methods it has employed for the past five years, the officials said." Examining the "ironies" of the debate the Post says, "The administration says its intent is to define the explicit meaning of Common Article 3 so that CIA officers know exactly what they can do. But the senior official who addressed the legal issue yesterday said the standard the administration prefers is 'context-sensitive,' a phrase that suggests an endlessly shifting application of the rules."

Questions Raised About JAG Support For Clarifying Rules. The New York Times (9/16, A1, Mazzetti, Lewis, 1.21M) in a front page story reports on the Administration's behind-the-scenes maneuvering to get approval for its proposal on terrorist interrogations from the Pentagon's top JAG officers, who are described as at odds with the Administration over terrorists' rights. Before the "crucial Senate vote on the Bush administration plan," Pentagon general counsel William Haynes summoned the JAGs "to enlist the lawyers on the administration's side by asking whether any would object to signing a letter lending their support to aspects of the White House proposal over which they had voiced little concern." They "agreed, but only after hours of negotiating over specific words, so that they would not appear to be wholly endorsing the plan." Some were left "embittered" by the meeting which "prompted loud protests from Republican senators opposed to the plan" But Air Force deputy judge advocate general Maj. Gen. Charles Dunlap said, "I didn't have any problem signing what I signed. … How people use it and what they use it for I can't control."

CIA Concerned About Liability. The New York Times (9/16, Shane, 1.21M) reports the CIA is concerned "that officers could be vulnerable to lawsuits, or even criminal prosecution, for actions they believed at the time complied with administration policy." The White House proposal "would be retroactive to Sept. 11, 2001, while senators working with Mr. Warner say their approach avoids dealing with past events because of legal and constitutional concerns. The senators say they believe that past abuses should be reviewed case by case." Experts believe it is "highly unlikely that intelligence officers could be prosecuted in American courts for their actions in interrogating terror suspects. Similarly, they said, lawsuits filed by former prisoners would probably face insurmountable hurdles in American courts." Yet "some said future investigations by Congress or a C.I.A. inspector general were quite possible and could bring the daunting prospect of high legal fees or devastating news coverage."

Bush Rules Would Hamper Prosecutions Of US War Crimes. In its analsysis the Los Angeles Times (9/16, Zajac, Simpson, 918K) reports, "When the Muslim world was first inflamed over images of abuse from the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, President Bush took the lead in a campaign to minimize the damage by pledging that his government would speak through its actions." Yet "more than two years later, provisions in Bush's proposed legislation for detainee interrogations and terrorism tribunals could hamper potential criminal prosecutions in some of the 17 abuse investigations from Iraq and Afghanistan pending before federal prosecutors in Virginia." Experts "said Bush's proposal would retroactively weaken the U.S. law against war crimes, possibly making it more difficult to win criminal indictments in those cases." The Los Angeles Times (9/16, 918K) reports also publishes a Q&A column on the military tribunal bill.

Senators Opposed To Bush Plan Face Political Risk. McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Talev) reports that by opposing bush on terrorist interrogations "McCain could alienate conservative Republicans when he needs them most. For several years he's worked hard to gain the trust of conservative Bush allies skeptical of his maverick streak" yet "now he's breaking with his party's president on an issue that threatens to undermine Republican strategy for November's congressional elections -- following Bush's leadership on national security. That could hurt him." And "Graham could reap opposition to his re-election within his South Carolina base. Many conservative activists already were frustrated with him for blocking a conservative judicial nominee's confirmation and supporting legislation that would allow illegal immigrants to stay in the country." McClatchy notes, "If Democrats win control of the House of Representatives or the Senate in November, all three senators could suffer the sting of blame."

Rear Admiral Harris Describes "War Inside The Wire." In the Wall Street Journal's Weekend Interview (9/16, Taranto, 2.03M), Commander of JTF Guantanamo Rear Adm. Harry Harris is profiled. The Journal sympathetically quotes Harris's view that the Gitmo detainees, rather than being victims of abuse, "have kept fighting even while in captivity." The inmates "have brought more-restrictive conditions on themselves, through suicide, sabotage and other disruptive actions."

Star-Ledger Blasts Bush Stand. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/16) editorializes, "Such views [like Colin Powell's] rile the president but don't sway him. That's frightening because the dangers he sees ahead are real. He's mistaken to think dealing with them harshly is the same as dealing with them effectively."

WTimes Editorial Questions McCain. The Washington Times (9/16, 88K) editorializes, "Mr. McCain should explain why he is endangering a vital interrogation program that has saved many American lives."

Europe, US Are Deadlocked On Air Security. The Financial Times (9/16, Burns, Bounds, Cameron) reports, "Attempts to find transatlantic agreement on counter-terror measures for the airline industry are floundering as governments and aviation experts argue about which security rules would be most effective." The UK and the US have been stricter than most Europeans "since British police foiled an alleged plot to blow up transatlantic jets with liquid explosives." The EU's "top negotiator on Friday warned that transatlantic travellers faced chaos next month unless the US dropped its demands for greater access to airline passenger data from the European Union."

Albany Terror Trial Jurors Hear FBI Surveillance Recordings. The Albany Times-Union (9/16, Lyons) reported, "The spiritual leader of an Albany mosque warned an undercover FBI informant that he needed to be careful and quiet about his support of terrorists who were purported to be planning to kill the president of Pakistan, according to government transcripts of their secretly recorded conversations." At the trial of Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain on Friday, jurors "listened to hours of tapes recorded during the sting." The Times-Union added, "Special Agent Timothy Coll, who headed the investigation, testified Friday that Hossain told him he thought the informant 'was joking'" about the proposed shoulder-launched missile deal. "Aref was also questioned following his arrest and told agents that the money transactions were a loan and that 'his role was a witness,' Coll said."

Californian Accused Of Yemeni Terrorist Links. The AP (9/16, Munoz) reports, "A California man accused of trying to supply stolen U.S. military equipment and defense secrets to Yemen was denied bail Friday after a prosecutor said he had ties to a terrorist financier who plotted to help al-Qaida and Hamas. The allegations emerged at a hearing for Amen Ahmed Ali, 56." The suspect "was arrested Sept. 7 at his cigarette shop in Bakersfield. He and two other men, all Yemeni-born U.S. citizens, were charged in the case." The Los Angeles Times/AP (9/16) runs an abbreviated version of this story.

The Bakersfield Californian (9/16, Shepard) reported, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller said in court that Ali's address book contained the name of Sheikh Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad," who "was convicted in 2005 of providing material support to terrorist organizations and is serving a 75-year sentence in a Colorado prison. Faller also told the court Ali may face an additional charge of espionage after evidence found in a search of his home last week indicated he may have been working as an undercover agent for the Yemen government." Bakersfield Yemenis Abdul Jobah and Nashwan Alrowhani said that "following Ali's arrest last week, the FBI searched the homes of at least 15 members of the Bakersfield Yemeni community," and Ali's lawyer "said many in the Yemeni community felt the FBI were coming down hard on them. Alrowhani said FBI agents searched his home, froze his bank account and took his passport. His account was released and his passport returned, he said."

Australia Denies Army Chief Visited Philippines In Search Of Bali Bombers. The AFP (9/16) reports, "Australia's defence ministry has denied its army chief is on a secret visit to the southern Philippines this week to be briefed on a hunt for two suspects in the 2002 Bali bombings that left 200 people dead." Australia insists that Lt. Gen. Peter Leahy is on a "scheduled exchange of visits."

Yemen Foils Attacks. The Financial Times (9/16, Saleh) reports, "Yemen said on Friday it had foiled two attempts to blow up oil facilities in different parts of the country, days after al-Qaeda urged Muslims to target western interests in the Gulf. ... Yemen has been trying to shed its image as a haven for Islamic militants since 9/11, but the escape in February of 23 al-Qaeda operatives from a high-security jail in the country raised doubts in the United States about its commitment to the war against terrorism."

The New York Times (9/16, Fattah, 1.21M) reports, "Yemeni officials said an investigation was under way to determine who was behind the attacks, which came days after one of Al Qaeda's top leaders, Ayman al-Zawahri, threatened strikes against oil facilities in the Middle East that he blamed for 'stealing Muslim oil.' By late Friday, no group had claimed responsibility." The Times adds, "The attacks occurred just days before voters are to cast ballots in a hotly contested election pitting President Ali Abdullah Saleh against four challengers. Political analysts accused the government on Friday evening of capitalizing on the incidents to help Mr. Saleh's standing."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Still Fails To Track Foreign Visitors. McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Taylor) reports, "After spending $900 million to set up a database to track foreign travelers arriving in America, the government still doesn't know how many of them stay in the country illegally because the system is incomplete and snarled by controversy. The US-VISIT system screens up to 2 million foreigners a month as they arrive at all international airports and seaports and at most border crossings. ... But 10 years after Congress first ordered the system, the Department of Homeland Security hasn't set up a way for the same visa-holders to check out when they leave the country. Instead, the agency continues to test it at 14 airports and two seaports."

Security Expert Decries ID Chip In New Passports. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (9/16, 748K), security expert Bruce Schneier warns passport holders, "In many countries, including the United States, passports will soon be equipped with RFID chips. And you don't want one of these chips in your passport." The chips allegedly present the risk of "surreptitious access: Your passport information might be read without your knowledge or consent by a government trying to track your movements, a criminal trying to steal your identity or someone just curious about your citizenship." Schneier urges passport holders to renew their passports immediately, so that "with your new passport you can wait another 10 years for an RFID passport, when the technology will be more mature, when we will have a better understanding of the security risks and when there will be other technologies we can use to cut the risks."

Congress Will Restructure FEMA But Leave It Within DHS. The New York Times (9/16, Lipton, 1.21M) reports, "Congressional negotiators agreed Friday on a plan to restructure the Federal Emergency Management Agency that would give it somewhat more clout and responsibility, but still not as much as it had during the Clinton administration. The compromise effectively ends the campaign by some in Congress to separate FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security and re-establish it as an independent agency reporting directly to the president." The Times goes on to report, "Under the agreement, which will be inserted into a budget bill that Congress is scheduled to vote on this month, the FEMA director would still report to the secretary of homeland security, as he has since FEMA lost its independent status in 2003. But the director, now R. David Paulison, would also be the principal adviser to the president for emergency management, a new role modeled on the relationship between the president and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who also report to the defense secretary. In a major disaster, the president could designate the FEMA director as a cabinet-level official.

The Washington Post (9/16, A2, Hsu, 748K) reports the agreement "does not clarify whether FEMA would get more money to implement the scores of changes recommended by several post-Katrina reviews. 'It is crucial that we strengthen FEMA and provide it with the resources and tools necessary to help us be better prepared for the next hurricane or disaster. This agreement will move this legislation forward,'" Sen. Susan Collins said "in announcing the deal with" Sen. Joseph Lieberman. The compromise "now moves to a House-Senate panel that this month is hammering out a must-pass $33 billion Homeland Security spending bill."

DHS USCIS Has Nearly Eliminated Immigration Processing Backlog. The Washington Times (9/16, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The immigration service has nearly achieved its goal of processing immigration applications within an average of six months and will make an October deadline for eliminating the backlog, agency Director Emilio T. Gonzalez said yesterday. 'We're on track to get where we need to be, where we want to be,' Mr. Gonzalez, the head of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS), which is part of the Homeland Security Department, told reporters yesterday." According to the Times, "The backlog elimination has been a major test for the agency that would have to administer any future guest-worker program, and members of Congress have been watching the effort's progress closely. However, the goal will be reached in part because the agency no longer counts cases that are outside its control, such as those awaiting an FBI check." The Times notes President Bush and Congress "approved a $500 million package to pay for reducing the backlog. That allowed USCIS to shift employees and hire temporary employees to help. 'We have every expectation we'll be able to make the president a very happy person,' Mr. Gonzalez said yesterday."

Exploitation Of Illegals Injured At Work Called "Rampant." McClatchy (9/16, Chandler) reports, "Thousands of illegal workers…are hurt on the job every year in America, but don't get the compensation that's promised by law in every state. Bosses often fire them, threaten them with deportation and commit an array of other misdeeds to avoid responsibility for workers' injuries. Some insurers refuse to pay their claims, citing reasons related to their illegal status. As a result, injured workers often go without medical care or go to emergency rooms for treatment - and taxpayers get stuck with the bills. … From field hands to garment workers to poultry processors to construction crews, injuries abound in industries that rely on an estimated 7 million undocumented workers, often to do dirty and dangerous jobs. Yet those who are undocumented are frequently cheated out of benefits that American workers have taken for granted for nearly a century, a McClatchy Newspapers investigation has found. Federal labor officials haven't studied whether undocumented workers are wrongfully being denied compensation. But the exploitation is rampant, according to interviews with scores of illegal workers, employers, workers' comp lawyers, health care providers and workplace experts, and a review of lawsuits and workers' comp claims."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Plans To Ring Baghdad With Trenches. TV coverage, other than a CBS News story about KBR contractors killed in Iraq, avoided Iraq today, with much of it being devoted to the debate over detainee treatment. Both the New York Times and Washington Post devoted front-page stories to the new security plan. The New York Times (9/16, Wong, 1.21M) reports, "The Iraqi government plans to seal off Baghdad within weeks by ringing it with a series of trenches and setting up dozens of traffic checkpoints to control movement in and out of the violent city of seven million people, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Friday. The effort is one of the most ambitious security projects this year, with cars expected to be funneled through 28 checkpoints." The Times says skeptically, "It is unclear whether Baghdad can really be sealed off, given the city's circumference of about 60 miles. With so much terrain, guerrillas might find areas that are unconstrained by the trenches and checkpoints. On the main roads, traffic could be snarled for miles, especially in the final days of Ramadan."

The Washington Post (9/16, Raghavan, 748K) devotes a front-page article to the "security ring," describing it as "a massive effort to seal off Baghdad with a ring of reinforced checkpoints, berms, trenches, barriers and fences." Building a ring would be "the most ambitious security endeavor yet" in Baghdad. The Post also lists potential problems: "Such efforts are among the methods that counterinsurgency experts recommend to gain control over population movements. Yet some analysts also say that the United States has never taken what many of them contend is an essential first step: conducting a thorough census, then issuing identity cards and requiring all people to carry them at all times. It is unclear whether the planned complex of berms, trenches and checkpoints will be effective in Baghdad, a megalopolis of 81 square miles that includes vast stretches of farmland and open terrain. Insurgents and members of private militias might still be able to avoid the checkpoints, and even if they don't, U.S. and Iraqi forces still face the problem of identifying them. The Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which begins in October, is likely to increase the flow of people in and out of Baghdad."

The AP (9/16, Santana) says that the plan "comes as more than 130 people were slain in two days -- either killed in attacks or tortured and dumped in rivers or on the city's streets." Also, US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton "told the Security Council on Thursday that the average number of weekly attacks increased 15 percent and Iraqi casualties increased by 51 percent, compared with the previous three months."

US Is Reportedly "Frustrated" With Pace Of Change In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Richter, 918K) reports, "Four months after Iraq's new government took office, U.S. officials are growing impatient with leaders in Baghdad and pushing them to move more quickly on the difficult agenda confronting them." Despite officially professed satisfaction with Prime Minister Maliki, one official said, "The rhetoric has to be matched by concrete action." In the last five days, "142 [execution-style] killings have been reported." Some unnamed officials, "frustrated by the lack of progress, have voiced a private view in recent weeks that Iraq might be better off under a traditional Middle Eastern strongman." The Times notes obstacles facing Maliki, such as the task of "trying to lead a fractious government with only the narrowest base of public support" and the "reluctance of other countries to help what they see as the weak government of a troubled land."

Overburdened Iraqi Officials Cannot Investigate Murders. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Moore, Spiegel, 918K) reports on the impossibility of investigating the surge of homicides in Iraq: "There is no shortage of potential evidence: handcuffs pulling the inert shoulders taut, blindfolds, a crowd of witnesses who saw the victim before masked assailants gunned him down in the street or stuffed him into a police car. But in Iraq, there seems to be neither interest nor time for that. There are too many bodies and too many killers with too many ties to the nation's warring political factions." Factions differ on the source of the recently increased violence, with the Times quoting leaders blaming rival sects' militias and even alleging that the US is "inventing the crisis."

US Soldier Is Missing After Blast. The AP (9/16, Santana) reports, "A U.S. soldier was missing Friday, a day after a suicide truck bombing killed two soldiers and wounded another 30 west of Baghdad, U.S. military officials said. Officials refused to "say whether they believed the soldier had been abducted or whether he may have been killed in the attack." Thursday was an "especially bloody day for U.S. forces," given the deaths of five US soldiers.

Bush Regrets Situation In Iraq Does Not Allow Troop Withdrawal. In its coverage of Bush's remarks on detainee interrogation NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 3, 2:35, Gregory, 9.87M) also noted Bush ruled "out a meeting with Iran's leader and on Iraq, said he regretted troop levels were rising and not falling as he thought they would be by now." President Bush: "It looked like it would be the case until the violence started rising in Baghdad."

Chiarelli Says US Won't Abandon Anbar Fight. The New York Times (9/16, Shanker, 1.21M) reports, "The American military in Iraq will not abandon the fight against insurgents in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province despite a shift of troops toward Baghdad...the second-ranking commander in Iraq said Friday." Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli "stressed that the American military has not forsaken Anbar Province" but described Baghdad as "our main effort." He also interpreted the Devlin report to mean "that there are economic and political conditions that have to improve out at Al Anbar." According to Chiarelli, although Iraq is not in a civil war, "the threat has shifted from terrorist and insurgent violence to battling bombings and murders driven by sectarian tensions."

The AP (9/16, Burns) reports similarly, "U.S. officials say they have not written off Iraq's troubled Anbar province -- the country's largest, and one of its most violent -- but neither are they sending more U.S. troops there to battle the insurgents." The AP adds in an implicit questioning of the troop levels for Anbar, "The Pentagon said that from May 20, when the new Iraqi government was seated, through Aug. 6 there was an average of more than 30 attacks a day in Anbar -- more than any other province in the country and slightly more than in Baghdad. Of the 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, about 30,000 are in Anbar."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Brown) reports, "Lt. Gen. Pete Chiarelli acknowledged that a leaked classified intelligence report recommended that another division, about 10,000 to 15,000 troops, was needed to stabilize Anbar province, but he said the main effort now was to secure Baghdad." Chiarelli "expressed dismay over the leak of the report," a sentiment that went unreported in other articles.

Small Anbar Force Is Again Contrasted With Level Of Violence. The Washington Times/AP (9/16) reports that Chiarelli said, "The main effort is Baghdad, and we must ensure that we weight the main effort." Like the AP article by Burns quoted above, it notes that Anbar had more attacks daily than any other province but has 30,000 of the 147,000 US troops in Iraq.

Commanders Make "Difficult Trade-Offs." The Washington Post (9/16, Tyson, 748K) reports his remarks too, saying in its headline that Anbar is called "secondary." The bleak Post article uses the terms "sober talk" and "dire warning" to characterize Chiarelli's videoconference with reporters: "Implicit in Chiarelli's remarks on Anbar was the idea that, given limited overall troop numbers in Iraq, American commanders must make difficult trade-offs as they concentrate forces in one troubled region at a time." Characterizing the intensity of war in Anbar, the Post comments, "More than 900 U.S. troops have been killed in Anbar since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, compared with more than 600 in Baghdad, according to the Web site iCasualties.org." Like the Times, the Post quotes Chiarelli on the need to find jobs for "angry young men" to pacify them.

Army Reserve Unit Prepares For Return To Iraq. In a late story, the Philadelphia Inquirer (9/15, Colimore, 399K) reports, "Three years ago, they were called up to serve in Iraq, in dangerous places such as Mosul and Hilla, south of Baghdad. Many of them came under sniper fire in convoys ... Now, members of the Army's Norristown-based 358th Civil Affairs Brigade are among the relatively few reservists heading back for a second tour of duty." The Inquirer

Newsweek Covers First Post-Extension Death In Stryker Brigade. Newsweek (9/15, Hastings, 3.12M) in a web-only story reports on the death of Cpl. Alexander Jordan, killed by a sniper on the "33rd day of the Battle of Baghdad." His unit had had its deployment extended by four months. Newsweek describes the grief of the soldiers and their Iraqi interpreter and says pessimistically, "The civil war, though, has likely already begun. Or so it seemed in the first neighborhood they secured." The soldiers realize "that much of the sectarian violence was originating in Sadr City, an area that has been basically off limits to Coalition forces. The soldiers even took friendly bets on when and if they would do a full-scale operation in the impoverished Shiite neighborhood. 'We're handcuffing ourselves,' said one officer."

Dorgan Probes Death Of Civilian Contractors In Iraq. CBS Evening News (9/15, story 8, 3:05, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "We report almost everyday on the mounting US military death toll in Iraq, but you might not realize just how many civilians working for private contractors have died there. More than 600 to date. The question tonight, did one contractor ignore repeated warnings and send its workers into a danger zone that cost many of them their lives?" CBS (Keteyian) added, "KBR denies the charges and says, like the army, it should be immune from lawsuits. ... A top Senate Democrat finds this behavior outrageous." Sen. Byron Dorgan: "I think these are all serious issues and in some cases life or death issues and I think there needs to be and the American people would expect there to be accountability." Keteyian: "On Monday, Senator Dorgan plans to find out who is accountable when he holds a hearing on this very incident."

Iraqi Ambassador Says US Is "Stonewalling." The Detroit Free Press/AP (9/15, Karush) reports, "Iraq's ambassador to Washington on Friday accused U.S. officials of stonewalling him in his efforts to find out what happened to his cousin, who was killed by the military near Haditha. ... 'It sounds to me very much like bureaucratic stonewalling,' [Samir Sumaidaie] told The Associated Press in an interview in suburban Detroit, where he was meeting with members of the area's large Iraqi community." The AP adds that a "request for comment" was left with the DOD press office. About five sites, all in Michigan, carried versions of this AP story.

Mystery Deepens Around Missing Marine. The New York Times (9/16, Sink, 1.21M) reports that on the second day of the search for Lance Cpl. Lance Hering in Colorado, "investigators began to have their suspicions and have since said that it was all probably a hoax and that the marine might be on the run." After a five-day search ended, "[Hering's friend] confessed to detectives that it had all been a set-up to help Corporal Hering avoid returning to Iraq." A Boulder County sheriff's official cited Hering's access to $2,000 and past criminal record as "red flags."

Iraqi President Visits Aspen. The AP (9/16) reports, "Iraqi President Jalal Talabani spent Friday in this posh mountain resort [Aspen] as part of an annual conference sponsored by a New York investment company, The Associated Press has learned. ... His arrival was first reported by the Aspen Daily News and KREX-TV in Grand Junction." Talabani "was expected to travel to New York this weekend and then to Washington for a private meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice next week, Assistant Secretary Kristen Silverberg said."

NATO Chief Renews Call For More Troops In Afghanistan. The AP (9/16, Ames) reports, "NATO's top commander renewed an appeal Friday for allies to urgently provide up to 2,500 troops for the battle with Taliban insurgents in southern Afghanistan, but officials said it likely would take two weeks before governments reply." Poland's offer of 900 troops was termed "welcome," but NATO reportedly needs reinforcements urgently "to pursue the Taliban before the onset of winter enabled them to take refuge in the hills." NATO member states "have been reluctant to commit forces, as they already are stretched by other international missions and are worried about the risk of high casualties from the tough Taliban resistance."

Tensions Overshadow Gains In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (9/16, Constable, 748K) reports pessimistically, "Despite scattered gains by international troops fighting Taliban insurgents in the country's south, Afghan and foreign analysts here have voiced concern that a recent peace initiative is backfiring and that lapsed Afghan militias could be drawn into the conflict unless it is quickly quelled and replaced by aid and protection." The Post asserts, "The insurgency continues to spread beyond the south. ... But the most urgent need, military officials and diplomats said, is to contain the southern conflict, defeat the insurgents in key districts of Kandahar and Helmand, and begin providing support to civilians there." One "Western military official" said, "We can't just keep fighting endless battles without having something to offer the next day."

4 Taliban Members Killed. The AP (9/16) reports, "About 60 suspected Taliban militants attacked a police checkpoint in southern Afghanistan, starting a battle in which four militants died, police said Saturday." The AP concludes that NATO forces have "been surprised by the ferocity of Taliban resistance and have sustained more than 30 deaths. NATO has said enemy casualties run into hundreds."

Body Counts Arouse Skepticism. The AP (9/15, Pennington) reports, "NATO's estimate of Taliban killed this month has created skepticism and worry in Afghanistan, with local officials saying that either the militant force has grown bigger than imagined — or too many innocent Afghans are being killed." However, "NATO has stood by its battle assessments as solid, even conservative." Military analyst Andrew Krepinevich "said that given the circumstances in which the Taliban had massed in one place, the figures given by NATO were plausible and could well be an underestimation, because of the effort the Islamic militia makes to bury their dead quickly."

Arrests Of Opium Traders Coming "Soon." The AFP (9/16) reports, "Some of the key players behind Afghanistan's record-high opium trade are expected to be brought before court over the next year ... The arrests would be vital to a strategy to stem the increasingly sophisticated narcotics trade before links between insurgents and drug traffickers become entrenched, Thomas A. Schweich [US deputy assistant secretary of state for international narcotics] said on Friday." AFP quotes some encouraging statistics cited by Schweich but adds, "There have been doubts about the will of the authorities to round up the kingpins of the trade, as some of them are allegedly in top positions in government."

General Eikenberry Describes Afghanistan's "Catch-22." In the Wall Street Journal (9/16, White, 2.03M), Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry discusses the security problems facing the US and NATO in Afghanistan. Ultimately, the root of the problem is "a big one," namely, the 52% share of opium exports in the country's GDP. The money "support[s] an insurgency [that] has ... basically halted all of the infrastructure build-out" needed to wean farmers off the drug.

Greenberg Defends Decision To Go To War Against Iraq. In an op-ed in the Washington Times (9/16, 88K), commentator Paul Greenberg sarcastically says of war critic Sen. Jay Rockefeller, "If only the United States and its allies had not invaded Iraq, Swami Rockefeller explains, the world would be a better place today -- even if Saddam Hussein were still in power." Greenberg likens Rockefeller's claim to those who let Hitler keep rearming Germany and says, "Reasonable men may agree or disagree with the president's policy, but fair-minded Americans will recognize his sincerity. For there is no reason other than honest belief for this president to pursue a course that has imperiled his popularity and divided the country."

Journalist Describes "Winners And Losers" Of 9/11, Slams Wolfowitz. In a commentary for the Financial Times (9/16), journalist Jurek Martin names those he considers "winners and losers" of 9/11. He blasts former deputy secretary Paul Wolfowitz, saying, "As the world now knows to its cost, the neo-cons, using 9/11 as their pretext, hijacked American foreign policy and still have not lost full control of it. They did not even have to tell the truth to justify their goals. ... Wolfowitz had no compunction in blaming a cowardly press that didn't have the guts to go out and report the good news. ... This was the man who never set foot outside Baghdad's Green Zone without protection from battalions of American troops."

Congressman Shays Struggles To Explain Reversal On Iraq. In Newsweek (9/15, 3.12M), columnist Eleanor Clift writes, "An ardent supporter of the war, [Rep. Christopher Shays (R-CT)] abruptly reversed course to join critics in calling for a firm deadline-based timetable 'to wake up the Iraqis' so U.S. troops could begin to withdraw from Iraq." Trailing in the polls when he made his announcement, Shays has been accused of undergoing an "expedient" conversion. Although he denies the charge, Clift writes, "Listening to Shays defending his position and his integrity for more than an hour is dizzying. It's like being caught in a hall of mirrors. He wants to both support and condemn the Iraq war, his party and his president."

Turkey Has Its Own "Iraq Problem." In an op-ed for the Washington Post (9/16, 748K), political scientist Lenore Martin writes, "The Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), operating from havens in northern Iraq, has been attacking Turkish security forces in southeastern Anatolia and occasionally civilians elsewhere. Turkey is determined to prevent a repetition of the 1984-99 guerrilla war with the separatist PKK" and as a consequence threatens to "invade northern Iraq." Martin says the Kurds, Turks, and US all need to act: Iraqi Kurds "must be willing to deny the PKK havens in northern Iraq." Turkey "must more assertively address the cultural, political and economic demands of the Kurds in southeast Anatolia." The US "must throw its full weight behind efforts to eject the PKK from northern Iraq. Furthermore the United States needs to pressure Europe more energetically to block the transfer of funds to the PKK."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

House Committee Wants HP Chair To Testify. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, 918K) reports, "A congressional panel wants to question key figures in the scandal surrounding Hewlett-Packard Co.'s investigation of media leaks, and a shareholder lawsuit was filed in state court accusing the company's top brass of breaching their duties. The House Energy and Commerce Committee sent letters Friday requesting that HP Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn and General Counsel Ann O. Baskins appear at a Sept. 28 hearing of its oversight and investigations subcommittee."

HP Case Seen As Example Of Increasingly Aggressive Corporate Boards. The Washington Post (9/16, D1, Masters, 748K) reports, "The once-clubby atmosphere of the public company boardroom has undergone a makeover during the past several years, as board members become more willing to flex their muscle and aggressively press management for changes. Since early 2005, directors of some of corporate America's biggest names have pushed out their chief executives. … The unfolding scandal at Hewlett-Packard Co. -- where the company's chairman, who was concerned about leaks, ordered an investigation of directors' phone records that may have been conducted illegally -- offers an extreme example of the new tensions inside some boardrooms. Legal analysts, governance experts and directors agree that the nature of boardroom politics has changed in the years since Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. collapsed and directors of both companies were held personally liable for investor losses."

Justice In Grasso Case Forced To Rule On His Own Conduct. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Lucchetti, Davies) reports, "The legal battle over the paycheck of the New York Stock Exchange's former boss -- was he overpaid, or not? -- took an unusual twist this past week: The judge had to make a ruling on his own conduct." The Journal continues, "On Thursday, Justice Charles Ramos declined to remove himself from the case, despite an argument by lawyers for Dick Grasso, the NYSE's former chief, that the judge couldn't be fair. One reason: Twice in recent years, Justice Ramos applied for a job on the NYSE's board, which decides what to pay executives at the stock exchange. … Mr. Grasso was paid more than $100 million in 2003, his last year on the job, He's being sued by New York state's attorney general on the grounds that he didn't deserve that much money at the exchange, now owned by the publicly traded NYSE Group Inc." The Journal adds, "It's not the first time that the 64-year-old Justice Ramos, of the state Supreme Court (a trial-level court in New York), has played a big role in a controversial case. In 2002, he took the surprising step of trying to cut the $625 million in fees claimed by lawyers involved in a tobacco-related lawsuit, calling the size of the sum 'offensive.' (He was overruled, and the lawyers did get their fees.) He is also presiding in the high-profile case involving American International Group Inc.'s former chief executive, Maurice R. Greenberg. … According to attorneys who have tried cases in his courtroom, he has a reputation for volatility and wit. At times, for instance he compliments lawyers for making persuasive arguments -- moments before denying the motion. … Other times, he's less patient. During settlement discussions in a case last year between the NYSE and some disgruntled investors in the Big Board, he scolded one attorney in chambers for interrupting him. According to two people present at the time, he walked around from behind his desk, and jabbed his finger at the attorney's face, saying that if it happened again, the judge would throw him out of the courtroom."

Former Peregrine Official Pleads Not Guilty. The San Diego Union-Tribune (9/16, Bigelow) reports, "The former European vice president for Peregrine Systems pleaded not guilty to federal fraud and conspiracy charges in San Diego yesterday after he was extradited amid a political rumpus in the United Kingdom." The Union-Tribune continues, "Jeremy Reeve Crook, 53, became a cause celebre in London this summer because of growing popular opposition to changes in British extradition law that Parliament enacted in 2003. … The changes, which were prompted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, allow U.S. authorities to extradite British citizens and other residents without first establishing a preliminary case against them in British court." The Union-Tribune adds, "The changes made the extradition process lopsided because British authorities 'basically just turn over' anyone wanted by the U.S. Justice Department, said Douglas McNabb, a lawyer in Washington, D.C. … In contrast, British authorities seeking to extradite individuals under current U.S. extradition law have to make a case showing 'probable cause' in federal court, McNabb said." The Union-Tribune notes, "Before the end of the year, the U.S. Senate is expected to vote on changes to relax the current U.S. requirements for extradition, McNabb said. But even if those revisions are approved, McNabb said, the extradition process still will be stiffer in the United States than in the United Kingdom. … Crook became the subject of a U.S. extradition request after he was indicted in October 2004 with 10 others for their alleged roles in the massive accounting fraud at Peregrine Systems, the San Diego software developer now operated by Hewlett-Packard Co. … Prosecutors asked Crook to return voluntarily to the United States to respond to the charges. He declined, and U.S. authorities subsequently sought an extradition order."

Former Enron Official Sentenced To Probation For Lying To Credit-Rating Agencies. The AP (9/16, Graczyk) reports, "A former assistant treasurer at the disgraced Enron Corp. was sentenced Friday to four years probation and a $10,000 fine for lying to credit-rating agencies to make the financial picture at the one-time energy giant appear healthier than it was." The AP continues, 'Timothy DeSpain, 41, pleaded guilty nearly two years ago to a single charge of conspiracy to commit securities fraud. At the same time, he agreed to cooperate with federal authorities investigating the company, which toppled into bankruptcy in December 2001, evaporating more than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and, initially, 5,600 jobs." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein, who could have imposed up to a five-year prison term and $250,000 fine under federal sentencing guidelines, said he was impressed by DeSpain's level of cooperation with federal prosecutors looking into the Enron debacle and with letters of support from relatives and friends."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney Pleads Guilty To Accepting Bribes From Abramoff. Rep. Bob Ney's guilty plea received only brief mentions well into last night's network news broadcasts but was examined in depth by major US newspapers Saturday morning. ABC World News (9/15, story 6, 0:25, Snow) reported, "Republican Congressman Bob Ney has admitted to taking gifts from lobbyist Jack Abramoff in exchange for his influence. After months of denying any wrong wrongdoing, Ney today agreed to plea guilty to conspiracy and making false statements."

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported Ney "is accused of accepting overseas trips worth more than $170,000 in exchange for helping some of Abramoff's clients."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 7, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Ney "became the first sitting lawmaker to plead guilty to charges stemming from his relationship to disgraced former lobbyist Abramoff. He filed court papers this morning agree to a plea bargain. … His lawyer said the congressman interested an alcoholism treatment program."

The Washington Times (9/16, Price, 88K) reports Assistant U.S. Attorney General Alice S. Fisher "said as part of the plea agreement prosecutors will recommend a 27-month sentence for crimes that could bring Ney 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine."

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Schmitt, 918K) reports, "The Abramoff investigation, which mostly involves Republicans, has led to the conviction of several former congressional aides who were in the lobbyist's inner circle. … But aside from the political scandal created by the case, it remained uncertain whether other elected officials would join Ney in facing legal problems from it. Although Ney has long been viewed as likely to face charges, evidence of possible wrongdoing by some of his colleagues has not seemed as strong. Moreover, his own plea agreement with authorities does not require him to point fingers and cooperate in the investigation."

The Miami Herald (9/16, Weaver) reports, "Justice Department officials condemned his misconduct. … 'He illegally deceived the public and the House of Representatives about his actions,' Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general heading the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said in Washington. 'In doing so, the congressman was acting in his own best interests, and not in the best interests of his constituents.' … Fisher said Justice's public corruption prosecutors received 'substantial assistance' from the Miami offices of U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta and the FBI."

Prosecutors Said To Be Subjecting Burns To "Particular Scrutiny." Time (9/16, Zagorin, 4.03M) reports, "A source close to the investigation told TIME that scores of US prosecutors and FBI agents continue to examine the activities of other sitting members of Congress and prominent individuals who could face prosecution, though not necessarily before the November 7 election. The source confirmed previous public reports that particular scrutiny is being paid to Sen. Conrad Burns, a Montana Republican who faces a tough campaign for reelection."

Ney Not Planning To Resign. The AP (9/16, Bridis) reports, "The chairman of Ohio's Republican Party, Bob Bennett, said Ney's apology 'rings hollow,' and he urged the lawmaker to resign 'and begin paying the price for his arrogance and greed.' Ney's attorney, William Lawler, said the congressman, who announced last month he wouldn't seek re-election, has no plans to resign." House Majority Leader John Boehner "described Ney as a skilled lawmaker and good friend. 'Clearly Bob made mistakes, and he is now feeling the full weight of those mistakes,' Boehner said. 'His actions violated the law, and he must be held accountable.'"

The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Grimaldi, Schmidt, 748K) reports, "Lawler said Ney is receiving treatment for 'alcohol-dependence issues' but declined to say whether he has entered a rehabilitation facility. Lawler said treatment was the deciding factor in setting the date for next month's court appearance. Others familiar with the case said that Ney's representatives tried to put off the announcement of the plea deal until then. Ney will be eligible for a government pension because Congress has not acted on legislation that would ban pensions for convicted lawmakers."

Democrats Contend Ney Is An Example Of GOP "Culture Of Corruption." The New York Times (9/16, Shenon, 1.21M) reports Ney "admitted Friday that he had effectively put his office up for sale to corrupt Washington lobbyists and a foreign businessman in exchange for illegal gifts that included lavish overseas trips, the use of skyboxes at sports arenas in the Washington area and thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips from London casinos. In a plea agreement announced by the Justice Department, Mr. Ney, a six-term Republican who once seemed poised to rise far in the House leadership, admitted to a wide-ranging criminal conspiracy and to making false statements about the gifts." The House minority leader, Nancy Pelosi "said Mr. Ney's plea agreement was proof of 'what we have long said: the Republican culture of corruption has pervaded Congress.'" Speaker Dennis Hastert "said, 'The illegal behavior that Congressman Bob Ney has admitted doing was unacceptable.'"

The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Grimaldi, Schmidt, 748K) reports, "Coming just seven weeks before the midterm congressional elections, Ney's admission of guilt was cited yesterday by Democrats as evidence that Congress is beset by a 'ring of corruption.' But Republicans were quick to note that a Democrat, Rep. William J. Jefferson of Louisiana, is the focus of a separate federal bribery investigation."

The Washington Times (9/16, Price, 88K) reports Democrats immediately jumped on the election-year conviction and linked the Republican candidate vying to fill Ney's seat to the disgraced congressman. The Ohio Democratic Party complained that State Sen. Joy Padgett, who won a special Republican primary Thursday, has 'extensive ties to' Ney and has been unwilling 'to return Ney's past campaign contributions.'" Kevin Madden, spokesman for Boehner "said Mrs. Pelosi 'is delusional to think that her party has even a shred of credibility on the issue of reform.' 'Capitol Hill Democrats have either resisted or tried to obstruct every substantive effort of reform in this Congress,' Mr. Madden said."

Ney Plea Said To Demonstrate Need For Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post (9/16, A20, 748K) reports, "On Thursday, the House of Representatives passed a fig leaf of a change in earmarking rules that will simply require lawmakers, in some cases, to attach their names to special-interest projects that they sponsor. We'll offer a more detailed analysis of this faux reform another time, but the most disturbing point is this: Apparently, that's it for lobbying reform this session. There will be no action to limit the free trips that lawmakers and staff members can take, beef up the broken system of ethics enforcement, slow the revolving door between public service and K Street riches, or improve disclosure of lobbying activities. It was striking, then, that yesterday, the day after the House's non-action action, the court documents were replete with disgusting details about the rapaciously unethical behavior of Mr. Ney and his staff."

Jefferson's Attempt To Seize Control Of Tech Firm Described. The New York Times (9/16, Drew, 1.21M) reports, "In July 2005, Vernon L. Jackson returned home to Louisville from Washington, where he had just met with Representative William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat who had been helping promote his fledgling digital-technology company." Jefferson "had made a proposal that, in Mr. Jackson's view, was tantamount to theft: in return for a quick infusion of cash, Mr. Harper said, Mr. Jefferson and his investors would take control of iGate and its promising broadband patents while easing Mr. Jackson aside and cutting off most of the company's creditors. Unbeknownst to the two men, the Federal Bureau of Investigation had been monitoring their dealings. Less than three weeks later, agents raided Mr. Jefferson's homes, in Washington and in New Orleans, and found stacks of cash stuffed in a freezer. Mr. Jackson, 54, has pleaded guilty to paying more than $400,000 in bribes for Mr. Jefferson's help; on Sept. 8, he was sentenced to seven years in prison." The Times adds, "an examination of court records and dozens of internal iGate documents, as well as interviews with a number of Mr. Jackson's associates, offers a far clearer picture of the relationship between the two men, and of how Mr. Jefferson went from helping a small company to trying to take it over for his family's benefit."

Katrina Fraud Task Force Charges 400 In First Year. The Federal Times (9/16, Curl) reports, "More than 400 people have been federally charged with Hurricane Katrina-related fraud since Attorney General Alberto Gonzales convened a task force to investigate the cases last September." The Times continues, "According to Gonzales, charges have been filed in 30 federal districts in all U.S. regions. … 'To take advantage of the devastation and recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast is both shameful and illegal,' Gonzales said in a statement. 'We must ensure that the criminals who have exploited this time of human suffering are brought to justice and that their crimes do not undermine the programs intended to rebuild the homes, businesses and communities destroyed by hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma.'" The Times adds, "The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force reported that as of last month, the Federal Emergency Management Agency had received more than 2.5 million applications for disaster assistance related to the 2005 Gulf Coast hurricanes. While most of these applicants had legitimate needs, the task force found that numerous people committed fraud in seeking benefits to which they were not entitled. … According to the task force, criminals often seek to exploit perceived systemic weaknesses in oversight or internal controls associated with disaster relief programs. The task force found that these people often work in groups."

Many Fraud Complaints Not Investigated. Newhouse News Service (9/16, Reilly) reports, "The Gulf Coast was still drying out last September when federal officials promised aggressive action against fraud stemming from Hurricane Katrina. A year later, complaints of disaster aid abuse are pouring in to one key watchdog entity -- the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's inspector general's office -- but only a small fraction have resulted in investigations, government figures show. … By the end of last month, the inspector general had received more than 11,000 such complaints for fiscal 2006, which ends Sept. 30, according to statistics provided by the office. Of those, 999, or about 9 percent, have been pursued, the numbers indicate." Newhouse continues, "Asked why such a low proportion of fraud allegations appear to be getting attention, spokeswoman Tamara Faulkner said via e-mail that all are reviewed, but some don't warrant further action. … Even if a complaint furnished only a little information, Faulkner said, "it would be evaluated, and a determination would be made on a case-by-case basis" whether to pursue an investigation or refer it to the Federal Emergency Management Agency or some other branch of the homeland security department. … At the same time, she said, some complaints are closed out-of-hand, because they lack 'specificity or clarity.'" Newhouse adds, "As a rule, however, the inspector general 'has to pursue those cases that have the biggest economic impact and seem the most believable,' said Clark Kent Ervin, who headed the office in 2003 and 2004, in e-mailed answers to questions. 'One can't go after every "nickel and dime" claim because there are too many of them and too few resources.' … With 490 employees, the inspector general is a major gatekeeper for complaints of fraud, waste and abuse affecting a wide range of homeland security programs, including emergency aid. Since the homeland security department's creation in 2002, the office has won praise for its hard-hitting inquiries into subjects ranging from port security spending to the training of airport screeners."

Prosecutors Urge Judge To Imprison Ryan During His Appeals Process. The AP (9/16, Robinson) reports prosecuros are arguing former Illinois Gov. George Ryan "should not remain free while appealing his racketeering conviction and should start his prison sentence as scheduled Jan. 4. … Authorities argued in court papers that decisions made by U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer during the seven-month trial of Ryan and co-defendant Larry Warner were likely to be upheld by appeals judges." Ryan "was sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison."

Bush '04 Campaign Will Give Donations From Convicted Coin Dealer To Charity. The AP (9/16) reports, "Donations that a former coin dealer funneled to President Bush's re-election campaign will be given to charity, barring further directions from authorities, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee said Friday. Tom Noe, 52, has admitted arranging a contribution scheme to fulfill his promise to generate $50,000 for a Bush-Cheney fundraiser. He was sentenced Tuesday to two years and three months in prison on three charges, including exceeding federal campaign contribution limits. … Authorities said Bush's campaign committee was unaware of the alleged contribution scheme and unknowingly submitted a false campaign report to the Federal Election Commission. The campaign already has donated $6,000 it received from Noe and his wife, Bernadette, to charity, said Aaron McLear of the Republican National Committee, which represents the inactive Bush campaign. 'Barring any further directions from authorities, Bush-Cheney '04 will also voluntarily donate the $45,400 that was the subject of this investigation to charity,' he said."

Chat Rooms Serve As ID Theft Marketplace For Hackers. The AP (9/16) reported, "On a weekday afternoon in a chat room, hackers are busy exchanging credit-card numbers, cash, hacked servers, information and stolen identities. … Welcome to the world of identity theft, a market that costs the U.S. economy $56.6 billion last year." FBI Cyber Division Supervisory Special Agent Thomas Grasso Jr. said, "Ten years ago it was a bunch of frustrated teenagers who had something to prove. Now, it's all about the money." The AP noted, The Secret Service, which was empowered by Congress to combat computer fraud, has 24 electronic crimes task forces across the country and 20 foreign offices working with local law enforcement on the issue. … Cathy Milhoan, an FBI spokeswoman, said the agency doesn't have 'teams of people' monitoring these rooms '24 hours.' She said it monitors the rooms only when it has a 'legal reason for being there.'"

Jackson, MS, Mayor Indicted Over Crime-Fighting Tactics. The New York Times (9/16, Dewan) reports, "The mayor of Jackson, Miss., was indicted on six felony charges Friday after months of criticism and warnings that his unorthodox crime-fighting tactics might put him on the wrong side of the law." The Times continues, "Among the counts now faced by the mayor, Frank Melton, are burglary, malicious mischief, illegally carrying a gun and causing a minor to commit a felony. The most serious of the charges against him carry sentences of up to 25 years, said the local district attorney, Faye Peterson. … The mayor's supporters called the charges politically motivated and said he would not resign." The Times adds, 'Some of the charges stem from a sheriff's investigation of the night of Aug. 26, when the home of Evans Welch, a man with a history of mental illness and petty crimes, was attacked by a sledgehammer-wielding group of young men without warning or permit. … Witnesses said Mr. Melton, who often patrols the city at night with the police and a group of teenage followers, had directed the demolition of the house, which he said was known as a place to buy illegal drugs. His two police bodyguards are also charged in connection with that event. … Dale Danks, Mr. Melton's lawyer, issued a statement acknowledging that damage had been done to 'the drug house' and that 'maybe better judgment could have been used.' … 'But,' the statement said, 'the charges that have been made against Mayor Melton are an extreme and excessive reaction.'"

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Judge Blocks Threatened Strike At Northwest Airlines. The New York Times (9/16, Bailey, 1.21M) reports, "A federal judge yesterday blocked a threatened strike by flight attendants at Northwest Airlines in a ruling that could strengthen the hand of struggling airlines that seek to reduce labor costs. The flight attendants said they would appeal. A prolonged labor disturbance could have forced Northwest into liquidation. Yesterday's decision, which affirms a temporary ruling last month, forces the airline's roughly 9,000 flight attendants to keep working at reduced wages and benefits, which the company says will save it $195 million a year."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Euclid, OH, Proposes New Voting Districts. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (9/16, Atassi) reports that the city of Euclid, OH, "might redraw ward boundaries while also contesting a federal lawsuit that accuses the city's existing election system of keeping black candidates out of office." The Plain Dealer continues, "Council President Ed Gudenas has drafted legislation that would give City Council the authority to propose new districts to ease a 'statistical imbalance in population' in time for the 2007 election. The legislation is listed on the agenda for Monday's council meeting." The Plain Dealer adds, "Hilary Taylor, the attorney representing the city in the Department of Justice lawsuit, said City Council might lack the authority to adopt a redistricting plan without voter approval. … Mayor Bill Cervenik said Friday his administration has been kept in the dark by council regarding redistricting. … 'Not including the administration in discussion about this is very detrimental to what we're trying to do,' Cervenik said. 'But at least this measure shows that council is willing to look at adjusting borders.' … The city has struggled to compromise with the Justice Department ever since a three-year investigation concluded that too many at-large council seats and districts that cover a large geographic area have diluted minority voting strength. … The city has never elected a black official, though more than 30 percent of its residents are black." The Plain Dealer notes, "In June, Justice Department officials proposed that the city break four wards into eight smaller districts - each with a City Council member - and eliminate all at-large seats except for council president. … Currently, five of the nine council members, including the council president, are elected citywide. … Instead of accepting the proposal, Taylor recommended city officials demand evidence collected during the investigation before agreeing to redraw districts. Less than a month later, the Justice Department filed suit against the city."

DOJ Asked To Rule On Monkey's Access To Missouri Restaurants. The Springfield (MO) News-Leader (9/16, Hocklander) reports, "A Springfield (MO) woman filed a complaint with the federal government Friday after the Springfield-Greene County Health Department declined to reverse a decision barring her from taking her monkey into businesses that serve or handle food. … 'I didn't feel I had any choice,' said Debby Rose, holding her monkey during and after a meeting with Director of Health Kevin Gipson and Assistant Director of Health Ron Boyer." The News-Leader continues, "Rose said her monkey, Richard, is a service animal that helps her cope with a debilitating anxiety disorder, which includes a racing heart, high blood pressure and panic attacks in certain situations -- particularly public activities. Richard helps relieve that and, according to the Americans With Disabilities Act, she said, he should be allowed into public food places. … Gipson maintained the health department's position that, according to its interpretation of ADA law, the monkey is a therapy animal or a pet -- not a service animal — and therefore not allowed in food establishments. According to health department research, 'a service animal by definition has to perform a physical function for that person,' Gipson said." The News-Leader adds, "Gipson said he would reverse the decision if the federal government says Rose's monkey is a service animal. He encouraged Rose to file a complaint. … Shelby Butler said the ADA's definition for service animals has expanded. Butler, who attended the meeting to advocate for Rose, is an access specialist from Southwest Center for Independent Living, a not-for-profit organization that's federally mandated to assist people with disabilities. She also helped Rose file the complaint. … Butler said it could take several months to hear back from the Justice Department's civil rights division. They filed under Title II because it covers state and local governments, she said. A government decision might be based on the information gathered, Butler said, or it could go to federal court for a judge to decide."

Missouri FBI Agents Field Tough Questions From Muslim-Americans. The Columbia (MO) Daily Tribune (9/16, Heavin) reported, "A group of local Muslims aimed loaded questions at an FBI agent last night and fired point blank. Does the FBI seek out Muslims as criminals? Is the government inventing new rules on a daily basis to entrap Muslim-Americans? What does the FBI think about Muslims in general? Thorny questions, all of which were directed at FBI Supervisory Special Agent Richard Thornton as he addressed members of the Islamic Center of Central Missouri in Columbia. Thornton and Agent Stewart McLaren visited the group in an effort to rebuild bridges between law enforcement and Muslims, bridges that might have crumbled when the FBI shut down the Islamic American Relief Agency in Columbia two years ago." The Daily Tribune added, "Thornton would not specifically answer one of the most direct questions of the evening: Does he believe Muslims are the peace-loving people they say they are? 'That's a loaded question,' he said. 'I don't think I can take 700 people from any demographic and generalize.' … But Thornton did assure the group that the FBI isn't 'out to get' Muslims."

ANTITRUST:

Hutchison Opposes House Bill On Texas Airports. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (9/16, Wethe) reports, "The latest attack on the Wright Amendment compromise, which stripped antitrust immunity from the proposed legislation this week, is a potential deal breaker, said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas. … 'We won't pass the bill in the form it came out of the Judiciary Committee,' Hutchison told reporters Friday after a lunchtime speech in Dallas. … 'We're not going to open up a can of worms. We'd have to bring the bill down. We couldn't pass it,' she said." The Star-Telegram continues, "On Wednesday, the House Judiciary Committee agreed to cut language that gave the bill protection from claims that it violates federal antitrust laws. … 'What we're trying to do of course with this bill is create a certainty about what the rules are going to be in this area,' Hutchison said. … 'We couldn't attract new airlines, which we want to do to add competition, if they knew that this interpretation would have to go through years of litigation to know what the rules are going to be.'" The Star-Telegram adds, "The committee's action was a victory for the owner of the former Legend Airlines terminal, which is slated for condemnation by Dallas. … The owner, Love Terminal Partners, said talk of tearing it down killed an imminent deal to sell the vacant six-gate terminal for $100 million. Love Terminal has since sued the five local parties that struck a compromise on Wright -- American Airlines, Southwest Airlines, Fort Worth, Dallas and Dallas/Fort Worth Airport."

The Dallas Business Journal (9/16) reports, "The legislation, which is based on a local compromise between the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines, Southwest Airlines and the D/FW Airport board, calls for lifting Wright restrictions by 2014. … In return, the city of Dallas will use eminent domain to demolish a privately owned passenger terminal at Love Field, reducing the number of gates there to 20, down from 32. That has sparked anticompetition complaints, including a lawsuit filed by the owners of the gates." The Journal continues, "Soon after the bill was introduced, an unsigned letter purportedly from the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, began circulating on Capitol Hill that raised antitrust concerns."

Dynegy Considers Power Plant Deal. The Contra Costa Times (9/16, Jurgens) reports, "Dynegy Corp., a financially troubled energy merchant affiliated with San Ramon-based Chevron Corp., plans to acquire a power plant portfolio from LS Power Group that includes about 15 percent of Northern California's electricity supply and an interest in a large Nevada coal project." The Times continues, "The proposed deal will cut Chevron's ownership interest in Dynegy from 20 percent to 12 percent but add to Chevron's stake in the coal industry, which is targeted by environmentalists concerned about rising atmospheric carbon dioxide levels that fuel global warming." The Times adds, "Dynegy will emerge from the deal with a 20,000-megawatt fleet of nonutility power plants that includes 'a new strategic position in the California market,' according to a news release. A megawatt is enough electricity for 750 houses. … 'We support this transaction as an opportunity for them to grow the company,' said Don Campbell, a Chevron spokesman." The Times notes, "Chevron, through Dynegy, would get a minority interest in 3,700 megawatts of generating capacity in Northern California, including big natural gas-fired plants in Morro Bay in San Luis Obispo County and Moss Landing in Monterey County, and a smaller oil-fueled plant in Oakland. LS Power acquired those properties in May as part of a $1.6 billion deal with Duke Energy Corp."

EU Antitrust Head Outlines Goals. The AP (9/16) reports, "EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, involved in an investigation of Microsoft Corp., said Friday that the European policy toward the software company does not differ substantially from that of the U.S." The AP continues, "Kroes spoke Friday at the Council on Foreign Relations about fostering a global competition culture. She outlined three areas of policy development: combatting cartels, punishing those who engage in unilateral antitrust behavior and encouraging private damage suits that would serve the same purpose as regulation." The AP adds, "Of Microsoft, she said, 'I'm not willing to say that there is a major difference in the way of thinking between the United States and ourselves.' … The commission is investigating Microsoft over its Vista operating system. The investigation is the latest development in a case that dates to 2004, when it hit the software company with a record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine. Microsoft was fined another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July." The AP notes, "Microsoft has said its Office 2007 software will not include a way to save data in the popular Portable Document Format and that it dropped plans to include the format after Adobe Systems Inc. asked it to charge customers for the feature. … On Friday, Kroes said the commission was engaged in a debate over policies that would foster private damage lawsuits over regulation. That would bring the European legal environment closer to that of the U.S."

E Coli Outbreak Hits Twenty States, One Woman Dead. All three networks opened their broadcasts with reports on the fatal outbreak of E. coli traced to bags of fresh spinach and each network also included an additional segment concerning the risk to consumers from E. coli and the damage such an outbreak can do to US farmers. ABC World News (9/15, lead story, 2:55, Snow) reported, "Good evening. We begin with a major concern in homes as cross the country. As the Nation's deadly E. Coli outbreak grows health officials are trying to determine how a dangerous strain of the bacteria has spread from coast to coast. Cases have now been confirmed in at least 20 states from Oregon to New York. One person, a 77-year-old woman in Wisconsin, has died. At least 94 people have gotten sick. And tonight, there are warnings for consumers and worries that more cases could be yet to come."

CBS Evening News (9/15, lead story, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "If you have any in your fridge, the FDA says get rid of it. … The FDA's unusual warning 'that consumers should not eat bagged fresh spinach at this time' had consumers cleaning out refrigerators and grocers across America scrambling to remove spinach from the stores."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Stores across the country have been clearing their shelves of it and families throwing it in the trash after the FDA warned it may be making a lot of people very sick. An urgent race to trace the origins of a deadly form of E. Coli that seems to be spreading unchecked." Dr. David Acheson, FDA Food Safety director: "It is an unpleasant kind of E. Coli. It can cause serious illness, kidney failure and death."

ABC World News (9/15, story 7, 2:25, Snow) reported, "The FDA suggestion that people stop eating bagged spinach could hit very hard here in the part of California they like to call the salad bowl of the world. 75% of fresh spinach in this country comes from California. But eight of the last 19 outbreaks of E. coli have come from vegetables grown here in the salad bowl, making 217 people sick.'

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 2, 1:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Washed and bagged produce has become a huge money maker for processors and farmers. They insist it's a more thorough cleaning than any consumer could manage in their own kitchen. Federal inspectors right now are going through fields here in the Salinas valley looking for contamination."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 2, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The FDA is saying you have to play it safe. Whether it is bagged, fresh or even frozen spinach, after August 1st, play it safe and consider it possibly contaminated and throw it out."

The New York Times (9/16, Preston, Davey, 1.21M) reports, "federal health authorities identified an organic produce company here in California as a possible source of some of the tainted spinach. … The company, Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, announced a voluntary nationwide recall of its Earthbound brands of prepackaged spinach and salad mixes as well as prepackaged spinach it processes for numerous other companies, including Dole." The FDA's Dr. David Acheson "said at a news conference that the F.D.A. did not have definitive evidence that Natural Selection Foods was to blame for the outbreak of illness. But people who have been sickened apparently ate its spinach, Dr. Acheson said."

The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Rosenwald, Mui, 748K) reports FDA officials "warned consumers not to eat packaged spinach, and last night it extended the warning to packaged salad products that contain spinach, as well as spinach at restaurant salad bars. The strain of Escherichia coli that is making people sick is particularly virulent."

BP Mistake Seen As Cause Of Fatal Texas Refinery Explosion. The Financial Times (9/16, Mcnulty) reports, "BP mistakenly told state regulators in a 2003 application for an emissions permit that it had installed the updated equipment which investigators said would have prevented last year's fatal explosion at its Texas City refinery, the Financial Times has learned. In the application, a copy of which has been seen by the FT, BP said: 'Relief valves are routed to a flare; therefore, 100 per cent control credit is applied.' A flare is a closed tank in which liquid emissions are received and the vapour burned off. But BP only applied to replace the outdated blowdown stack on the refinery's ISOM unit with a flare after the refinery exploded, killing 15 and injuring an estimated 500. … 'The fatal explosion would not have occurred if the ISOM unit had a properly sized and designed flare system,' said Daniel Horowitz of the US Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, an independent federal agency that investigates industrial chemical accidents."

US Will Appeal Ruling On Forest Fee. The Arizona Daily Star (9/16, Davis) reports, "The federal government has given notice that it will appeal a magistrate's ruling that could lead to elimination of $5 daily user fees in popular recreation areas, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix." The Star continues, "People now pay the user fees to hike or picnic on Mount Lemmon, in Sabino and Madera canyons, and in other sites in Arizona and around the West. … U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton's notice, filed Thursday, said the government will appeal U.S. Magistrate Charles Pyle's Sept. 5 ruling dismissing two $30 tickets the Forest Service issued to Tucsonan Chris Wallace." The Star adds, "Wallace was cited twice in September 2005 on Mount Lemmon for parking her car to hike in the Marshall Gulch area and near the General Hitchcock Campground without paying the fee. … Pyle's ruling said the Forest Service lacks authority to impose such a fee for trail use. … The user fee system requires anyone who drives up Mount Lemmon to pay $5 per day or $20 for an annual pass, if they park at hiking trails or picnic areas or anywhere else within a prescribed area on the mountain. That area includes all national forest along the Mount Lemmon Highway. .. . They do not have to pay if they drive up and down the mountain without stopping, or stop at campgrounds that have separate fees charged by concessionaires. They also don't pay if they stop at private cabins, Summerhaven businesses, scenic overlooks or vista points. … The appeal will be pursued in U.S. District Court. The Justice Department has 30 days from Thursday to file a legal brief on the case."

California Judge To Rule On Emissions Suit. The Fresno Bee (9/16, Ellis) reports, "State officials on Friday asked a federal judge to throw out a lawsuit by the automobile industry challenging new state emissions standards that would be the toughest in the nation." The Bee continues, "After hearing more than two hours of arguments, U.S. District Court Judge Anthony W. Ishii said he would issue his ruling later. … If he rules against the state, the closely watched case is likely to go to trial in January — and its outcome would have national implications." The Bee adds, "Already, 10 states have adopted California's new emissions standards, and nine states in the Pacific Northwest and northeast, as well as New York City, have filed briefs on the state's behalf in the case. … The new state regulations, scheduled to take effect with the 2009 model year, would set tailpipe emission standards for greenhouse gases, which many scientists believe are contributing to global warming. .. The regulations are expected to cut exhaust emissions in cars and light trucks by 25% and in larger trucks and sport utility vehicles by 18%. The operation of vehicle engines creates greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide."

US Sued To Halt Sale Of Toy Jewelry Containing Lead. The AP (9/16, Chea) reports, "Environmentalists sued the federal government Thursday to stop the sale of toy jewelry made with lead, citing dangers it can pose to brain development in children." The AP continues, "The San Francisco-based Sierra Club wants the Environmental Protection Agency to find ways to stop the sale or production of toy necklaces, bracelets and rings containing lead. … 'I don't think parents realize that these pieces of jewelry have the potential to be harmful,' said Jessica Frohman, head of a Sierra Club committee on toxic substances. Children can be exposed to dangerous levels of lead if they suck on or swallow the jewelry, she said." The AP adds, "The attorneys general in California and Illinois sent letters to the EPA supporting the Sierra Club complaint. … The EPA would not comment directly on the lawsuit, which was filed in federal court in San Francisco. But spokesman Mark Merchant said the agency has a 'comprehensive set of regulations' to protect children from lead. It does not, however, have specific regulations for toy jewelry containing lead, he said. … Inexpensive toy jewelry made with lead or painted with lead paint is sold across the United States in vending machines and in stores that sell mainly to immigrant communities."

EPA CFO Proposed Closing Labs And Laying-Off Scientists Due To Budget Constraints. McClatchy (9/16, Goldstein), in an article titled, "EPA Plans To Close Labs, Drop Scientists And Reduce Oversight," reports that th EPA "intends to close labs, cut its cadre of upper-level scientists and reduce regulatory oversight, according to an internal agency document. In a memo dated June 8, a top agency official outlined 'a set of proposed disinvestments, innovations, efficiencies and consolidations' for the upcoming 2008 fiscal budget. 'The decisions we make will be critical, difficult and will have long-term consequences,' EPA Chief Financial Officer Lyons Gray wrote. He said the EPA wanted to limit duplication and find 'opportunities for consolidation and streamlining.'" Jeff Ruch, the executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, "a watchdog group that obtained the memo, said that rather than consolidating to improve the agency, the EPA was 'chopping up the furniture to meet external budget targets.'" McClatchy notes, "The EPA's budget has been dropping steadily since it reached a record $8.13 billion in fiscal 2003. The Bush administration's proposed fiscal 2007 budget was nearly $1 billion lower, but Congress hasn't yet approved a final version."

Fairfax County Releases Detailed Report On Bird Flu Preparations. The Washington Post (9/16, B1, Rein, 748K) reports, "A severe outbreak of bird flu would infect nearly a third of Fairfax County's population, killing almost 700 people and sending thousands to local hospitals, according to a new report. The 112-page primer on how the Washington area's largest local government would respond to a pandemic that many researchers think is inevitable depicts a grim scene of sick or at-risk people in widespread isolation or quarantine, at home or in hospital beds. … Fairfax, which has posted its response plan on the county Web site, is the region's first local government to issue a comprehensive report on pandemic flu preparations, said Addo-Ayensu and other emergency management officials. Although the Bush administration has released a federal plan and committed tens of millions of dollars to anticipate a crisis, the details of how to respond are left to state and local governments."

NYTimes Regards Controversies At Interior Department As Inevitable. The New York Times (9/16, 1.21M) editorializes, "We knew that bad things would happen when President Bush filled many of his important environmental posts with right-wing activists and industry lobbyists who had spent their careers criticizing the laws they were now being told to uphold and representing industries they were now being told to regulate. Just how bad became clear this week in the course of some pointed testimony from the Interior Department's inspector general, who accused top officials at his agency of fostering a culture of 'managerial irresponsibility' that tolerated conflicts of interest, cronyism and other lapses. At a House subcommittee hearing, the official, Earl Devaney, said that 'short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior.'

DEA Training Mexican Agents To Combat Meth. The San Antonio Express-News (9/16, Martin) reports, "Mexican law enforcement agents completed a Drug Enforcement Administration program as part of a joint U.S.-Mexico effort to combat methamphetamine production in border states, officials said Friday." The Express-News continues, "The announcement that 55 Mexican agents and prosecutors completed the DEA course in Quantico, Va., comes one day after the State Department issued a travel alert for Americans in Mexico." The Express-News adds, "Training Mexican police to dismantle methamphetamine labs and prosecute offenders is 'a big step forward in our fight against meth,' said Karen Tandy, the DEA administrator. … Tandy called the program 'a historic effort to jointly combat meth production and trafficking that is devastating both nations.'" The Express-News adds, "About 80 percent of the methamphetamine consumed in the United States is manufactured in Mexican labs by criminal organizations based in both countries, according to the DEA. … A war among drug cartels over control of narcotics trafficking and distribution routes is blamed for rising lawlessness along the U.S.-Mexico border. … That war is blamed for the death of a Monterrey policeman and the killing of a state police administrator in Tamaulipas earlier this month."

Judge Denies Bail For Washington Gun Collector. The Seattle Times (9/16, Carter) reported, "A Bellevue gun collector once questioned about the slaying of a federal prosecutor will remain in custody pending trial on a charge that he illegally possessed a machine gun. U.S. Magistrate Monica Benton ruled Friday that Albert Kwok-Leung Kwan posed a flight risk and a potential threat to the community and to federal agents who would monitor him if he was freed. At a hearing before the judge's decision, Kwan's attorneys acknowledged that he repeatedly invoked his Fifth Amendment guarantee against self-incrimination during appearances before a grand jury investigating the slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Wales in October 2001." The Times noted, "Kwan is not a suspect in the killing.

IRS Investigating Antiwar Speech Given At Church In November '04. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Sahagun, 918K) reports, "Stepping up its probe of allegedly improper campaigning by churches, the Internal Revenue Service on Friday ordered a liberal Pasadena parish to turn over all the documents and e-mails it produced during the 2004 election year with references to political candidates. All Saints Episcopal Church and its rector, the Rev. Ed Bacon, have until Sept. 29 to present the sermons, newsletters and electronic communications. The IRS investigation was triggered by an antiwar sermon delivered by its former rector, the Rev. George F. Regas, at the church two days before the 2004 presidential election."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Confirms New Peace Corps Director. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/16, Averill, 398K) reports, "A Minnesotan has been confirmed as the 17th director of the Peace Corps. 'I'm elated. I'm honored to be able to serve in this way,' Ron Tschetter said after the Senate confirmed him late Wednesday. He said he expected to start the job at the end of the month. … President Bush nominated Tschetter, 64, in July to manage the Peace Corps, which he has had ties with since he was a health volunteer with his wife, Nancy, in India from 1966 to 1968. He was also a chairman of the National Peace Corps Association."

Nevada Bar Opposes Proposal To Split Ninth Circuit. The Los Angeles Times/AP (9/16) reports the State Bar of Nevada "reaffirmed its opposition to a bill by Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) to split up the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, a frequent source of anti-Bush-administration rulings. … The conservative Ensign, who had eight co-sponsors for his measure, has pressed for its approval by saying the San Francisco-based court is overloaded."

Snow's Ability To Make White House Press Corps Laugh Quantified. The Washington Examiner (9/16, DuFour, Gavin) reports, "Covering the White House is not an easy beat. … But White House spokesman Tony Snow, who has been on the job four months, might very well be out to change all of that … Yeas & Nays reviewed the press briefing and press gaggle transcripts from Snow's first four months on the job and compared them to those of Snow's predecessor, Scott McClellan, during his first four months. Under Snow, there were more than 330 percent more instances of laughter — as defined by the transcriber's insertion of '(Laughter)' in the transcript — than under McClellan."

Astronauts Finish Last Spacewalk For Atlantis Mission. The New York Times (9/16, Leary, 1.21M) reports, "A pair of astronauts completed the third and final spacewalk of their mission outside the International Space Station on Friday by freeing up a new heat-dispensing radiator and upgrading communications gear. The two, Joseph R. Tanner, a former Navy pilot, and Cmdr. Heidemarie M. Stefanyshyn-Piper of the Navy, spent 6 hours 41 minutes in space completing assorted tasks to get the station ready for further expansion as building of the research outpost resumed in earnest."

The Washington Post (9/16, A02, Kaufman, 748K) reports, "NASA officials were delighted by the work done by the Atlantis team, the first construction at the space station since the 2003 Columbia disaster. 'We have to say what a wonderful job you both did today, especially you, Joe,' Mission Control said as the astronauts returned to the station. 'It was a legendary performance.' The extra credit went to Tanner because it was his seventh, and apparently last, spacewalk. He appeared reluctant to leave space at the end of the walk and spent some time looking out before entering the air lock."

WP Encourages Congress To Tackle Entitlement Spending. The Washington Post (9/16, A20, 748K) editorializes, "There's no great mystery about how to address Medicare's financial crisis. Either you contain the rate at which the program's costs rise, or you raise more money to pay for it. The federal office that runs the health program for seniors recently announced progress of each sort. Unfortunately, Congress may undo both." It is "not going to be fixed without some hard decisions. If Democrats oppose modest changes that hit only the rich, how will they find the courage to support far-reaching reforms?"

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Up On Good News About Inflation. A new report showing low inflation in August was seen as supporting Federal Reserve Ben Bernanke's view against tightening monetary policy. But while President Bush predicted the GOP will retain control of Congress because of his record on the economy, no Administration policies were cited in relation to the latest economic news. NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 9, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "on Wall Street a tame inflation report cheered investors. The Dow was up more than 33 points [to close at 11.560.77]. The Nasdaq gained almost 7 points [to close at 2,235.59]. For this weeks trading the Dow was up almost 169 points [to close at 168.66]. The Nasdaq was up almost 70 points [to close at 69.80]."

The AP (9/16, Crutsinger) reports, "The slowdown in inflation did not help workers' average weekly earnings, which dropped by 0.5 percent in August, after adjustment for inflation, when compared with July." Meanwhile Bush said "he expected the economy's performance would persuade voters to keep Republicans in control of the House and Senate in the November congressional elections." He asserted "his tax cuts had helped the country withstand a recession, terrorist attacks and last year's hurricanes."

The New York Times (9/16, Porter, 1.21M) reports, "What a difference a few weeks make. A month ago the economy seemed to be in dire straits -- wedged in by the inflationary pressures of soaring energy prices and rising labor costs while threatened by the prospect that the weak housing market would decimate consumer spending." Yet Friday "the government reported that consumer prices rose only 0.2 percent in August, pushing annual inflation to 3.8 percent, the lowest since April. Meanwhile, retail sales rose by a respectable rate of 0.2 percent in August. And in September, consumers' confidence about the future increased sharply." A drop in gas prices was seen as the primary motivation.

Bloomberg (9/16) reports, "The numbers were 'not as favorable as some would like, but they showed the CPI numbers down, and that's good news,' Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig told an audience of bankers in Copper Mountain, Colorado. 'How we balance those will be, I think, an important part of the discussion that goes forward.'"

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Whitehouse, 2.03M) notes, "The main factor holding the core down: A seasonal adjustment that shaved one-tenth of a percentage point off the August increase in owners' equivalent rent, a proxy for the cost of housing that makes up almost a third of the index." Labor Department economist Patrick Jackman "said the adjustment was an anomaly that had little to do with the underlying trend in rents, which have played the leading role in pushing up core inflation over the last several months. 'While that had a dramatic impact on the actual number, as far as trends are concerned I certainly wouldn't make a big deal out of it,' he said."

Bloomberg (9/16, Baker) notes, "About seven stocks rose for every five that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 2.19 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, the most since June 30." The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Hennessy-Fiske, 918K) in an article titled "Inflation Data Bode Well For Economy" and the Financial Times (9/16, Pimlott) report similar details.

Stock Rally Escapes Media Attention. The New York Times (9/16, Bajaj, 1.21M) in an article titled "Wall St.'s Inconspicuous Rally Continues" reports, "With little fanfare -- and with very few days of sharp upswings -- stocks have been on one of their best runs so far this year." They "have been buoyed by a significant decline in energy prices and a growing belief that the Federal Reserve will not raise interest rates again this year — an argument that won over more believers yesterday after a report on August consumer prices showed that inflation slowed."

Oil Prices Lower For Week Despite Uptick. The AP (9/16) reports, "Oil prices edged higher Friday but finished lower for the week after OPEC lowered its oil-demand forecast for the rest of the year." And experts "said there has been a definite shift in energy-market psychology, as traders focus on the relatively comfortable balance between supply and demand as opposed to hypothetical supply threats."

Ford Announces 10,000 More Layoffs, Offers Buyouts To All Hourly Workers. ABC World News (9/15, story 5, 2:50, Snow) reported, "Major economic news today, details of the sweeping plan to overhaul the legendary automaker Ford Motor Company. It is a catalog of pain. Massive job reductions, plant shutdowns, even the elimination of Ford stock dividend, yet there are questions tonight about whether Ford must do even more."

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 3, 2:05, Mason, 7.66M) reported, "And Ford's union contracts are a big part of the problem. A Ford worker earns on average nearly $65 an hour. In contrast, Toyota pays its American workers just already $45 an hour." Jean Jennings, editor in chief, Automobile Magazine: "They can't afford the contracts, can't afford the benefits, can't afford what they're paying their retirees, can't afford to do what they're doing. So there has to be another play." Mason: "These cuts ultimately won't just affect Ford workers, they'll affect other business where they live and finally, Katie, ripple through the entire economy."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 5, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) added, "Ford will shift its folk to us more fuel efficient cars and crossover vehicles promising in two years 70% of its lineup will be new or upgraded. While this town and its workers grapple with no Ford in their future."

Bloomberg (9/16, Koenig, Lippert) reports Ford Motor Co., "increasingly desperate to stem billion-dollar losses, accelerated job cuts and plant closings and projected that its North American auto business would remain unprofitable until at least 2009." Ford "said it will shed an additional 10,000 salaried jobs, finish cutting 30,000 North American factory jobs by 2008, four years sooner than planned, and offer buyouts to all hourly workers. Ford suspended its quarterly dividend for the first time since 1982. The shares posted their biggest drop in almost four years in their highest trading volume ever. … The 10,000 salaried job cuts come in addition to 4,000 posts eliminated before March 31. The combined totals mean Ford is slashing almost 40 percent of its salaried workforce -- from car designers to financial analysts to secretaries -- in North America."

The Financial Times (9/16, Simon, Atkins) reports Bill Ford, executive chairman, "said he was less concerned about the possibility of Toyota overtaking Ford in North America than the importance 'for this plan to be based on what I consider to be conservative assumptions'. He said his family, which owns about 4 per cent of the equity and controls 40 per cent of the votes, had no plans to take the carmaker private."

The AP (9/16, Krisher) reports, "Wall Street seemed unimpressed. Ford's shares slumped nearly 12 percent amid disappointment that the automaker didn't do more to address rising health and pension costs, falling market share and intense competition from Asian manufacturers whose models have enthralled buyers looking for gas-sipping cars and trucks."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, McCracken, Power, White, 2.03M) reports, "Ford's financial outlook is particularly dire. It once promised to return its core North American auto business to profitability by 2008. Now it doesn't expect to do so before 2009. Ford will burn through an astonishing $8.5 billion in cash this year. It began the year with $25.1 billion and will end the year with about $20 billion, a figure augmented by $3.4 billion Ford has taken out of a fund in which employers set aside money for retiree health-care costs."

UAW Not Fighting Ford Cuts. The Washington Times (9/16, Lengell, 88K) reports, "after taking a highly aggressive approach for decades, the UAW is transforming into a less combative, more cooperative organization that may be willing to work closer with U.S. automakers than perhaps at any other time in its history, analysts say. 'I think the UAW has finally wakened up to the fact that the whole thing is likely to disappear if they don't start to cooperate a little bit,' said John Wolkonowicz, an analyst with Global Insight, an automotive research and consulting firm." Ford's plan, "hammered out with cooperation from the union, was praised by UAW officials -- even though it would reduce Ford's North American work force by almost a third. 'Once again, our members are stepping up to make hard choices under difficult circumstances,' UAW President Ron Gettelfinger said."

All Three US Automakers Suffering. The New York Times (9/16, Maynard, 1.21M) reports, "Despite insisting all this year that they had solutions to their financial struggles well in hand, both the Ford Motor Company and the Chrysler Group conceded Friday that the steps they had taken were not working and that more bad news was coming in one of the deepest auto industry crises in Detroit's history. … At the same time, the Chrysler Group, also pummeled by the decline in sales of big sport utility vehicles and pickup trucks, said it would report a loss for this summer of $1.5 billion, more than double what it had originally anticipated."

Bush Recalls Positive Impact Of Richards On Texas Politics. The Dallas Morning News (9/16, Gillman, 500K) reports, "Bush reminisced Friday about the governor he ousted a dozen years ago, calling Democrat Ann Richards a tough opponent and saying he would miss her." Bush said, "She made a positive impact on the state of Texas. One thing's for certain -- she empowered a lot of people to want to participate in the political process that might not have felt that they were welcome in the process." While Bush will be at the UN Monday, former Commerce Secretary Don Evans "will represent him at the service, at which Sen. Hillary Clinton, former housing secretary Henry Cisneros and former Dallas mayor Ron Kirk will speak."

Richards Battle With Alcoholism Recounted. The New York Times' Maura Casey (9/16) writes that former Gov. Ann Richards "will be remembered for her wit, her one-liners and especially for the keynote speech at the 1988 Democratic Convention. … But her political career eclipsed what Ms. Richards called 'one of the great, great stories' of her life: her recovery from alcoholism and her nearly 26 years of sobriety. That triumph deserves to be more than a line in her obituary. … What made Ms. Richards different was her decision to be forthright about the fact that she was a recovering alcoholic. She didn't hide it."

Bush To Travel To California To Raise Funds For Pombo And Doolittle. Rachel Gordon, on the San Francisco Chronicle's "Politics" blog (9/16) writes, "President Bush plans to travel to Stockton next month to raise money for" Rep. Richard Pombo, "a close White House ally." President Bush "also plans to attend a fundraiser for Rep. John Doolittle…during a trip similar to one taken by Vice President Dick Cheney to the Republican House districts before the June primary.

Both Pombo And Doolittle Have Been Tied To Abramoff Scandal. The AP (9/16, Werner) reports, "The Doolittle event, which his campaign hopes will raise as much as $500,000, will be Bush's first appearance on behalf of Doolittle. The congressman's friendships with former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and convicted GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff have provided fodder for Doolittle's Democratic opponent, Charlie Brown. Doolittle accepted campaign cash from Abramoff and Abramoff clients, while interceding on their behalf. His wife also performed fundraising work for Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January in a conspiracy to corrupt public officials."

The Tracy Press (9/16, Upton) reports, "Local fundraisers by Vice President Dick Cheney, Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert and House Majority Leader John Boehner have helped Pombo raise more than $2.5 million this election cycle. The money has helped Pombo fend off an expensive, frenzied attack by primary opponent Pete McCloskey, Democratic candidate Jerry McNerney and a range of activist groups, including MoveOn.org, Defenders of Wildlife and the Sierra Club, in the race for the 11th Congressional District. Pombo has been targeted for his close ties to convicted felon and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and indicted former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay."

Pombo's Opponent Said To Have "Outside Shot" At Winning. The Stockton Record (9/16, Shaw) reports Pombo "is locked in a spirited campaign for the 11th District against Pleasanton wind energy consultant Jerry McNerney, who lost handily to Pombo in 2004. McNerney has come back stronger this time, and many political observers give him an outside shot at unseating Pombo - if there is a Democratic wave this fall." McNerney's spokesman, Rob Caughlan, "says Bush's arrival shows Pombo is concerned."

Mehlman Reportedly Expects GOP To Sustain Losses, But Maintain Control Of Congress. McClatchy (9/16, Thomma) reports "many" Republicans "believe for the first time in months that they've turned a corner and could limit feared midterm losses enough to retain control of Congress. The reasons for their guarded optimism include a new poll showing that voters again give an edge to the Republicans on national security, another showing concerns about the seeming lack of a clear Democratic alternative agenda, an impressive get-out-the-vote effort in a Rhode Island Republican primary, and relief over dropping gasoline prices." McClatchy notes Democrats "dismiss the notion of a Republican rebound." RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman "all but echoed one internal White House prediction that his party will lose only two to three Senate seats and eight to 12 House seats. That would still leave Republicans in control of Congress. Democrats need to gain 15 House seats and six Senate seats to capture both chambers. Mehlman and other Republican operatives argued that they 'won' the first full week after Labor Day, the date when more voters historically start tuning in to politics and candidates and parties ramp up their campaigns, particularly with advertising.

Columnist Predicts GOP Will Target Pelosi. Howard Fineman in a Newsweek (9/16, 3.12M) web exclusive reports, "The Republican message for this fall's election season turns Franklin Roosevelt's famous statement on its head: fear is good, or at least it's a strategy. They want the electorate to be afraid, very afraid -- of the terrorists, of course, but also of" House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. Fineman adds, "Democratic operatives have been warning Rep. Nancy Pelosi for months that she needs to prepare for what Karl Rove and the GOP have in store: an all out, coast-to-coast assault."

Mfume Concedes, Say Cardin Has His "Full Support." The Washington Times (9/16, Ward, 88K) reports former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume "officially conceded Maryland's Democratic primary for the U.S. Senate, but it was not clear whether he planned to campaign for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin in the general election contest against" Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele. "'Ben and I gave this race our best,' said Mr. Mfume. … 'However, there can only be one nominee from our party, and he is it. 'He is a great public servant and I have absolutely no doubt that he is going to make a terrific United States senator. He has my full support,' Mr. Mfume said. Mr. Cardin spoke with Mr. Mfume on the phone minutes before a Democratic rally in Annapolis, an Mfume spokesman said. 'This was a very positive, hard campaign,' Mr. Cardin said after the rally. 'Kweisi and I continue our friendship. ... I'm proud to have his support.' Mr. Cardin said that he expects Mr. Mfume to campaign with him."

Kean Leading Menendez Despite Three-To-One Fundraising Disadvantage. The New York Times (9/16, Chen, 1.21M) reports, "As they did with the current President Bush in 2000, Democrats say" New Jersey state Senator Thomas Kean "in his first run for statewide office, lacks the résumé for Washington. But suddenly the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, and several other election handicappers, have moved New Jersey — which last elected a Republican senator in 1972 — into the toss-up column, complicating Democrats' plans to keep a supposedly safe Senate seat." Despite Sen. Robert Menendez's "three-to-one fund-raising edge, Mr. Kean has capitalized on sky-high name recognition to pass the incumbent in several recent public opinion polls by as much as 5 percentage points. Party leaders are increasingly focused on the race: Karl Rove, the White House political guru, is scheduled to sponsor a fund-raising lunch for Mr. Kean on Monday at 21 Club in Manhattan, and Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, is sponsoring a breakfast on his behalf on Wednesday in Washington."

Kean Has Distanced Himself From Bush. Newsweek (9/16, Gerlach, 3.12M) reports, "Kean's camp has been trying to paint Menendez as the product of a broken New Jersey political system, rocked by scandal over the last decade. At the same time, Kean is trying to cut an independent path for himself—away from the GOP. He's been sharply critical of mistakes in Iraq and several of the president's positions. Menendez, however, says Kean is simply pandering in an election year and points to the fact that Laura Bush, former president George H.W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney have all stumped for Kean."

Challenger In MD4 Files Suit Over Voting Irregularities. The Washington Post (9/16, B1, Wiggins, Rich, Harris, 748K) reports, "Congressional candidate Donna Edwards announced plans yesterday to file a lawsuit over apparent voting irregularities in Tuesday's primary election in Prince George's County. … 'The integrity of the election is at stake,' said Edwards, who ran against Rep. Albert R. Wynn in the 4th District Democratic primary and is waiting for the race to be decided when provisional ballots are counted next week in Montgomery and Prince George's counties. Jonathan S. Shurberg, a lawyer working with Edwards, said they will ask a judge to take possession of voting machine memory cards in two, possibly three, precincts in Chillum. The request will be made either in Prince George's Circuit Court in Upper Marlboro or U.S. District Court in Greenbelt over the next several days. Edwards said her legal complaint will focus on the security of voting machines that contained voting cards and were not delivered to the county Board of Elections until late Wednesday."

Democrats Choose Replacement Candidate In OH3. The AP (9/16, Hannah) reports, "A former assistant federal prosecutor easily won a Democratic special primary Friday to face U.S. Rep. Mike Turner in November. Richard Chema had 73 percent, or 5,758 votes, compared with former Waynesville Mayor Charles Sanders who had 27 percent, or 2,105 votes, in Ohio's 3rd District, according to unofficial results. The special primary was required to replace Stephanie Studebaker, who dropped out of the race Aug. 15 when she and her husband were charged with domestic violence after police answered calls about a fight at their home."

Google Founders' For-Profit Philanthropy Noted. The New York Times John Tierney (9/16) writes, "Compassionate conservatism has been an expensive bust in Washington. But an intriguing alternative is emerging around the country: compassionate capitalism. … Google's young founders are already taking on poverty, disease and global warming, and they're not just dispensing cash. They've set up their philanthropy as a for-profit organization."

Cuts In Higher Education Subsidies Said To Endanger US Economic Dominance. The New York Times (9/16, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes, "By subsidizing public universities to keep tuition low, and providing federal tuition aid to poor and working-class students, this country vaulted tens of millions of people into the middle class while building the best-educated work force in the world. Those farsighted policies, however, are a thing of the past. Cuts in college aid and soaring tuition at state colleges have made it difficult for young people to educate themselves at a time when a college degree has become the basic price of admission to both the middle class and the global economy."

Battle Brews Over Iran As Feared Replay Of Iraq. McClatchy Newspapers (9/15, Strobel, Walcott) reports that "a high-stakes struggle is brewing within the Bush administration and in Congress over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program and involvement in terrorism." Unnamed officials "say Bush political appointees and hard-liners on Capitol Hill have tried recently to portray Iran's nuclear program as more advanced than it is and to exaggerate Tehran's role in Hezbollah's attack on Israel in mid-July." They add that the offices of Vice President Cheney and Secretary Rumsfeld may be receiving "questionable information" from Iranian exiles. Some express unease because "Rumsfeld's office earlier this year set up a new Iranian directorate, reported to be under the leadership of neoconservatives who played a role in planning the Iraq war." Abram Shulsky is cited as the head of that new directorate. However, "'There's no question that people [analysts] are less afraid to speak up after what happened in Iraq,' said one intelligence official. 'There's less of an inclination to let Cheney and Rumsfeld run free.'"

EU Negotiator "Upbeat" On Iran Nuclear Deal. The New York Times (9/16, Bilesky, 1.21M) reports, "The European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, offered Friday his most upbeat assessment to date on the nuclear impasse, insisting that talks to persuade Iran to suspend uranium enrichment were progressing," and a senior Bush administration official said "Mr. Solana would meet with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, in New York on Sunday." While "European Union officials said they were still examining an offer by Iran last weekend temporarily to suspend its nuclear enrichment program in return for the beginning of negotiations over a package of economic and political incentives offered by the West," it "is softening its previous position that Iran must suspend enrichment before any negotiations can begin." Additionally, "Mr. Solana played down the threat of sanctions, saying that Washington was still willing to give diplomacy a chance," and "the United States acknowledged Thursday that it faced resistance from crucial allies over its attempt to press for sanctions." However, President Bush "said Friday he was worried Iran was trying to drag out the process with the United States and its European allies," and Solana "cautioned that the window for negotiations would not stay open indefinitely."

The Financial Times (9/16, Dombey) adds that Solana "raised expectations of a deal over Iran's nuclear programme when he said that talks were proceeding better than ever," However, "EU diplomats say they can only agree a deal if they are sure that Mr Larijani's initiative is fully backed by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei." The EU "is now watering down its insistence that Iran act first.," and "are trying to nail down exactly what Iran means when it refers to suspending uranium enrichment and to win reassurances that Washington would also sign up to a possible deal."

The AP (9/16, Ames) notes that Solana did not confirm "that Larijani had suggested his country was ready to consider an enrichment freeze for up to two months."

Bush To Take "Hard Line" On Iran At UN. The AFP (9/16, Knox) reports, "US President George W. Bush said he would push his hard line on Iran next week at the United Nations," and "warned US partners not to take pressure off Tehran." Also, "Asked whether he would consider meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on the UN sidelines, Bush replied sternly: 'No, I'm not going to meet with him.'"

State Department Report On Religious Freedom Criticizes Iran, Says Vietnam Made Progress. The AP (9/16, Schweid) reports that the State Department "said in its annual report to Congress on religious freedom around the world" that "A 'threatening atmosphere' in Iran is causing a deterioration in already restricted religious freedom for nearly all minorities." Iran, Burma, China, Eritrea, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Vietnam "were cited for particularly severe violations of religious freedom." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "We hope this report will serve as a source of encouragement for those whose plight is documented in this report." Still, John V. Hanford III, U.S. ambassador at large for international religious freedom, "credited Vietnam with making 'enormous progress' on religious freedom, and said in Saudi Arabia 'we see things moving in the right direction.'" However, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom "said it was 'simply shocked' by what it called an unwarranted softening of the State Department's assessment of Saudi Arabia."

The AFP (9/16, Milikin) leads, "The United States assailed Iran for its worsening treatment of religious minorities." Secretary Rice "said the government's goal was broader than targeting a handful of repressive regimes. 'Religious freedom is deeply rooted in our principles and our history as a nation,' she said. 'And it is now integral to our efforts to combat terrorism and the ideology of hatred that fuels it.'" Also, "Hanford strongly indicated that Vietnam could be dropped from the black list." The Washington Times (9/16, Sands, 88K) also covers this story.

Bush Urges Intervention In Sudan. The Washington Post/AP (9/16, A12) reports, "President Bush suggested Friday that it may be time to override the objections of the Sudanese government in order to send international peacekeepers into Darfur," saying. "There's genocide taking place in Sudan. … Now is the time for the U.N. to act." He said that besides waiting for Sudan's initiation, "there are other alternatives, like passing a U.N. resolution saying we're coming in with a U.N. force in order to save lives." The AP (9/16, Knox) notes Bush said, "I'm frustrated with the United Nations in regards to Darfur."

The AP (9/16, Loven) adds that a "Security Council resolution passed in August, aimed at strengthening the peacekeeping force, would hand it over to a better-funded, larger and more well-equipped U.N. mission," and :nations including the United States have worked — without success — to acquire" the consent of the Sudanese government for it. However Assistant State Department Secretary Kristen Silverberg "said the United States insisted that last month's resolution permit deployment of new peacekeepers over Sudanese objection." Also, during the United Nations General Assembly session that begins next week, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will gather diplomats from several countries to discuss Darfur."

Blair Echoes Bush's Comments. Additionally, the AFP (9/16) notes, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticised the Sudanese government over the 'completely unacceptable' situation in Darfur and accused it of breaking ceasefire agreements signed with rebels." He also "insisted that the crisis was 'at the top' of his agenda." Blair said. "I have already talked to (Chinese) Premier Wen and President George Bush about Darfur in the last few days." These "comments echo those by Bush Friday that he was 'frustrated' with the UN."

Annan Urges World To Help With Darfur. Secretary-general of the United Nations, Kofi Annan, writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/16, 918K), "The glimmer of hope that many of us felt when the Darfur peace agreement was signed four months ago -- albeit by only two of the warring parties -- is being extinguished by renewed fighting among the factions," and now "the Sudanese government has sent thousands of troops to Darfur and renewed its bombing. I strongly condemn this escalation." The government of Sudan refuses to let the UN deploy a peacekeeping force. Annan says he has attempted to convince them to do so, but "my voice is not enough. Whoever, in Africa or beyond, is in a position to influence the government of Sudan must do so without delay." If Sudan fails its "sacred responsibility" of to protecting its population "from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity," it "will face opprobrium and disgrace throughout the world."

Women In Darfur Said To Risk Rape To Survive. The Washington Post (9/16, A12, Timberg, 748K) reports that Sudan's government "and a rebel group reached a cease-fire agreement in May, but since then, rapes in and around camps for people displaced by the fighting have surged, aid groups and residents say." Now, "More and more often, women in Darfur face the starkest of choices: risk being raped by leaving the camps in search of firewood and grass, or starve."

Israeli Foreign Minister Warns Lebanon To Disarm Hezbollah. The Washington Post (9/16, A16, Kessler, 748K) reports that Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said yesterday that "The Lebanese government must fully implement a recent U.N. resolution requiring the disarming of the militant Shiite group Hezbollah or Israel will be less reluctant to attack the Lebanese state if Hezbollah resumes hostilities." She noted "Israel's efforts to keep the military campaign limited made it more difficult to achieve its objectives," adding that "if Israel is attacked again, 'we are not looking again to find these terrorists among the civilian population.'" Instead, "We are going to face a state which does not implement its responsibility or maybe does not exercise its sovereignty." The AP (9/16, Schweid) adds that Livni said, "Enforcing the arms embargo is crucial."

Lebanon-Syria Boarder Remains Porous. The New York Times (9/16, Smith, 1.21M) reports, "Israel wants the expanded United Nations peacekeeping force, already deploying along Lebanon's southern border with Israel, to monitor the Syrian border as well as to keep weapons out. But Syria says it would consider that a 'hostile act' and the Lebanese in this region warn that any foreign presence would face stiff resistance." While "Lebanon has put more than 8,000 soldiers along the border to monitor traffic,…few people here believe the Lebanese Army is capable of stopping the arms flow." Meanwhile, "Local residents say it would be a simple matter requiring only the barest collusion of either side for a tractor or truck to haul weapons from one side to the other."

Criticism Of Israeli Army Over Lebanon Continues. The AFP (9/16) reports, "the Israeli army is in disarray as it struggles to cope with the failures of the war in Lebanon," and "nothing has halted the flood of criticism against the military and political leadership over their handling of a deadly conflict that failed to achieve its main aims." While General Udi Adam resigned, it "has done little to quell discontent amid calls for further heads to roll calls such as for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Halutz and Defence Minister Amir Peretz to go."

Palestinian Officer Killed As Leaders "Squabble" Over Unity Government. The New York Times (9/16, Erlanger, 1.21M) reports that "senior Palestinian intelligence officer," Brig. Gen. Jad Tayeh, "and four others were shot to death in their car in Gaza on Friday as political leaders continued to squabble over a possible new national unity government." Their "Progress appeared to be slow," although Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas "said that Fatah and Hamas had agreed on a political platform for a new government that he expected to meet international requirements sufficiently to restore funding." However, "The United States and some members of the European Union have expressed doubts." The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Ellingwood, 918K) also covers this story.

Pope Benedict Under Fire In Middle East. NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 8, 2:00, Miller, 9.87M) reported that in the wake of controversial remarks from Pope Benedict XVI, "It looked like a clash of civilizations across the Islamic World. An effigy of Pope Benedict XVI burned turn by Muslims in India. Pakistan's parliament condemned the Pope's remarks. Lebanon's top cleric demanded a personal apology." The calls came after Benedict delivered "a lecture Tuesday on the need for dialogue on the concept of jihad or holy war which Benedict called unreasonable and against God's nature."

ABC World News (9/15, story 4, 0:20, Snow) reported, "Muslims are furious about the Pope the speech gave they are calling anti-Islamic. He quoted a 14th century Byzantine Christian Emperor who said the prophet Muhammad ordered Islam be spread through violence. Pakistan's parliament demanded a retraction. Turkey's government compared the Pope to Hitler."

"First Full-Blown Crisis" Of Benedict's Papacy. The New York Times (9/16, Fisher, 1.21M) reports, "Reaction to the pope's remarks — in which he quoted a description of Islam in the 14th century as 'evil and inhuman' — has presented Benedict with the first full-blown crisis of his papacy."

The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Shadid, 748K) reports that reaction to the speech "was a reminder of the precarious, suspicious state of affairs between a West that often views Islam as a faith in need of reform and a Muslim world that feels besieged in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks." The Post adds, "[T]he reaction was quick, and though it was largely peaceful, it evoked the storm of violent protests that erupted in most Muslim countries after a Danish newspaper published a series of cartoons a year ago that lampooned Muhammad. In some ways, the denunciations seemed even more pronounced, given the pope's stature and authority over the world's 1.1 billion Roman Catholics."

The AP (9/16, Harvey) reports, "Across the Islamic world Friday, Benedict's remarks on Islam and jihad in a speech in Germany unleashed a torrent of rage that many fear could burst into violent protests like those that followed publication of caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad." The Washington Times/AP (9/16, Harvey) and Financial Times (9/16) also report on the stor y.

NYTimes Notes Differing Definitions Of "Jihad." The New York Times (9/16, 1.21M) editorializes, "Muslim leaders the world over have demanded apologies and threatened to recall their ambassadors from the Vatican, warning that the pope's words dangerously reinforce a false and biased view of Islam. For many Muslims, holy war — jihad — is a spiritual struggle, and not a call to violence. And they denounce its perversion by extremists, who use jihad to justify murder and terrorism. The Vatican issued a statement saying that Benedict meant no offense and in fact desired dialogue. But this is not the first time the pope has fomented discord between Christians and Muslims."

Raul Castro Pushes Nonaligned Nations Against US. All three networks covered the summit in Cuba, describing the gathering as anti-US or anti-Bush. Castro's health remains an issue and there was no new details but at the end of its story NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 4, 2:25, Mitchell, 9.87M) noted, "Most people including top government officials say it is unlikely Fidel Castro will fully resume the reins of power. The transition to a new group of leader system well underway."

ABC World News (9/15, story 3, 2:10, Snow) reported, "To Cuba where Fidel Castro's Government took over the leadership of the so-called nonaligned Nations the organization, taking regularly takes anti-American stances and today was no exception." ABC (Avila) added, "America's short list of antagonists -- Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, Iran's Mamoud Ahmadinajad, and Bolivia's Evo Morales -- all bashing the United States for opposing Iran's nuclear program, all together in Cuba, capital of anti-Americanism. … Cuba's venom was delivered by Castro's young brother, 75-year- old Raul."

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "At the top of tonight's news briefing, a who's who of President Bush's adversaries on the world stage all together in one place. Venezuela's Hugo Chavez and Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad are among the leaders in Havana for the non-aligned nations. Raul Castro is playing host. His older brother is still recovering from intestinal surgery."

The New York Times (9/16, Lacey, 1.21M) reports, "Raúl Castro, who is standing in as Cuba's leader while his brother, Fidel, recuperates from surgery, railed at the United States during a summit meeting in Havana of nonaligned nations on Friday." This "first public speech since taking power in July was just as stridently anti-Washington as those offered by his elder brother." Meanwhile, "In Miami…the Bush administration's top Cuban-American official, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, delivered his own rebuke to Cuba's government" as he "called on Cuba to hold a referendum on its future leadership, a proposal that the Communist government would surely dismiss." The AP (9/16, Gresko) also noted Gutierrez's proposal.

The Financial Times (9/16, Frank) adds, "Cuba…and its close ally Venezuela sought to steer the group towards more a more radical anti-US line," but "Many observers…believe it will be impossible to link the movement, formed in 1961 by developing countries anxious to define themselves as independent equally of the Soviet Union and of the US, to such a radical geopolitical agenda." Still, "Delegations from the Non-Aligned Movement on Friday began negotiations over a final document sharply critical of Israel and supportive of Iran's nuclear ambitions." The AFP (9/16, Moser) writes that "Raul Castro, and Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez, also delivered blistering condemnations of the United States." The Washington Times/AP (9/16, Arrington) adds, "Raul unleashed a stream of anti-American rhetoric in his inaugural speech, saying the world today is shaped by the United States' 'irrational pretensions for world dominance.'" The AP (9/16, Snow) also covers this story.

Indian PM Urges "Conciliatory Tone" For NAM. The AFP (9/16, Langan) reports, "Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has urged Non-Aligned Movement leaders to take a conciliatory tone as they work to counter terrorism, and try to keep the Mideast peace process on track." He also "argued that 'as a group we have rejected extremes. We must spread the word of Gandhiji, the apostle of peace.'"

Cubans Find Fleeing Cuba More Difficult. NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 6, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We are back now from Cuba with 'NBC Nightly News' 'In Depth.' the Cubans who are willing to risk their lives to leave here and start a new life north of here in the United States. It is just 90 miles from here to Florida and under America's immigration policy a Cuban who makes it to American soil can stay in America. In recent years the business of smuggling Cubans has gotten more expensive and more dangerous as we see tonight from Mark Potter." NBC (Potter) added, "No longer are they just getting on rafts and homemade boats, now organized crime rings used high powered speedboats to sneak into Cuba and bring them to the US they are usually paid by Cuban exile families. The price is up to $10,000 meaning one small boat like this with 25 migrants aboard can bring the smuggler's up to a quarter million dollars. They often cut on safety to maximize profits. … Federal prosecutors are charging some with manslaughter, the same tactic used in mafia and drug cases."

IMF, World Bank Meetings Tense. The New York Times (9/16, Weisman, 1.21M) reports, "The world's finance ministers gathered Friday for their first annual meeting in East Asia since the region was gripped by an economic crisis in the 1990's, with their most urgent order of business being to overhaul the institutions that safeguard the global economy and help the poor" at "what appeared likely to be one of the most contentious" annual meetings of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. There was "tension between Western leaders and the government of Singapore, their host, over Singapore's last-minute denial of visas to some of the leaders of the 'civil society' groups that were invited to participate in the meetings." While "the government relented at the last minute" on most of the visa, "Paul D. Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, was especially embarrassed by the visa problem because he has repeatedly called on developing countries to open their political processes to dissent." While he "and others sounded a note of optimism about the world economy by saluting the records of Singapore and other Asian countries in recent decades," Wolfowitz "stirred a furor inside the World Bank with proposals to crack down on corruption in bank lending." Still, "the main issue of contention is a proposal backed by the Bush administration to change the governance of the International Monetary Fund to give more votes to China and three other developing countries, and to give dozens of other countries more votes in a restructuring over the next two years." Bush "administration officials say plainly they cannot afford to have another debacle involving another global economic institution" following "the failure of the recent round of global trade talks."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Phillips, 2.03M) adds," At a series of meetings here this weekend, top financial officials from the Group of Seven major industrial nations are expected to press for new IMF rules that would make it easier for the global economic watchdog to brand a country for manipulating its exchange rate -- and, in theory, embarrass it into stopping."

US, Europe React To China's Economic Power With WTO Case, Possible Free Trade Zone. The Financial Times (9/16, Beniot) reports, "Spurred by concern about China's growing economic might, Germany is considering a plan for a free-trade zone between Europe and the US. A senior aide to Angela Merkel said the chancellor was 'interested' in promoting the idea as long as such a zone did not create 'a fortress' but rather 'a tool' to encourage free trade globally." This "testifies to the rapprochement between Washington and Berlin since Ms Merkel's election last November." Also, "As German perceptions of China have grown more American, Washington's approach has shifted too. Speaking before his first trip to Beijing, Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, this week outlined a more balanced policy mixing traditional US criticism with praise for China's reforms." Still, "the US, Canada and the European Union complained to the World Trade Organisation about China's tariffs on car parts, raising the prospect of Beijing facing its first WTO dispute. The three said they had lost patience with Beijing's refusal to further open the $19bn-a-year market."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, A2, Miller, Hitt, 2.03M) adds, "Teaming up with Europe and Canada, the Bush administration moved to turn up pressure on Beijing to end tariffs that critics say put foreign-made auto parts at a competitive disadvantage in China's domestic market." This "raised stakes significantly in the long-simmering dispute over auto parts" and "reflects a tougher U.S. trade stance toward

China, and comes a few days before Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson arrives in China." U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said, "While we are open to settling this dispute, China's current stance leaves us no choice but to proceed with our WTO case." McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Hall) also covers the auto parts complaint.

China To Announce Nuclear Plant Construction Company. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Oster, 2.03M) reports, "China will announce by year end which company has won a contract potentially worth $8 billion to build four nuclear-power plants," according to Assistant Secretary of Energy Karen Harbert. Still, "Industry observers had expected a decision on the contract as early as December 2005. But Chinese officials have said they needed more assurances about what they describe as untried technologies."

Technology Helping Free Discourse In China. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Magnier, 918K) reports, "The growing appreciation among young Chinese for unfettered news — and their ability to convey their opinions rapidly across cyberspace — is a key reason why Beijing will ultimately lose the information war, analysts say, even if it wins some near-term battles." However, "analysts say the change appears to be as much a New China News Agency profit grab as a state bid to control information." Meanwhile, "the European Union and the State Department weighed in against Beijing's new plan, which gives the state-run New China News Agency censorship authority and exclusive distribution rights over foreign wire service competitors."

India's Richest Man Calls For US To Open Markets. The New York Times (9/16, Rai, 1.21M) publishes an interview with Azim H. Premji, chairman of Wipro, India's third-largest outsourcing firm, and India's richest man. He says, "The debate in the United States" over outsourcing "is significantly more balanced. But what is not getting adequate focus is that globalization is a two-way street. If the United States wants access to Chinese, Indian or Vietnamese markets, we must get access to theirs. U.S. protectionism is very subtle but it is very much there."

WHO Endorses DDT To Fight Mosquitoes Carrying Malaria. The New York Times (9/16, Dugger, 1.21M) reports, "The World Health Organization on Friday forcefully endorsed wider use of the insecticide DDT across Africa to exterminate and repel the mosquitoes that cause malaria. The disease kills more than a million people a year, 800,000 of them young children in Africa. Dr. Arata Kochi, who leads the group's global malaria program, unequivocally declared at a news conference on Friday that DDT was the most effective insecticide against malaria and that it posed no health risk when sprayed in small amounts on the inner walls of people's homes. Expanding its use is essential to reviving the flagging international campaign to control the disease, he said." The Washington Times (9/16, Carter, 88K) writes that Who "reversed 30 years of policy" with the decision.

Annan To Release Details On Personal Finances. The New York Times (9/16, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "Secretary General Kofi Annan reversed course on Friday and said he would file a new financial disclosure form. Although completing the form is not mandatory in his case, his top aides considered it advisable to avoid misunderstanding." His "earlier decision not to supply the form emerged Wednesday in a news conference and exposed him to criticism that he was not living up to the standards of openness that he was demanding of others in the organization."

Koizumi Said Be One Of "Most Influential Leaders" For Post War Japan. The McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Johnson) reports that Japan's Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is being cast by "commentators…as one of the most influential leaders in Japan's postwar history." He "changed Japan in ways that could be long lasting, but Shinzo Abe, the likely new prime minister, will face pressures to ease off some of the reforms." Also, "Japan's newly steady economic course may slow momentum on reform, and some experts say the Koizumi era could be an intermission in politics-as-usual." Still, "Koizumi's departure will be felt in Washington. The Japanese leader bucked his nation's decades-old pacifist tradition and stretched long-unused military muscle by deploying troops to Iraq in 2004," and "shared an unusually strong bond with President Bush."

Holocaust Doubting Party Showing Gains In Germany. The Washington Times (9/16, Crossland, 88K) reports that in Germany, the National Democratic Party (NPD) "a far-right party that shares Iranian President Mahmud Ahmadinejad's doubts about the Holocaust and wants to deport foreigners," as well as opposing immigration, "is expected to make strong gains in elections in an eastern German state tomorrow." Its supporters have "little awareness or guilt about the Holocaust…because Germany's Nazi past wasn't addressed under the communist regime in the east." Other parties charge "that NPD backers intimidate opponents and disrupt campaign events."

Sweden Expected To See Close Elections. The New York Times (9/16, Lyall, 1.21M) reports, "Sweden holds its most closely contested national election in years" on Sunday. "The Social Democratic Party, with its policies of high taxes, big government and generous benefits, has run the country, alone or in coalitions with other parties, for 65 of the past 74 years," but the opposition's Fredrik Reinfeldt "has found the government's Achilles' heel in the issue of unemployment, arguing with some success that the government's rosy figures hide a much darker reality." His proposed response is "to cut unemployment benefits, decrease payroll taxes for low-income workers and provide tax breaks to businesses that hire the chronically unemployed." However, the "Social Democrats are portraying him, essentially, as a traditional conservative hiding behind a falsely mild facade."

UN Officials Support Migration Forum Despite US Opposition. The AP (9/16, Gamel) reports, "Top officials from dozens of countries supported a U.N. initiative to create a new global forum on migration on Friday," as "U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan…proposed a Global Forum on Migration and Development as an informal, non-binding way for countries to debate the issue and come up with solutions." However, "U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey said the United States is committed to confronting the challenges of migration but prefers to do so via existing forums and agreements with neighboring countries," adding that the U.S. believes, "that creation of additional structures will hinder, not help, international cooperation on these issues."

Latvian President Now Running For UN Secretary-General. The AP (9/16, Lederer) reports, "Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga joined the race to become the next U.N. secretary-general on Friday, becoming the first woman vying for the U.N.'s top post," but she "faces an uphill struggle because most members states generally agree that the next secretary-general should come from Asia, part of a tradition to rotate the job between regions." Notably, "China — a veto-wielding council member — has repeatedly said it wants an Asian candidate." Still, "U.S. Ambassador John Bolton…argued that the job should go to the best qualified candidate regardless of nationality."

Clinton Global Initiative To Verify Pledges. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, McGinley, 2.03M) reports, "On Wednesday, more than 1,000 people will gather in New York at the second annual Clinton Global Initiative, a project led by former President Clinton, to tackle problems involving global health, poverty, religious strife and threats to the environment." Most attendees "must pledge to fund and carry out an initiative to help address one of the problems." However, "a few participants at last year's fest 'pledged' to carry out programs that already were under way," and "not all participants followed through on their commitments." Therefore, this year "CGI's 10-person 'commitments team' has been working with participants to develop pledges for this year's conference," and "those who don't follow through on their pledges won't be invited back."

Cohen Says Britain's Brown Faces Dilemma On Iraq War Position. Roger Cohen writes in his column in the New York Times (9/16, 1.21M), "Britain's 'stable and orderly transition,' the Labour Party's favored phrase, has turned into the 'Tony and Gordon Show,' a TV soap opera mixing farce and venom and featuring two middle-aged men who've used a decade of intimacy at the pinnacle of power to rehearse the finer points of mutual loathing." Now that PM Tony Blair announced he will resign within a year, Brown faces a "central conundrum." He might "outmaneuver his Labour Party rivals and get Blair's job," and even "tone down his impatience, suffer fools more easily, and inject a touch of humanity into his zombie-Presbyterian image." However, "what does he do about marking his distance from Bush and Iraq, moves that seem critical to his chances in the next election?" while "if he doesn't turn Britain into a more critical ally, and doesn't demonstrate that he's not in the pocket of the most unpopular politician here (Bush), he's in deep trouble," but should he be "too critical of the United States, he will be branded a left-winger" and "appear to move closer to the European Union, a direction he dislikes." Although "the answer would appear to be constructive criticism of Bush," Conservative leader David Cameron "has already staked out that position."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Says G.O.P. Rebels Are Putting Nation At Risk (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

DOJ_NMG_0064170

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — President Bush made an impassioned defense on Friday of his proposed rules for the interrogation and prosecution of terrorism suspects, warning that the nation's ability to defend itself would be undermined if rebellious Republicans in the Senate did not come around to his position.

Speaking at a late-morning news conference in the Rose Garden, Mr. Bush said he would have no choice but to end a C.I.A. program for the interrogation of high-level terrorism suspects if Congress passed an alternate set of rules supported by a group of Senate Republicans.

Those alternate rules were adopted Thursday by the Senate Armed Services Committee in defiance of Mr. Bush. Setting out what he suggested could be dire consequences if that bill became law, Mr. Bush said intelligence officers — he referred to them repeatedly as "professionals" — would no longer be willing and able to conduct interrogations out of concern that the vague standard for acceptable techniques could leave them vulnerable to legal action.

"Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that Al Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," he said. "But the practical matter is if our professionals don't have clear standards in the law, the program is not going to go forward."

The administration has said the Central Intelligence Agency has no "high value" terrorism suspects in foreign detention centers, having transferred the last of them this month to military custody at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. But officials said they considered the program crucial to efforts to foil attacks.

"This enemy has struck us, and they want to strike us again," Mr. Bush said, "and we'll give our folks the tools necessary to protect the country. It's a debate that, that really is going to define whether or not we can protect ourselves."

It was also a debate Mr. Bush had hoped to have this week exclusively with Democrats as he and his party's leadership set out to draw unflattering distinctions between Republicans and Democrats on fighting terrorism for the fall elections.

Instead, Mr. Bush spent Friday in a second day of heavy debate, casting some of the most respected voices on military matters in his own party as hindering the fight against terrorism. As of late Friday there seemed to be no break in the impasse, even as White House officials worked behind the scenes to build new support in the Senate for the legislation the president wants.

Leading the efforts against him in the Senate are three key Republicans on the Armed Services Committee with their own military credentials: the chairman and a former secretary of the Navy, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia; Senator John McCain of Arizona, a prisoner of war in Vietnam; and Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a military judge. And publicly taking their side is Mr. Bush's former secretary of state, Colin L. Powell.

The dispute centers on whether to pass legislation reinterpreting a provision of the Geneva Conventions known as Common Article 3 that bars "outrages upon personal dignity"; the Supreme Court ruled that the provision applies to terrorism suspects. Mr. Bush argued that the convention's language was too vague and is proposing legislation to clarify the provisions. "What does that mean, 'outrages upon human dignity'?" he said at one point.

Mr. McCain and his allies on the committee say reinterpreting the Geneva Conventions would open the door to rogue governments to interpret them as they see fit.

In a statement late Friday, Mr. McCain stuck to his position, saying that his proposed rules included legal protections for interrogators. "Weakening the Geneva protections is not only unnecessary, but would set an example to other countries, with less respect for basic human rights, that they could issue their own legislative reinterpretations," he said.

Mr. Bush rejected the crux of Mr. McCain's argument when a reporter asked him how he would react if nations like Iran or North Korea "roughed up" American soldiers under the guise of their own interpretations of Common Article 3.

"You can give a hypothetical about North Korea or any other country," Mr. Bush said, casting the question as steeped in moral relativism. "The point is that the program is not going to go forward if our professionals do not have clarity in the law."

He also discounted an argument made in a letter from Mr. Powell that his plan would encourage the world to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

Asked about that analysis, Mr. Bush said, "If there's any comparison between the compassion and decency of the American people and the terrorist tactics of extremists, it's flawed logic."

Mr. Bush was alternately combative and comedic during the hourlong session with reporters. At one point, in describing how he thought the economy and Republican tax policies would help his party in November, he said: "I've always felt the economy is a determinate issue, if not the determinate issue in campaigns. We've had a little history of that in our family, you might remember."

It was an off-hand reference to his father's losing presidential re-election campaign in 1992, when he was damaged by economic woes and the breaking of his "read my lips" vow not to raise taxes.

Mr. Bush said it was "urban myth" that his administration had lost focus on capturing Osama bin Laden. The president said he was frustrated by the United Nations at times, especially when it came to addressing genocide in Darfur.

Asked about a Senate report concluding that there was no working relationship between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda in Iraq, Mr. Bush said forcefully, "I never said there was an operational relationship."

The questioner had included a reference to Mr. Bush's Aug. 21 news conference at which he had said, "Imagine a world in which you had Saddam Hussein who had the capacity to make a weapon of mass destruction, who was paying suiciders to kill innocent life, who would — who had relations with Zarqawi," referring to the Qaeda mastermind in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Democrats for the most part on Friday were content to allow Republicans to fight among themselves on the terrorism question.

"When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

But Republicans boasted that their top issue, terrorism, was dominating the political news for yet another day and overtaking Democratic criticisms of the war in Iraq.

GOP Infighting On Detainees Intensifies (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

President Bush warned defiant Republican senators yesterday that he will close down a CIA interrogation program that he credited with thwarting terrorist attacks if they pass a proposal regulating detention of enemy combatants, escalating a politically charged battle that has exposed divisions within his party.

An irritated Bush, raising his voice and gesturing sharply at a Rose Garden news conference, excoriated legislation passed by a Senate panel Thursday that is intended to conform U.S. detainee practices with the Geneva Conventions. Bush insisted on legislation more specifically defining what is banned so intelligence officers would not worry about being charged with war crimes.

"The professionals will not step up unless there's clarity in the law," Bush said. "So Congress has got a decision to make: Do you want the program to go forward or not? I strongly recommend that this program go forward in order for us to be able to protect America."

The president's threat to end the interrogation program seemed to make little impression on the Republican dissidents who have balked at his interpretation of the Geneva Conventions. Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), two of four Republicans who voted against Bush's position on Thursday, again rejected his logic after the news conference, and a fifth Republican senator, Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), joined the rebellion against the president.

"Weakening the Geneva protections is not only unnecessary, but would set an example to other countries, with less respect for basic human rights, that they could issue their own legislative 'reinterpretations,' " McCain said in a written statement. "This puts our military personnel and others directly at risk in this and future wars."

The dispute over how the United States conducts its ongoing battle with international terrorists dominated a question-and-answer session with the president that touched on a variety of high-profile issues 53 days before the midterm elections. Bush lashed out at the United Nations for not moving more aggressively to stop genocide in Darfur, rejected what he called the "urban myth" that his administration has lost focus on finding Osama bin Laden, and acknowledged that spiraling violence in Iraq has frustrated his hopes to begin bringing U.S. troops home this year.

At a time when Bush hoped to be drawing distinctions with Democrats, though, he spent most of the conference arguing with fellow Republicans. As Congress tries to wrap up business to go home and campaign, Bush is pressing for legislation endorsing his leadership against terrorism, including warrantless surveillance of overseas telephone calls, military commissions to try enemy combatants and expansive rules permitting tough interrogations.

The most explosive debate centers on how the Geneva Conventions should apply to U.S. intelligence officers, who captured, held and questioned terrorism suspects in secret overseas CIA prisons for years until the last 14 detainees were transferred recently into military custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that U.S. detainees fall under the Geneva Conventions, which require that wartime captives be "treated humanely" and ban "outrages upon personal dignity." Bush wants legislation interpreting the conventions as barring "cruel, inhuman or degrading" treatment, adopting language from a McCain-sponsored law on prisoners signed last year. The broader "personal dignity" phrases, he argues, are so vague that they leave interrogators open to prosecution for a wide variety of techniques.

McCain, Graham and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) have rejected the Bush approach as too narrow and as an invitation to other countries, including Iran, Syria and North Korea, to reinterpret the Geneva rules as they see fit if they ever hold U.S. soldiers. "What is being billed as 'clarifying' our treaty obligations will be seen as 'withdrawing' from the treaty obligations," Graham said. "It will set precedent which could come back to haunt us."

Another dispute centers on trials for terrorism suspects, who in the Bush proposal could under some circumstances be barred from the proceedings and not allowed to view classified evidence against them. The Republican legislation, passed by Warner's committee 15 to 9 on Thursday, would make it more difficult to introduce secret evidence.

Joining McCain and the other Republicans this week was former secretary of state Colin L. Powell, who wrote in a letter that reinterpreting the Geneva Conventions would encourage other countries to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

Bush bristled at the criticism from his former top diplomat yesterday, calling it "flawed logic" and accusing Powell of equating U.S. tactics with those of terrorists, even though Powell's letter made no such comparison. "It's unacceptable to think that there's any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children," Bush said.

He likewise rejected the argument that nations such as Iran and North Korea would cite U.S. precedent in reinterpreting Geneva rules. "If the nations such as those you named adopted the standards within the Detainee Detention Act," Bush said, meaning the model for his preferred legislation, "the world would be better."

Asked twice if he would veto the McCain-backed bill, Bush avoided answering directly but repeated 11 times in the course of an hour that intelligence officials would not "go forward" with their interrogation program. "Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that al-Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," he said.

In a nod to the harsh campaign rhetoric flying around Washington, Bush disavowed a statement by House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who suggested this week that Democrats care more about protecting terrorists than protecting Americans. "I wouldn't have exactly put it that way," Bush said. "But I do believe there's a difference of attitude."

Democrats, who have largely sat on the sidelines as Bush and Republicans battled this week, seized on the president's remarks yesterday. "Instead of picking fights with Colin Powell, John McCain and other military experts, President Bush should change course, do what the American people expect and finally give them the real security they deserve," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.).

Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) called for a Judiciary Committee investigation into whether military judge advocates general were pressured into writing a letter this week saying they "do not object" to two sensitive parts of the administration's legislation.

Officials who attended the meeting in question, in the office of Pentagon general counsel William J. Haynes II on Wednesday, said there was no pressure on the military lawyers to produce the letter, describing a robust discussion about how to word its contents. The lawyers initially drafted a letter saying they "support" the two sections but later settled on saying they "do not object" to them.

"None of us would have signed anything if we had not believed it and absolutely agreed with it," Col. Ronald M. Reed, counsel to the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, said yesterday. "The discussion was nothing out of the ordinary."

But late yesterday, Maj. Gen. Scott C. Black, the Army's judge advocate general, sent a new letter to McCain and other senators, saying "further redefinition" of the conventions "is unnecessary and could be seen as a weakening of our treaty obligations, rather than a reinforcement of the standards of treatment."

Bush Threatens To Shut CIA Interrogation Program (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Warning that terrorists "are coming again," President Bush said Friday that he'd shut down a secret CIA interrogation program if lawmakers refused to give interrogators wide latitude in dealing with detainees.

"It's a dangerous world," Bush said as he prodded Congress to follow his lead in dealing with suspected terrorists. "I wish I could tell the American people, `Don't worry about it, they're not coming again.' But they are coming again."

The president's use of fear to pressure lawmakers came a day after a Republican-led Senate committee defied the White House and approved legislation that would prohibit abusive treatment of detainees. The bill, which the Senate Armed Services Committee endorsed 15-9, also would revise Bush's rules of evidence for trials of suspected terrorists.

The House of Representatives appears headed toward approving the president's approach, but the Senate is likely to oppose him. That may leave the issue unresolved before November's congressional elections.

Bush cast the dispute as a choice between protecting the nation or leaving it vulnerable to another terrorist attack. His critics, including many retired military officers and former Secretary of State Colin Powell, say his approach violates American values, undermines the moral foundation of the war on terrorism and increases the risk that U.S. prisoners of war will be abused.

Both sides say they want to clarify the CIA's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, a series of international agreements that govern the treatment of wartime prisoners. Bush's critics say his approach essentially would jettison the agreement.

"What is being billed as `clarifying' our treaty obligations will be seen as withdrawing from the treaty obligations," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a member of the Armed Services Committee. "It will set precedent which could come back to haunt us."

The president bristled when he was asked about Powell's comment Thursday that "the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

"That's flawed - flawed logic," he said. "It's unacceptable to think that there's any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children to achieve an objective."

The Pentagon has banned abusive interrogations in military detention centers, but the CIA, until recently, had more latitude in its efforts to pry information from terrorist suspects. The techniques the agency used are classified, but they reportedly include simulated drowning, temperature extremes and sleep deprivation.

Bush suspended the CIA interrogation program and emptied the agency's secret prisons after the Supreme Court ruled in June that the detainees are covered by the basic protections that the Geneva Conventions provide. The protections, spelled out in a provision known as Common Article 3, prohibit "outrages upon personal dignity" as well as "humiliating and degrading treatment."

The president said he would shut down the CIA interrogation program permanently if Congress didn't pass legislation that gave the agency latitude in dealing with suspects and protected its interrogators from possible prosecution for war crimes.

"This program has saved innocent lives,'" he said. "The intelligence community must be able to tell me that the bill Congress sends to my desk will allow this vital program to continue."

When he was asked how he'd react if captive Americans were subjected to the same treatment as the CIA's prisoners, Bush replied that "the world would be better" if other countries observed his treatment standards.

Turning to Iraq, the president acknowledged that deploying more Iraqi security forces hasn't led to reducing the number of U.S. troops in the country, the stated goal of his Iraq strategy. In fact, the number of American troops in Iraq has increased in recent months, from 135,000 to 147,000.

"The enemy is changing tactics, and we're adapting," Bush said.

Looking ahead to his trip to the United Nations General Assembly next week, the president criticized the U.N. and said he wouldn't meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad there. He chided the U.N. for failing to respond to violence in Sudan's Darfur region.

On another topic, Bush said he was "just speculating" when he told a group of conservative journalists earlier this week that America might be in the midst of a "Third Awakening" of religious devotion.

Religious historians refer to a wave of Christian fervor in the American colonies in the mid-1700s as the First Great Awakening. The Second Great Awakening refers to a similar wave in the early 1800s.

The president said his musings about a third religious wave were inspired by his experience and a book on Abraham Lincoln that he read recently.

"It seems like to me that something is happening in the religious life of America," he said. "I'm able to see a lot of people, and from my perspective, people are coming to say, `I'm praying for you.'"

Bush Fights GOP Revolt Over Terror Bill (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, September 16, 2006

President Bush fought back Friday against a Republican revolt in the Senate over tough anti-terror legislation and rejected warnings that the United States had lost the high moral ground to adversaries. "It's flawed logic," he snapped.

Bush urged lawmakers to quickly approve legislation authorizing military tribunals and harsh interrogations of terror suspects in order to shield U.S. personnel from being prosecuted for war crimes under the Geneva Conventions, which set international standards for the treatment of prisoners of war.

Tough interrogations have been instrumental in preventing attacks against the United States, Bush said. "Time's running out" for the legislation, he warned, with Congress set to adjourn in a few weeks.

The president called a Rose Garden news conference to confront a Republican rebellion led by Sens. John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Susan Collins of Maine.

To the administration's dismay, Colin Powell, Bush's former secretary of state, has joined with the lawmakers. Powell said Bush's plan to redefine the Geneva Conventions would cause the world "to doubt the moral basis" of the fight against terror and "put our own troops at risk."

Seven weeks before the November elections, the dispute left Republicans fighting among themselves — rather than with Democrats — about national security issues that have been a winning theme for the GOP in past elections.

Responding to Bush, McCain rejected the president's assertion that an alternative bill approved by the Senate Armed Services Committee dealing with the trial and interrogation of terror suspects would require the closure of the CIA's detainee program.

McCain said the measure would protect agents from criminal and civil liability and, by not reinterpreting the meaning of the Geneva Conventions, uphold the nation's obligations.

"To do any less risks our reputation, our moral standing and the lives of those Americans who risk everything to defend our country," the senator said.

Democrats were eager to point out the GOP disarray.

"When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "These military men are telling the president that in the war on terror you need to be both strong and smart, and it is about time he heeded their admonitions."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said, "Instead of picking fights with Colin Powell, John McCain and other military experts, President Bush should change course, do what the American people expect, and finally give them the real security they deserve."

Warner, a former Navy secretary, is chairman of the Armed Services Committee. McCain is a former Navy pilot who spent more than five years in enemy captivity during the Vietnam War. Graham is a former Air Force Reserve judge. Powell, a retired general, is a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

On another major national security issue, Bush said he was disappointed that the number of U.S. troops in Iraq was climbing rather than falling. He said hopes for troop withdrawals were dashed by a spike in violence in Baghdad, where in just the past two days more than 130 people were killed in attacks or tortured and dumped in rivers and on city streets.

"Look, we all want the troops to come home as quickly as possible," the president said. Polls show the war is unpopular among Americans, and Republicans worry it could cost them votes. He said he would base troop levels on the recommendations of his top commanders, Gen. William Casey and John Abizaid, and said he had great confidence in both men.

Bush took vehement exception when asked about Powell's assertion that the world might doubt the moral basis of the fight against terror if lawmakers went along with the administration's proposal to come up with a U.S. interpretation of the Geneva Convention's ban on "outrages upon personal dignity."

"If there's any comparison between the compassion and decency of the American people and the terrorist tactics of extremists, it's flawed logic," Bush said. "It's just — I simply can't accept that."

Growing animated, he said, "It's unacceptable to think that there's any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children to achieve an objective."

Bush said the Geneva Convention's ban was "very vague" and required clarification. "What does that mean, 'outrages upon human dignity?' That's a statement that is wide open to interpretation."

He said that unless Congress acts, the CIA will end its program of tough interrogation methods that the administration says has prevented attacks.

"So Congress has got a decision to make," Bush said. "You want the program to go forward or not? I strongly recommend that this program go forward in order for us to be able to protect America."

On another anti-terror matter, with Osama bin Laden still at large five years after the 9/11 attacks, Bush said he could not send thousands of troops into Pakistan to search without an invitation from the government. "Pakistan's a sovereign nation," Bush said.

At the same time, Bush expressed frustration that the United Nations had not sent peacekeepers to stop the misery in the Darfur region of Sudan. "What you'll hear is, well, the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act. Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a resolution saying, we're coming in with a U.N. force, in order to save lives."

On other issues, Bush said:

_He will not meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad next week while both are at the United Nations. The U.S. won't sit down with Iranians until they suspend nuclear enrichment, he said.

_He would not have gone as far as House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio that Democrats "are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people." "I wouldn't exactly put it that way," Bush said. But he said that "there's a difference in attitude" between Republicans and Democrats.

Bush Says Congress Must Pass Clear Law On Detainees (Update6) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 16, 2006

By Catherine Dodge and James Rowley

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said CIA intelligence-gathering that has already thwarted al-Qaeda attacks on the U.S. would stop unless Congress passes his proposed rules for the treatment of suspected terrorists.

``Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that al-Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," Bush said in an hour-long news conference at the White House.

Bush raised the ante in the face of a rebellion by members of his own Republican Party on Capitol Hill. Four Republicans yesterday joined Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee to approve legislation that would give more legal protection to suspected terrorists than the administration wants.

Bush sidestepped a question on whether he would veto legislation that didn't match his proposal, saying he is confident Congress will send him a ``good bill." Bush's former secretary of state, Colin Powell, endorsed the Senate panel's approach, warning that the administration is risking the safety of U.S. troops and worldwide opinion by permitting harsh treatment of detainees and redefining what is allowed under the Geneva Conventions.

Powell, also a former chairman of the military's Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a Sept. 13 letter to Republican Senator John McCain that ``the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

`Flawed Logic'

Asked today about Powell's suggestion the U.S. is following a flawed strategy, Bush said: ``If there's any comparison between the compassion and decency of the American people and the terrorist tactics of extremists, it's flawed logic."

The legislation is needed to restart war-crimes tribunals Bush set up at the U.S. Navy Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Supreme Court invalidated those tribunals in June, ruling that they fail to incorporate the 1949 Geneva Conventions on the treatment of war prisoners.

Bush said those treaty standards are ``vague" and the U.S. has learned valuable information from detainees. ``I'm asking Congress to pass a clear law with clear guidelines," he said. ``If Congress passes a law that does not clarify the rules, the program is not going forward."

Gonzales Comments

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters that the Supreme Court decision created ``confusion and concern" about Central Intelligence Agency interrogation techniques. On Sept. 6, Bush announced that all 14 ``high-value" detainees at CIA-operated prisons had been transferred to Guantanamo Bay.

While ``there is no one currently in CIA custody," the attorney general said, ``We're going to capture additional high-value detainees" and ``we will need to get information from them."

Four of the 13 Republicans on the Senate panel joined all 11 Democrats to approve their version of the measure, rejecting Bush's proposal to bar defendants from seeing classified evidence prosecutors may want to use in court. The committee acted just hours after the president made an unusual visit to Capitol Hill yesterday to urge support for his proposals on domestic eavesdropping and military tribunals.

In addition to McCain, a former Vietnam War prisoner and torture victim, Republican Senators John Warner of Virginia, the panel's chairman; Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a former Air Force lawyer, and Susan Collins of Maine sided with the Democrats. Senator Olympia Snowe, also a Maine Republican, announced today she would support the bipartisan measure. Republicans John Sununu of New Hampshire and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania have also voiced support.

Treaty Obligations

Graham, in a statement, took issue with the president's characterization of the legislation. ``What is being billed as `clarifying' our treaty obligations will be seen as `withdrawing' from the treaty obligations," he said. ``The Senate legislation, for the first time, clearly defines what would be criminal conduct by the CIA in the war on terror."

``When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is," said Senator Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, in a statement.

After the committee vote, McCain accused CIA Director Michael Hayden of asking to be ``immunized not from liability but from criticism."

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said Hayden was trying to protect CIA employees.

CIA Interrogations

DOJ_NMG_0064177

Lieutenant General Patrick Hughes, the former head of intelligence at the Homeland Security Department, said the committee's measure was ``implicitly limiting" of CIA interrogations.

``Surely no one believes we can use a 1940's set of rules -- absent any change -- to govern our actions now," Hughes said.

Steven Fleischmann, a former official at the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, said the U.S. should be more concerned about the perception of abuse adding to the difficulties of fighting the war on terror.

``Fear on the other side can be a useful tool in getting people to cooperate, but anger on the other side helps them recruit," he said. The debate over detainee treatment ``seems feckless and likely to catch mid-level personnel in the middle of a domestic political struggle."

Senate Republican Whip Mitch McConnell, who supports Bush's measure, promised that ``a floor debate will highlight important bright-line issues." In a Senate speech today, McConnell said ``only one side of the argument has been prevalent in the last day or do." House leaders plan a vote next week on legislation that closely tracks Bush's proposal.

The intra-party squabble has disrupted Republican plans to highlight their differences with Democrats over national security before the Nov. 7 elections. All 435 seats in the House of Representatives are up for grabs, as are 33 of 100 Senate seats. To overturn the Republican majorities, Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate.

Bush: Interrogation Vital (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

President Bush yesterday warned Congress that failure to pass his proposal for interrogating and trying suspected terrorists will kill a vital program that has prevented attacks on the United States, but he expressed optimism that the final legislation will follow his recommendation.

One day after four Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee joined Democrats to approve a bill that calls for broader rights for suspected terrorists than he has set out, the president said lawmakers need to act swiftly because "time's running out."

"Congress has got a decision to make: Do you want the program to go forward or not? I strongly recommend that this program go forward in order for us to be able to protect America," Mr. Bush said during a Rose Garden press conference.

"If not for this program, our intelligence community believes al Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," he said.

But Democrats yesterday reminded Mr. Bush that the senators and others leading the fight against his proposal are Republicans.

"When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat. "These military men are telling the president that in the war on terror you need to be both strong and smart, and it is about time he heeded their admonitions."

Mr. Powell, the former secretary of state and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said this week that the president's proposal would encourage the world to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism" and "put our own troops at risk."

Republican Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine also announced that she supports Mr. McCain's and Mr. Warner's proposal rather than Mr. Bush's.

The president urged the Senate to support the kind of legislation passed by the House Armed Services Committee, which would allow the administration to try terror suspects before military tribunals and use interrogation techniques the president argues have been crucial to protecting America.

He refused to speculate on whether he would veto a bill that doesn't include his proposals.

"I believe we can get a good bill," Mr. Bush said. "Hopefully, we can reconcile differences; hopefully, we can come together and find a way forward without ruining the program."

DOJ_NMG_0064178

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said Mr. Bush should bow to the "bipartisan process under way in the United States Senate."

The president's proposal seeks to clarify Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which bans "outrages upon human dignity."

"That's ... very vague. What does that mean, 'outrages upon human dignity'? That's a statement that is wide open to interpretation," he said.

Mr. Bush argued that "by clarifying Article 3 we make it stronger, we make it clearer, we make it definite."

The administration sought congressional clarification this month after the Supreme Court in June struck down the president's current setup for trying detainees held at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, a ruling the president called "flawed."

Mr. Bush said Congress must act to protect U.S. intelligence professionals who are called on to question detainees to obtain vital information. "They don't want to be tried as war criminals. ... They expect our government to give them clarity about what is right and what is wrong."

He also urged Congress to support the terrorist surveillance program, which allows the federal government to eavesdrop on international calls to and from suspected terrorists in the United States.

"Both these bills are essential to winning the war on terror. We'll work with Congress to get good bills out because we have a duty," Mr. Bush said.

On other subjects, the president:

•Again pressed for comprehensive immigration legislation, but did not say whether he would support a House bill passed Thursday that calls for construction of a 770-mile fence on the U.S.-Mexico border.

•Rejected a face-to-face meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad next week when he attends the U.N. General Assembly meeting, saying, "I have made it clear that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program."

•Predicted the Republicans will retain control of Congress. "I don't believe the Democrats are going to take over because our record on the economy is strong," he said.

•Paid tribute to Ann Richards, who died Wednesday. Of his one-time rival for Texas governor, Mr. Bush said: "Running against Ann Richards taught me a lot. She was a really, really good candidate. She was a hard worker. She ... had the capacity to be humorous and yet make a profound point. I think she made a positive impact on the state of Texas."

Bush On Defensive Over Anti-terrorism Measures (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington And Daniel Dombey In Brussels

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

In the wake of Republican rebellion over his proposals to approve interrogation techniques for terrorists and military tribunals, President George W. Bush on Friday used a Rose Garden press conference to defend his legislation and warned Congress: “Time is running out . . . Congress must act wisely and promptly.”

Mr Bush, at times testy and defensive, explained his effort to clarify the terms of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, and denied it would put at risk US soldiers who might be captured in countries such as Iran or North Korea. “I don’t think Americans want international courts determining how we protect ourselves,” he said.

The battle over the legislation has pitted the authority of the White House and House Republicans against the moral authority claimed by a group led by Senators John McCain, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, who contend that the US could see the basis of its fight against terrorism undercut by efforts to legalise controversial interrogation methods and tribunals.

The European Union on Friday added to the pressure on the White House when it denounced as “illegal” the secret CIA prison whose existence Mr Bush acknowledged last week.

“The existence of secret detention facilities where detained persons are kept in a legal vacuum is not in conformity with international humanitarian law and international criminal law,” the EU said in a formal statement at a foreign ministers’ meeting.

Mr Bush appeared to create room for negotiations with Congress when he sidestepped the chance to pledge that he would veto any bill if it matched the one passed by 15 votes to 9 in the Senate armed services committee, and said his key criterion for success was one question: “That the intelligence community must be able to tell me this bill enables this vital programme to continue.”

Michael Hayden, director of the CIA, warned this week that if the current Senate version were passed it would lead to the end of the programme of interrogations held at secret CIA prisons. The administration has defended this as a “vital tool”.

Mr Bush, capping a week in which he has put the war on terror at the centre of the Republican congressional campaign, said: “We didn’t ask for this war. This enemy has struck us and wants to strike us again. It’s a dangerous world.”

Some are concerned that the battle within the Republican party is frustrating efforts to present a unified front on the issue of the war on terror.

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, yesterday denied that the split would have any political impact on the mid-term elections. “The average American is not paying attention to committee mark-ups,” he said.

“If you look at every one of the elements of the war on terror, Democrats opposed the Patriot Act, the terrorist surveillance, voted to cut intelligence funding. When you look at the overall picture you see that Republicans are united in recognising we are at war . . . what would we see if the Democrats were in charge? We would have a much weaker effort in the war on terror.”

Behind The Debate, Controversial CIA Techniques (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

President Bush's push this week for legislation that narrowly defines U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions is motivated by his aides' conviction that the CIA must continue using a small number of highly controversial interrogation techniques on suspected terrorists, according to current and former U.S. officials. These methods include some that cause extreme discomfort and have been repudiated by other federal agencies.

The nature and legitimacy of these coercive techniques is the largely unpublicized subtext of the legislative dispute that has erupted between the administration and its opponents on Capitol Hill, including lawmakers from both parties who have said privately that they find some of the CIA's past interrogation methods abhorrent.

On the surface, Bush's proposal requires that interrogations in the previously secret CIA prison system comply with legal rules written by Congress last year. Privately, the administration has concluded that doing so would allow the CIA to keep using virtually all the interrogation methods it has employed for the past five years, the officials said.

That conclusion is based on an unpublicized memo to the CIA from the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, which named the precise interrogation methods the department believed to be sanctioned by last year's broadly written congressional requirement that no U.S. detainees "shall be subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" as those terms are defined in U.S. laws.

The officials said the CIA and the White House are convinced that retaining access to these methods is key to extracting information from captured terrorism suspects who have urgently needed information about dangerous plots.

Congressional critics of this position have some support from within the government: Neither the FBI nor the Defense Department allows the use of the CIA's harshest techniques, and last week senior Pentagon officials said they believe that more cooperative forms of interrogation produce better results than inflicting extreme discomfort.

But the CIA feels differently. A memo sent by CIA Director Michael V. Hayden to the agency's employees Thursday approvingly quoted Bush's endorsement of the CIA interrogations for "defending the homeland, attacking [al-Qaeda] . . . and saving thousands of American and allied lives." Hayden said in the memo that the clarifying language of the administration's bill would give him confidence that what he "asked an Agency officer to do under the program is lawful."

The rival Senate bill on interrogations -- approved by the Armed Services Committee on Thursday and sharply criticized by Bush yesterday -- is silent on how the CIA should comply with the Geneva Conventions. Its intent, according to several government officials, is not only to avoid sending a signal to other nations that Washington is reinterpreting its treaty obligations, but to leave in place a historic understanding of international law, which would render unlawful many of the extreme interrogation techniques the CIA has been using.

Bush and other senior officials have not discussed what those methods include, but the president described them as an "alternative set of procedures," emphasizing that they differ from those used elsewhere in the government.

At a news conference yesterday, Bush alluded to these special methods when he said the new legislation was needed to provide "intelligence professionals with the tools they need." One well-informed source said the techniques include prolonged sleep deprivation and forced standing or other stress positions. Another source said they match the techniques used by the agency in the past, but with a notable exception: The CIA no longer seeks to use a notorious technique called "waterboarding," which is meant to simulate drowning.

A senior administration official, authorized to speak with reporters about the legal issues behind the administration's strategy yesterday on the condition that he not be named, said the CIA interrogations at issue are in "the gray area on the margins -- that ill-defined boundary -- of Common Article 3." He was referring to a Geneva Conventions provision that bars cruel, humiliating and degrading treatment, as well as "outrages upon personal dignity."

There are ironies in the positions of each side in the current dispute. The administration says its intent is to define the explicit meaning of Common Article 3 so that CIA officers know exactly what they can do. But the senior official who addressed the legal issue yesterday said the standard the administration prefers is "context-sensitive," a phrase that suggests an endlessly shifting application of the rules.

The reason is that the administration's language would in effect ban only those interrogation techniques that "shock the conscience." That phrase, drawn from a judicial interpretation of the U.S. Constitution, is a "flexible" standard, the official said. Others have said that standard would allow interrogators to weigh how urgently they felt they needed to extract information against the harshness of their techniques, instead of following rigid guidelines.

The official did not try to explain how embracing such an inherently flexible standard would actually create clarity, the watchword of the administration's public campaign for its version of the bill.

Another irony lies in the fact that the congressional rules for interrogations that the Bush administration now seeks to embrace in the new legislation -- the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 -- were vigorously opposed by the White House before their adoption by Congress. Bush disliked them so much that when he signed the law Dec. 30, he appended a statement objecting to some of its provisions and explicitly reserved his right to interpret them "in a manner consistent" with his constitutional authorities as president and commander in chief.

In another twist, the principal Republican lawmakers responsible for the Detainee Treatment Act -- Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) -- said last year that they meant the law to set a minimum, humane standard of treatment for detainees held by both the Defense Department and the CIA. But they now are telling colleagues it would be a bad law for the CIA to follow in the future because its language would slight international treaty obligations.

A retired intelligence professional who said he has discussed the matter at length with colleagues said the predominant view at the agency is that McCain -- who made clear in congressional debate last year that he disapproved of what the CIA was doing -- was surprised to learn later that the Detainee Treatment Act did not put a stop to it.

His bill "did not formally disallow anything that was being done," the source said. Now, he said, McCain "is not going to let the practitioners off the hook."

Military Lawyers Caught In Middle On Tribunals (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti And Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — On Wednesday evening, the night before a crucial Senate vote on the Bush administration plan for the interrogations and trials of terrorism suspects, the Pentagon general counsel, William J. Haynes II, summoned the senior uniformed lawyers from each military service to a meeting.

The lawyers, known as judge advocates general, had been pivotal players in years of debate over detention, interrogation and prosecution.

They had repeatedly sparred behind the scenes with Mr. Haynes, the top civilian lawyer in the Defense Department. This summer, the judge advocates general emerged in public after the Supreme Court struck down a Bush administration plan to take an important role in opposing parts of a White House effort to resurrect military commissions for terrorism suspects in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

But at the meeting on Wednesday, Mr. Haynes sought to enlist the lawyers on the administration's side by asking whether any would object to signing a letter lending their support to aspects of the White House proposal over which they had voiced little concern.

The lawyers agreed, but only after hours of negotiating over specific words, so that they would not appear to be wholly endorsing the plan.

What followed was a scuffle that left at least some of the military lawyers embittered and stoked old tensions at the Pentagon between civilian leaders and uniformed military officers, who under Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld have often found themselves privately at odds.

Early Thursday morning, White House allies distributed the letter that the lawyers had signed, as evidence that the group, known as Jags, now supported the administration plan.

That prompted loud protests from Republican senators opposed to the plan. They dismissed the letter on grounds that the lawyers would have signed it only under pressure.

The truth lies somewhere in between, said one of the senior lawyers and other current and former military officials familiar with their views.

"I didn't have any problem signing what I signed,'' Maj. Gen. Charles J. Dunlap Jr., deputy judge advocate general of the Air Force, said Friday in an interview. "How people use it and what they use it for I can't control.''

General Dunlap represented the Air Force at the meeting because the top lawyer was out of town.

A spokesman for the Pentagon, Bryan Whitman, said it was nonsense to suggest that the military lawyers had been coerced, a point that General Dunlap agreed with.

"Do you really think that an officer with 30 years' service could be coerced by the Pentagon bureaucracy to sign something he didn't want to sign?" General Dunlap asked.

Of the five senior military lawyers, just General Dunlap agreed to comment for the record. Spokesmen for the other four — from the Army, Marines, Navy and Joint Chiefs of Staff — said those senior lawyers would not speak publicly because of the sensitivity of the topic.

Other military officials insisted on anonymity, saying the lawyers' experience had demonstrated the perils of active-duty officers' speaking openly about sensitive subjects.

The views of professional military lawyers have been much sought after in the five-year debate over what permissible techniques in the fight against terrorism.

In early 2002, the administration brushed aside the objections of the military's most senior uniformed lawyers to the original plans for military commissions. When the lawyers' role as dissenters became known later, they were lauded by human rights advocates and others as having tried to be an independent voice and brake on the administration.

According to documents released last year, the military lawyers later objected strenuously to the conclusions of an administration legal group that said in early 2003 that President Bush had authority as commander in chief to order harsh interrogations of Guantánamo Bay detainees.

In public testimony to Congress last month, the lawyers voiced objections to specific parts of the White House plan, which was an effort to resurrect the Guantánamo military commissions that the Supreme Court struck down. Most significant, the lawyers disputed the provision prohibiting defendants from access to classified evidence against them.

The top uniformed Marine lawyer, Brig. Gen. James C. Walker, said in his testimony that no civilized country ought to deny defendants the right to see evidence against them and that the United States "should not be the first.'' The lawyers stand by those objections, military officials said.

The letter signed on Wednesday focused instead on two different parts of the White House proposal, the provision amending Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and a provision of the War Crimes Act that enforces that article.

Mr. Haynes drafted the letter focusing on these provisions because neither had been a sticking point in the military lawyers' objections. But when the lawyers reached Mr. Haynes's office, they declined to sign immediately, people with knowledge of the meeting said.

The lawyers spent more than an hour huddled in a private room wrangling over language they could agree on and trying to call Rear Adm. Bruce MacDonald, the Navy judge advocate general.

A participant in the meeting said Admiral MacDonald told his colleagues that he could not sign a letter saying he supported the Common Article 3 definition in the White House legislation because he advocated a broader definition that relied more on international law, rather than a narrow interpretation of American constitutional law.

In the end, the military lawyers all agreed to language in the letter saying they "do not object" to the provisions in the administration bill.

But the letter included a sentence that the clarification would be "helpful to our fighting men and women at war on behalf of their country."

White House officials said that sentence demonstrated the military lawyers' support.

General Dunlap said in his mind that signing the letter meant just to convey that trying to clarify ambiguous language was helpful and that it did not mean that he and his colleagues fully endorsed the administration view.

The Question Of Liability Stirs Concern At The C.I.A. (NYT)

By Scott Shane

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — Behind the debate between Congress and the White House over the proper treatment of terror suspects is an old fear at the Central Intelligence Agency: that officers could be vulnerable to lawsuits, or even criminal prosecution, for actions they believed at the time complied with administration policy.

Legislation proposed by the White House would address that concern head-on by offering retroactive protection for some actions taken since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Specifically, it would amend the War Crimes Act to prohibit only certain "serious violations" of a provision of the Geneva Conventions, including torture, murder and other clearly unsanctioned acts.

The distinction is a crucial one, because the War Crimes Act prohibits any violation of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which outlaws "outrages upon personal dignity" and "humiliating and degrading treatment." In view of the Supreme Court's ruling in June that Common Article 3 applies to all interrogations of terror suspects, some harsh techniques used by C.I.A. or military officers since 2001 could be viewed as illegal under the existing law.

The plan favored by the White House bans what it defines as "serious violations of Common Article 3," including murder, torture and the use of biological experiments. The alternative favored by a group of Republican senators led by Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, does not introduce any such distinction.

The two plans also differ in their treatment of past abuses. The White House plan would be retroactive to Sept. 11, 2001, while senators working with Mr. Warner say their approach avoids dealing with past events because of legal and constitutional concerns. The senators say they believe that past abuses should be reviewed case by case.

A. John Radsan, assistant general counsel at the C.I.A. from 2002 to 2004, said he thought the legal exposure for officers involved in capturing and interrogating suspects since 2001 was not as great as some feared. But Mr. Radsan said he understood their concern.

"Their perspective is that they got authorization, they got legal advice and they did the difficult, dirty work of the war on terror," said Mr. Radsan, now at the William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul. "They think they should not suffer because someone changed the rules."

Mr. Radsan and other legal experts said Friday that it was highly unlikely that intelligence officers could be prosecuted in American courts for their actions in interrogating terror suspects. Similarly, they said, lawsuits filed by former prisoners would probably face insurmountable hurdles in American courts.

But some said future investigations by Congress or a C.I.A. inspector general were quite possible and could bring the daunting prospect of high legal fees or devastating news coverage.

Nearly 100 terror suspects have spent time in C.I.A. custody since the Sept. 11 attacks, President Bush acknowledged publicly last week, when he announced the transfer of the last 14 of them to military custody in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Mr. Bush has defended the interrogation program and has said it should not be disbanded, but he has said his legislation is necessary to provide clear legal guidelines to interrogators. Within the C.I.A. and the military, concern about possible repercussions against interrogators has increased since 2004, when disclosure of the abuses at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and elsewhere prompted a tightening of the guidelines on interrogation.

The first such step came in December 2004, when the Justice Department formally withdrew a controversial 2002 legal memorandum, intended primarily as a guideline for the C.I.A. interrogation program, that had defined torture as treatment leading to organ failure.

Last December, over White House objections, Congress passed an amendment proposed by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, that explicitly outlawed "cruel, inhuman and degrading" treatment of prisoners. Finally, in June, the Supreme Court ruled that Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, contrary to what the administration had argued for nearly five years, did apply to all prisoners captured in the campaign against terrorism.

With the possibility that the Democrats could win control of one or both houses of Congress in the November elections, the prospect of aggressive, public investigations of detainee treatment also looms.

Jack L. Goldsmith, a law professor at Harvard who served in the Defense Department and the Justice Department under Mr. Bush, said the shifting legal atmosphere made fear of criminal or civil liability on the part of C.I.A. and military personnel "a completely genuine concern, even if it seems far-fetched."

Suzanne Spaulding, a former assistant general counsel at the C.I.A., said agency officers could face legal liability abroad. Ms. Spaulding said some countries had asserted jurisdiction over war crimes committed anywhere in the world. And C.I.A. officers involved in the seizing of a Muslim cleric in Milan in 2003 faced an arrest order in Italy.

A C.I.A. spokesman, Mark Mansfield, acknowledged officers' concerns about possible legal troubles, but he said those concerns should not be exaggerated.

Mr. Mansfield said, for example, that while many C.I.A. officers, including polygraph examiners, members of promotion boards and interrogators, had long had professional liability insurance, he had seen no evidence of a recent increase in purchases of such insurance, the cost of which is reimbursed by the agency.

"It is fair to say that C.I.A. officers are mindful of these situations and developments,'' Mr. Mansfield said, "but it's unwise to make generalizations or sweeping statements about levels of concern. That said, we have a very important mission to carry out — helping to protect the country — and that has been and continues to be the paramount concern."

Bush Proposal May Slow Abuse Prosecutions (LAT)

By Andrew Zajac And Cam Simpson, Chicago Tribune

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

The president wants to narrow the definition of war crimes. But that could make it harder to win indictments in some Abu Ghraib cases.

WASHINGTON — When the Muslim world was first inflamed over images of abuse from the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, President Bush took the lead in a campaign to minimize the damage by pledging that his government would speak through its actions.

"There will be investigations. People will be brought to justice," Bush said on May 5, 2004, speaking from the Map Room of the White House and into the lens of a camera for Al Arabiya, the Arabic-language satellite network.

But more than two years later, provisions in Bush's proposed legislation for detainee interrogations and terrorism tribunals could hamper potential criminal prosecutions in some of the 17 abuse investigations from Iraq and Afghanistan pending before federal prosecutors in Virginia.

The CIA's former assistant general counsel, a defense attorney for one veteran intelligence officer under scrutiny in a pending investigation, and outside military-law experts all said Bush's proposal would retroactively weaken the U.S. law against war crimes, possibly making it more difficult to win criminal indictments in those cases.

Bush's plan would backdate a more narrow definition of war crimes to Sept. 11, 2001, the day terrorists crashed jets into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The proposal seems to fit a broader pattern of Bush administration efforts to protect interrogators working for the CIA and the Department of Defense, or to find ways to keep the law in question, the 1996 War Crimes Act, from applying to post-Sept. 11 actions.

Another provision in Bush's proposal would mandate taxpayer-financed legal defenses for intelligence agents charged or sued in connection with detainee abuse.

Even those simply under investigation would get their legal bills paid under the plan, presumably including those involved in the 17 pending cases.

Although Bush was commenting on the future of interrogations, and not his proposed legislation's potential effect on the pending cases, the president said Friday that he wanted to give intelligence operatives confidence to proceed.

"These are decent, honorable citizens who are on the front line of protecting the American people, and they expect our government to give them clarity about what is right and what is wrong in the law. And that's what we have asked to do," Bush said.

One pending investigation in Virginia involves the death of Manadel Jamadi, an alleged Iraqi insurgent. Images of his battered corpse, which was packed in ice, were aired by ABC's "World News Tonight" the same day in 2004 that Bush made his pledge to prosecute abusers. It was soon dubbed the "iceman" case.

Nina Ginsberg, the attorney representing 47-year-old Mark Swanner, a veteran CIA officer who interrogated Jamadi before the prisoner's death, said in an interview Thursday that she believed the administration was attempting to use its proposed legislation to retroactively immunize or protect interrogators now under investigation.

Although she said it would be difficult to indict some of the Pentagon and CIA interrogators under investigation even if Bush's bill is rejected by Congress, Ginsberg said there was no other explanation for the retroactive nature of the changes proposed by the White House except to protect operatives already under scrutiny.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty, who as the U.S. attorney in Alexandria, Va., oversaw the 17 pending cases before becoming the Justice Department's acting No. 2 lawyer in November, did not deny during a brief interview Friday that the legislation would retroactively affect the investigations.

But asked about the potential effects, McNulty would only say, "I don't want to say.... The best I can say right now is [an answer] would probably reveal more about those cases involved than has been publicly said."

All of the cases assigned to Virginia remain secret, and no one has been charged. John Radsan, assistant general counsel at the CIA from 2002 to 2004, suggested that bringing charges against agency officers in any of the cases is already a difficult proposition — legally, practically and politically.

But Radsan also said, "This legislation will make it even more difficult to bring a case against a CIA officer for violating the War Crimes Act," because it would significantly limit the definition of a war crime.

Eugene Fidel, a military law expert in Washington and president of the National Institute of Military Justice, said the Bush proposal "would make it much more difficult for federal prosecutors to even take those cases into court."

Fidel added, "The prosecutor could just say, 'What you did doesn't even fall within the War Crimes Act anymore; therefore I'm not even going to paper it,' " that is, bring charges. He predicted that some of the investigations would "turn out to be unprosecutable because of this legislation."

Jim Rybicki, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Alexandria, confirmed that 17 abuse investigations remain open but declined to discuss any details.

The New Yorker magazine first identified Swanner's connection to the Jamadi case last year.

A Justice Department memo written in January said 20 investigations related to detainee abuse allegations in Iraq and Afghanistan had been referred for prosecution.

Ten came from the Defense Department, the memo said, while the remainder came from "another agency," a reference to the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0064185

Only one, that of CIA contract interrogator David A. Passaro, has been prosecuted. He was convicted in Raleigh, N.C., last month of felony assault for beating an Afghan prisoner who died one day after being pummeled with fists and a flashlight, evidence showed.

Passaro was indicted before then-Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft set up the special prosecution team in Virginia.

The Justice memo said two of the 20 cases were closed without charges because "the department has determined in each of them that there was insufficient evidence to support a prosecution."

In a statement Friday, the Justice Department declined to comment "on ongoing criminal investigations." But the agency, which is supporting Bush's push for the legislation, said there has never been a War Crimes Act prosecution because the statute is too vague.

Dispute Centers On Reading Of Geneva Convention (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

President Bush on Friday pushed for passage of his military tribunals bill, asking Congress to clarify the meaning of the Geneva Convention to allow the CIA to continue detaining and interrogating prisoners under a formerly secret program. The issue has grown more divisive between Bush and other Republicans.

Question: What are the similarities and differences between the president's proposal and the one supported by Sen. John McCain?

Answer: Both would set up special courts known as military commissions to try detainees. The bill supported by McCain, several other Republicans and many Democrats would give detainees greater legal rights, including more rights to see evidence used against them, than Bush's proposal.

The main difference has to do with how each of the bills would apply the Geneva Convention — in particular the provision known as Common Article 3. McCain's bill would apply the protections without interpreting them, whereas Bush's proposal would "clarify" them in a way that could give the CIA greater latitude in the way it treats detainees.

Q: What is Common Article 3?

A: It is a provision of the treaty that provides a minimum level of protection for any fighter involved in a civil war and for unlawful combatants — such as terrorists or insurgents — in all conflicts.

Q: The president contends Common Article 3 is vague. Is it?

A: Common Article 3 bans "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." Bush says it is subject to interpretation. However, international law experts say the article is not vague — at least no more so than any other law or treaty. Fifty years of case law and commentary define the article, and many military lawyers say they have a good idea of what is allowed and what isn't.

Q: Why does the president say that the CIA detention and interrogation program could not continue without redefining Common Article 3?

A: It depends on what the CIA does while detaining and interrogating prisoners, and few people outside the agency know with certainty what they do. Some experts on Geneva say there are many tough tactics — such as "stress positions" that cause discomfort, or limited sensory deprivation — that have recently been banned by the U.S. military but not by the CIA. Some of those tactics may not violate Common Article 3. But tactics causing unbearable pain to break prisoners would violate Common Article 3.

Q: Is "water-boarding" — a method that makes prisoners feel as though they are drowning — allowable under Common Article 3?

A: No.

Q: Does the CIA use water-boarding?

A: The CIA has used water-boarding as an interrogation tactic, U.S. officials have said.

Q: Does it still use water-boarding?

A: The agency won't answer the question — which could mean that it still does, or that it wants terrorists to think it still does. The U.S. government, which considers simulated drowning a form of torture, has said the military will not use the tactic. But that ban explicitly leaves out the CIA.

Q: Do these bills spell out which tactics can and can't be used during interrogations?

A: No, not specifically. They mainly define how much latitude interrogators have, and how closely they must observe the Geneva Convention's terms.

Q: Administration officials say that if the McCain bill passes, CIA interrogators will be subjected to civil suits and prosecution for violating Common Article 3. Will they?

A: McCain's bill bans civil suits based on the Geneva Convention. It also offers other protections from criminal prosecution, by saying that U.S. forces can be prosecuted only for a "grave breach" of Common Article 3, including torture, murder, and "cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment." Administration lawyers want better retroactive protections for interrogators and more coverage in international courts. They say they can only get that by clarifying the meaning of the convention.

Q: Critics of the president's plan have said that redefining Geneva would put U.S. troops at risk. Has Common Article 3 ever protected an American service member?

A: Yes. In 1993, the United States invoked Common Article 3 protections for Chief Warrant Officer Michael J. Durant, who was captured by Somali warlords. Because he was not the prisoner of a government and because Somalia was embroiled in a civil war, traditional Geneva prisoner-of-war protections did not apply. Although Durant had been roughly treated initially, the militants ultimately decided to observe Common Article 3 and allowed the Red Cross to visit Durant.

Q: Would Common Article 3 protect U.S. forces in current conflicts?

A: Yes. Common Article 3 would protect a U.S. soldier captured by a rebel group in Afghanistan, the Philippines or Colombia — if the captors observed it.

Position On Detainee Trials Comes At Political Risk For GOP Senators (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - One endured torture as a prisoner of war in Vietnam. One is a former Navy secretary and stalwart supporter of the military's priorities. One is a former military lawyer and a judge in the Air Force reserves.

All three are Republican senators, and together they're battling President Bush over how to handle detainees in the war on terrorism.

These three senators - John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, respectively - say Bush's plan would damage U.S. credibility around the world, jeopardize the lives of U.S. troops captured in future wars and deny basic legal and human rights to suspected terrorists in U.S. custody. They're using their combined stature to advance a competing, bipartisan proposal.

But by their stand, each of the three senators is taking a substantial political risk.

"They think this is more important than politics," said John Hutson, former Judge Advocate General for the Navy.

McCain could alienate conservative Republicans when he needs them most. For several years he's worked hard to gain the trust of conservative Bush allies skeptical of his maverick streak.

He's worked his way into being the odds-on favorite to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, but now he's breaking with his party's president on an issue that threatens to undermine Republican strategy for November's congressional elections - following Bush's leadership on national security. That could hurt him.

And he knows it. On Friday, while reiterating his opposition to Bush's plan, he released a statement whose first line read, "I respect very much the president's unwavering determination to protect America from terrorist attack." Still, he opposes Bush.

Katon Dawson, the Republican Party chairman in South Carolina, a key 2008 primary state, said: "South Carolina is certainly Bush country. Overwhelmingly, the communications we're getting are supporting the president. Obviously, the president is right on this issue. I think John McCain thinks he's right - McCain and Warner and Graham. I think people on the ground think they're wrong."

Graham could reap opposition to his re-election within his South Carolina base. Many conservative activists already were frustrated with him for blocking a conservative judicial nominee's confirmation and supporting legislation that would allow illegal immigrants to stay in the country.

"You just don't even know how people are bent out of shape!" said Kristin Maguire, a member of the state Republican Party's executive committee. "The holier-than-thou attitude of `I'm the attorney, I understand this better than you.'

"He has undermined this being an election point this year. He's taking it off the plate and he's making it easier for Democrats to run against incumbent Republicans in weak seats by making it OK to be weak on terrorism and national security."

In an interview Friday, Graham stood his ground.

"This is one of the most important things I will ever do. What experience I've had in life is relevant here. I think I owe it to my state and my nation to apply it in a way that's reasonable and constructive. Whatever political risk might come my way pales in comparison with our soldiers and other people who are risking everything they have, including their lives," Graham said.

Warner, 79, a World War II veteran and former Navy secretary, is slated to give up his chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee after this year. He enjoys broad bipartisan support in Virginia and is less obviously at risk by his stand.

Yet the renegade role doesn't come easily to this consummate diplomat and staunch Republican. Nevertheless, he takes great pride in defending the military, and many senior military leaders oppose Bush's position.

Warner implored reporters not to interpret his stand as defiance of Bush: "I still think we can work it through - I do not think negotiations have broken down."

If Democrats win control of the House of Representatives or the Senate in November, all three senators could suffer the sting of blame.

The House is poised to pass the administration's bill next week. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., favors it, too.

But with the support of most, if not all, Senate Democrats and a handful of moderate Northeastern Republicans, the three senators are expected to prevail in the Senate.

"These are people who have lived it," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee. He was speaking of McCain, Graham and Warner.

Rear Adm. Harry Harris War Inside The Wire (WSJ)

By James Taranto

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba -- You might call Rear Adm. Harry Harris a jailer. As commander of Joint Task Force Guantanamo, a job he has held for six months, he is in charge of one of the world's best-known detention facilities. But if you call this place a prison, he will correct you.

"Prisons are about rehabilitation and punishment," Adm. Harris told me in a phone conversation last week, reiterating a point he had made a few days earlier in a briefing for visiting journalists here. "What we are about is keeping enemy combatants off the battlefield. . . . The enemy combatants that we have here were captured on the battlefield or running from the battle field, and they were engaged in combat operations against Americans, and in many cases killed Americans. What we're trying to do here in Guantanamo is simply keep them off the battlefield, because we know that many of them would go back to the fight."

In fact, Adm. Harris says, many of them have kept fighting even while in captivity. They are carrying out coordinated actions with the apparent goals of disrupting the camp's operations, furthering anti-American propaganda, and wounding and intimidating the servicemen who guard them. * * *

One such action unfolded on May 18. Early that Thursday morning, guards patrolling the high-security Camp 1 (one of five numbered detention areas, with a sixth under construction) found two detainees who had attempted suicide. "One was found unconscious," Adm. Harris recalls, "and then another one was found a little later, frothing at the mouth, if you will. It looked like . . .

poisoning of some sort." Both survived, although one took seven days to regain consciousness, and the other took four days. Neither had a prescription for any drug, "so they had to get the meds from other detainees somehow."

To prevent more suicide attempts, "the detention group commander ordered a shakedown of all the cells. He was going through each of the cells looking for contraband, looking for pills. He found some, throughout the day. He found some hidden around the toilet area; he found some hidden in the bindings of the Holy Quran." (Each detainee receives a personal Quran in his native language, which non-Muslim guards are forbidden to touch.)

Early in the evening, the search reached Camp 4, the least restrictive of the detention areas. Unlike in the other camps, detainees in Camp 4 are not confined to individual cells but bunk communally and congregate in fenced yards. This is where the detainees live who are most compliant with camp rules. But on that day in May, their cooperation came to an end.

A guard noticed a detainee who appeared to be trying to hang himself. "The detainee had put a sheet in the ceiling around the lights and built what looked like a noose and was putting his head toward that noose," Adm. Harris says. "The quick-reaction force rushed into that [cell] block to save the life of the individual they thought was trying to kill himself. When they got in there, the detainees had slickened the floor with feces, urine and soapy water," making it hard for the guards to keep their footing.

"They proceeded to attack the guard force. . . . The attack was obviously planned. They managed to get a guard down on the ground. They attacked him with broken light fixtures, with fan blades and with [security] cameras that they had torn off to use as bludgeoning weapons. In that process the NCOIC [noncommissioned officer in charge] made the call -- a gutsy call -- to fire less-than-lethal rounds at the detainees. . . . All that took about three to five minutes. . . . The disturbance was quelled. No one was seriously injured, either the guards or the detainees.

"But at the same time, detainees in two adjacent blocks erupted and tore up their blocks completely -- tore down all the lights, tore up all the fans, tore down all the cameras, and all that kind of stuff. They didn't attack the guards, but they did manage to tear up the blocks." In only one Camp 4 cell block did the detainees not riot: "When the uprising, or whatever you call it, happened, they went back into their block very quietly and stood by the beds," Adm. Harris says. "Today, those are the only residents of Camp 4." When I toured the camp, I saw perhaps eight of them, dressed in white, lolling about their outdoor yard. The other blocks are being repaired and made more secure, at a cost to the taxpayer of about $800,000.

Camp 1 is also unoccupied, undergoing repairs owing to the discovery of another sabotage scheme. Cells in Camp 1 were equipped with spring-operated faucets, and the detainees "managed to figure out how to take that apart and . . . pull the spring out. The spring, when it's fully stretched out, is probably a foot long, and it can be used as a weapon to jab someone in the neck or to jab someone in the eye. They would take that spring and hide it in the waistband of their pants. . . . This is just another indication of the creativity that the detainees have as they plan things against us." * * *

Before Camp 1 closed, three detainees there -- two Saudis and a Yemeni -- succeeded in killing themselves. On the morning of June 10, guards found the trio, all in the same cell block, hanged with clothing and bedsheets.

Domestic foes of the war on terror wasted no time in trying to co-opt the detainees' martyrdom for their own cause. Human Rights Watch claimed that the detainees had suffered from "incredible despair" because they had been "completely cut off from the world." The New York Times editorialized that the suicides were "the inevitable result of creating a netherworld of despair beyond the laws of civilized nations."

Adm. Harris had a different view. "I believe this was not an act of desperation but an act of asymmetrical warfare waged against us," he said at the time -- and he stands by that statement. In response, the Times scolded the admiral for displaying "a profound disassociation from humanity."

His case is the stronger one. The proximity and simultaneity of the suicides argue that they were coordinated rather than spontaneous. Although some detainees suffer from mental illnesses, for which they receive treatment at the camp infirmary, there is no evidence that these three did. "They recently had been given . . . a psychiatric evaluation, and they were all fine," Adm. Harris tells me. It may be hard to comprehend the mentality of one who would kill himself to make a political statement, but to doubt that these men could do so is to test the limits of fatuity. After all, that is exactly what 19 of their comrades did five years ago Monday.

The case against Guantanamo rests on a web of falsehood. Far from being held "beyond the laws of civilized nations" -- laws that terrorists, by definition, reject -- the detainees here enjoy a panoply of procedural protections. All except the 14 recent arrivals have gone before Combatant Status Review Tribunals to re-examine their designation as enemy combatants -- even though these "Article V" hearings are required under international law only if that designation is in doubt, and under the U.S. Supreme Court's 2004 Hamdi v. Rumsfeld ruling if the detainee is a U.S. citizen. (Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told me last week that the newly arrived detainees had not yet received Article V hearings but would.) In addition, each detainee annually goes before an Administrative Review Board, analogous to a parole hearing, which determines whether he can be released without harming U.S. security.

These processes are not mere window dressing. As President Bush noted in a speech last week, some 315 of 770 Guantanamo detainees have been released from U.S. custody, either through one of these proceedings or through informal processes that predated them. More than a dozen of the freed detainees, Mr. Bush added, are known to have returned to the battlefield, suggesting that the procedures are, if anything, too lenient.

Many detainees also have petitioned for habeas corpus since the Supreme Court's 2004 Rasul v. Bush ruling; and of course trials for the four detainees who've been charged with war crimes have been delayed only because Osama bin Laden's bodyguard was able to avail himself of our appellate courts to challenge the legality of the proceedings.

Likewise, it is nonsense to say the detainees are "completely cut off from the world." There is no solitary confinement at Guantanamo; even at maximum-security Camp 5, the cells have outside light and openings in the doors through which detainees can communicate with one another. They have ample contact with the world beyond the camp, too. "Over 40,000 pieces of mail have come in and out of here," Adm. Harris says. "If you chose to write one of them a letter, all you'd need to do is put their name on it, say 'Guantanamo Bay, Cuba,' put our ZIP code on it, and they will get that letter.

"Most of the detainees have lawyers," the admiral adds. "There are over 900 habeas lawyers representing less than 450 detainees," and the lawyers are free to visit their clients. Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross "come down for almost a month at a time, four times a year, and then [for shorter periods] at other times, and they have unfettered access to any detainee they want to see, whenever they want to see them." * * *

When the Supreme Court extended habeas rights to the detainees, it created a loophole in camp security. Guards screen and censor mail to and from the detainees, but communications with their lawyers are privileged and confidential. "We don't look at the envelope, or in the envelope, at all," Adm. Harris says. "I believe that the detainees could have abused that privilege and used it as an informal mail system" by passing notes to other detainees in envelopes from lawyers. Adm. Harris is careful to note that he does not believe the lawyers are complicit in any abuse, and that he has no ability to confirm his suspicions: "If it's written correspondence, and it's in the habeas envelope, then we cannot get to it."

What is clear is that the detainees have brought more-restrictive conditions on themselves, through suicide, sabotage and other disruptive actions. The erstwhile Camp 4 rioters were relocated to higher-security camps, and the opening of Camp 6, a modern facility modeled on a medium-security prison in Michigan, has been delayed so that officials can harden its security.

"There is such a thing as a medium-security prisoner," Adm. Harris says. "I believe there is no such thing as a medium-security terrorist."

Tortured Logic On Terror (NSL)

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), September 16, 2006

No one could ever accuse President Bush of self-doubt. Even as Senate Republicans have broken with his administration's position on terrorist detainee trials and interrogation only two months before midterm elections, the president remains defiantly confident of his path.

Some would call this principled. Others would say it's pig- headed. In this case, the principle -- a president's responsibility to the nation's security -- blinds Bush to the fact that the methods he favors are self-defeating. They compromise rather than ensure Americans' security, and therefore they are indefensible.

In a testy press conference yesterday, Bush disputed Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee -- including Sen. John McCain of Arizona -- who have sided with Democrats in offering an alternative bill to the White House's proposals for detaining and trying terrorist suspects. The bill, though flawed, is clear in its opposition to the White House's views on torture.

Even former Secretary of State Colin Powell, the good soldier, joined the fray. In a letter backing committee Republicans, he argued that Bush's desire to rewrite the Geneva Conventions dealing with prisoner treatment would make the world further doubt "the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

Such views rile the president but don't sway him. That's frightening because the dangers he sees ahead are real. He's mistaken to think dealing with them harshly is the same as dealing with them effectively.

Condoning torture -- or, as the president puts it, "clarifying" the clause of the Geneva Conventions Common Article 3 that prohibits "outrages upon personal dignity" -- virtually as sures further erosion of international support for the U.S. and guarantees that our own soldiers could be endangered.

During his press conference, Bush accurately discussed the likelihood that "the enemy wants to attack us again." He's correct to say intelligence officials need tools for interrogat ing terror suspects. (He's less persuasive when he argues al Qaeda would have been able to strike the U.S. again had it not been for information gathered through means the U.S. Supreme Court has questioned. Interrogators might also have gotten that information without breaking international law. In fact, the Pentagon has determined that torture is ineffective.)

What Bush still doesn't seem to get -- three years after his administration misguidedly, in the name of national secu rity, launched a nearly unilateral effort to unseat Saddam Hussein and fostered the abuses of Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo -- is that while his analysis of the threat might be accurate, his approach hasn't worked. The battle against terrorism and those who favor it should be fought on higher ground.

Gen. John Vessey Jr., a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, summed it up neatly in a letter to McCain in which he noted that while previous enemies have also been vicious and cruel, Americans have always held to their values when fighting them. "We should continue to do so," Ves sey wrote.

Indeed.

Please, Explain, Sen. McCain (WT)

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

President Bush wasted no time yesterday responding to the Senate Armed Services Committee's passage of legislation that could damage the ability of intelligence agencies to obtain information from terrorist detainees. On Thursday, four Republica n members of the Senate Armed Services Committee -- Chairman John Warner and John McCain, Lindsey Graham and Susan Collins -- joined the committee's Democrats in passing flawed legislation governing detainee treatment that fails to respond to Mr. Bush's critical request. The lawmakers must clarify what interrogators can and cannot do when interrogating suspected jihadists.

Yesterday, the president suggested that the committee's refusal to define what interrogation methods were permissible under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions could force the CIA to shut down a program that has gained invaluable intelligence about al Qaeda. Mr. Bush noted, for example, that Common Article 3 includes language barring "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment" of someone who is being interrogated. "That's very vague. What does that mean?" the president asked. He warned that intelligence professionals on the front lines of the war could not do their job interrogating detainees if Congress refused "to put clarity in the law." Congress, Mr. Bush added, "has a decision to make" about whether it wanted the program to continue -- something the Senate Armed Services Committee has now put in jeopardy.

Given all that the program has accomplished, it would be difficult to imagine a more irresponsible decision on the part of Congress. As Mr. Bush pointed out in a speech earlier this month, American forces captured Abu Zubaydah -- a top bin laden aide who ran terrorist camps in which some of the September 11 hijackers trained -- several months after the September 11 attacks. Zubaydah, who was wounded on the battlefield, survived only because of medical treatment from the CIA, After he recovered, Zubaydah refused to cooperate with U.S. interrogators. So, the CIA, used an unspecified "alternative" set of interrogation methods approved by Justice Department lawyers. Eventually, Zubaydah cracked and provided information that enabled the military to prevent an al Qaeda terrorist attack inside the United States.

Zubaydah also provided information that lead to the capture of Khalid Sheikh Mohammad and Ramzi Binalshibh, who helped organize the September 11 attacks. They also led authorities to the capture of the leader al Qaeda's south Asian affiliate, Hambali, and 17 operatives. When he learned that his terror cell had been broken up, Hambali acknowledged that the terrorists were being prepared for new attacks on the United States, probably using airplanes, Mr. Bush added.

This is just a partial listing of what the CIA has learned as a result of the CIA program that the Senate Armed Services Committee has put at risk.

But the concerns expressed by Mr. Bush and CIA Director Michael Hayden have failed to budge Mr. McCain. On Thursday, the Arizona Republican disparaged Mr. Hayden's legitimate concerns about the Senate bill as an attempt to "protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation." It's a cheap shot. Mr. McCain should explain why he is endangering a vital interrogation program that has saved many American lives.

Europe, US Deadlocked On Air Security (FT)

By Jimmy Burns In London, Andrew Bounds In Brussels And Doug Cameron In Chicago

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Attempts to find transatlantic agreement on counter-terror measures for the airline industry are floundering as governments and aviation experts argue about which security rules would be most effective.

UK airline and airport authorities on Friday revealed there was still no agreement on what measures could best ease the disruption and economic costs to the industry while keeping passengers safe from terrorist attacks.

The UK and the US have maintained stricter airline security regimes than most European states since British police foiled an alleged plot to blow up transatlantic jets with liquid explosives.

One leading London-based international transport security adviser warned on Friday that the UK department of transport would leave passengers vulnerable to terrorist attack if it went ahead with announced plans to relax restrictions on the size of hand baggage next week.

Sally Leivesley, a scientific adviser on emergency planning, told the Financial Times: “Size does matter because the technology does not exist commercially to screen adequately potentially lethal liquids in hand baggage. We risk once again offering a potential tool to a suicide bomber when the terrorist threat to the airline industry remains high.”

Meanwhile, Brussels’ top negotiator on Friday warned that transatlantic travellers faced chaos next month unless the US dropped its demands for greater access to airline passenger data from the European Union.

The EU and the US have struggled to forge a new agreement on sharing passenger data after the European Court of Justice struck down the accord and ordered that it expire on September 30.

Jonathan Faull, who runs the justice and home affairs department of the European Commission, said: “We hope to persuade the Americans in the next couple of weeks to conclude an understanding that is the same as the one we had. If we don’t get an agreement by the end of the month, what is likely to happen is, I’m afraid, chaos.”

US officials indicated they did not plan to drop demands for wider access to EU passenger data.

Passenger pre-screening and improved backround information remain the main planks of the US Transport Security Administration’s policy. The US aviation industry is still on a heightened Orange alert status. A ban on liquids and gels – introduced on August 10 – remains in place.

But, without a legal framework, any individual could lodge a legal challenge against an airline that sent details of their passport, address, dietary requirements and other information to the US authorities.

The prospect of last-minute haggling leaves airlines with much uncertainty.

Tapes Roll On Sting's Details (ALBANYTU)

Mosque leader heard to warn FBI informant on apparent support of terrorist group

DOJ_NMG_0064192

ALBANY -- The spiritual leader of an Albany mosque warned an undercover FBI informant that he needed to be careful and quiet about his support of terrorists who were purported to be planning to kill the president of Pakistan, according to government transcripts of their secretly recorded conversations.

The statements were part of a series of conversations that took place as the FBI listened in while their informant baited two Albany men with cash he said came from the sale of shoulder-fired missiles to terrorists in New York City.

For eight months beginning in late 2003, the informant gave the pair thousands in cash that was paid back to him through checks written out to his business by Mohammed Hossain. The pizza shop owner is charged in the case along with Yassin Aref, the jailed imam of a Central Avenue mosque.

Aref, 36, and Hossain, 51, face up to 400 years in prison if convicted of the charges. They are accused of helping launder the proceeds from the fictitious plot, in which the informant said he made money selling Chinese-made missile launchers to terrorists.

Their attorneys have disputed the allegations, contending the men were unwitting participants in the scheme who believed they were only taking a loan and not supportive of the informant's terrorist dealings.

No part of the plot was real, but it was based on an actual terrorist organization, Jaish-e-Mohammed, an Islamic extremist group based in Pakistan that had been threatening to kill that country's president, Pervez Musharraf. The informant claimed to be dealing arms to terrorists from that group who were plotting to kill a Pakistani ambassador near the United Nations in Manhattan.

Aref told the informant he was not familiar with that organization, except for what little he had learned of their background watching television. He never told the informant that he supported the group, their cause, or, wanted them to succeed. Mostly, Aref spoke to the informant about Islamic beliefs and their context in relation to Middle East conflicts.

The FBI's informant, a Pakistani immigrant who is expected to testify next week, had been arrested years earlier in a case involving fraudulent driver's licenses. He agreed to cooperate in order to gain leniency.

On Friday, the federal jury at their trial listened to hours of tapes recorded during the sting. In one instance, Aref did not dissuade the informant from supporting terrorism.

"I say if you believe they are doing right and working for Allah and you help them for Allah, go ahead," Yassin Aref, in broken English, told the informant during a meeting in January 2004. "But, of course, you should to be careful and ... you should to know they looking for any person they have any kind of link with that group. And if they find any link between you and that group, you should to know, you are going to be in the trouble."

The statements were included in more than 50 hours of tape recordings made by the FBI during the year-long sting operation targeting Aref, a Kurdish refugee who moved to the United States seven years ago.

Hossain is not accused of harboring sympathies for terrorists. Rather, the case against him is built on a government theory that he embraced the informant's illicit arms dealing because he was desperate for money, never walking away even when the informant pulled out a shoulder-fired missile during one of their early meetings in December 2003. For his part, authorities said, Hossain was to receive $5,000 cash, authorities said.

Aref is not accused of profiting in the scheme. Rather, federal prosecutors contend he was brought in to witness the deal.

Kassim Shaar, an acquaintance of Aref's who now lives in Michigan, took the stand briefly Friday and recounted having dinner at Aref's house in February 2004. He said that afternoon the informant, whom he had never met, arrived with Hossain and the three other men began exchanging money and papers.

Suddenly, Shaar said, the informant blurted out something that unsettled him greatly.

"He said there was an attack coming to New York City ... a missile attack," Shaar said.

Aref appeared startled by the abrupt disclosure and patted the informant's body looking for a recording device, which he was wearing but was not discovered.

U.S. District Judge Thomas J. McAvoy declined to allow prosecutors to press Shaar on what happened next, when he allegedly wanted to call the police but was stopped by Aref, who assured him the man had been joking.

"You thought he was joking, didn't you?" asked Aref's attorney, Terence L. Kindlon. "Right," Shaar replied.

Federal authorities have admitted that Aref, whom they contend was aligned with terrorist figures overseas, was the "ultimate target" of their investigation. Their interest stemmed from allegations that his name and address were found in suspected terrorist encampments during the invasion of Iraq.

While that information sparked the FBI's investigation, the federal judge in the case has prohibited prosecutors from putting forth testimony about the terrorist camps during the trial, in part because the information is not relevant to the sting case.

Hossain is not alleged to have overseas ties to terrorists.

Following his arrest on August 5, 2004, Hossain allegedly denied knowing the missile was a weapon and told an FBI agent that he believed it was a "plumbing supply," according to testimony Friday. But an undercover videotape of that meeting, which took place in November 2003, clearly shows the informant hoisting the missile launcher onto his shoulder as he tells Hossain that it's headed for New York City.

Special Agent Timothy Coll, who headed the investigation, testified Friday that Hossain told him he thought the informant "was joking."

Aref was also questioned following his arrest and told agents that the money transactions were a loan and that "his role was a witness," Coll said.

Coll, who testified for several hours on Friday, is scheduled to be cross-examined by defense attorneys when the trial resumes Monday.

Yemeni Man Accused Of Terrorist Links (AP-Y)

By Olivia Munoz

AP, September 16, 2006

A California man accused of trying to supply stolen U.S. military equipment and defense secrets to Yemen was denied bail Friday after a prosecutor said he had ties to a terrorist financier who plotted to help al-Qaida and Hamas.

The allegations emerged at a hearing for Amen Ahmed Ali, 56.

Defense attorney David A. Torres said his client was surprised by the charges.

"But he's also strong. He looks forward to his day in court," Torres said.

In pressing to keep Ali behind bars, prosecutors said that a search of Ali's house turned up contact information for Sheik Mohammed Ali Hassan al-Moayad in Ali's address book.

Al-Moayad, a Yemeni cleric serving a 75-year prison sentence, was convicted in New York last year of conspiring to support and attempting to support al-Qaida and the Palestinian extremist group Hamas, and of actually supporting Hamas.

Ali was arrested Sept. 7 at his cigarette shop in Bakersfield. He and two other men, all Yemeni-born U.S. citizens, were charged in the case.

Prosecutors said Ali planned to send chemical suits and body armor to Yemen without State Department authorization.

Ali pleaded not guilty last week to conspiracy to possess and transmit defense information, unlawfully export defense articles, possess stolen government property and attempted unlawful export of defense articles. If convicted on all counts, he faces up to 30 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

Man Linked To Terrorist Financier Is Denied Bail (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

A California man accused of trying to supply stolen U.S. military equipment and defense secrets to Yemen was denied bail Friday after a prosecutor said the man had ties to a terrorist financier who plotted to help Al Qaeda and Hamas.

The allegations emerged at a hearing for Amen Ahmed Ali, 56.

Suspect Linked To Terrorist (BFLDC)

By Stacey Shepard, Californian staff writer

The Bakersfield Californian, September 16, 2006

FRESNO — A federal judge ordered Amen Ahmed Ali to remain in custody Friday after hearing of his alleged ties to a convicted terrorist financier who funneled money and weapons to al-Qaida and Hamas.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller said in court that Ali's address book contained the name of Sheikh Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad, a Yemeni cleric. Al-Moayad was convicted in 2005 of providing material support to terrorist organizations and is serving a 75-year sentence in a Colorado prison.

Faller also told the court Ali may face an additional charge of espionage after evidence found in a search of his home last week indicated he may have been working as an undercover agent for the Yemen government.

Faller said it was clear that despite being a naturalized U.S. citizen, Ali, 56, has "a very close tie and allegiance to Yemen," his native country.

Ali was arrested Sept. 7 on suspicion of conspiring to acquire and sell U.S. defense secrets and stolen military equipment to someone in Yemen. Two other men are also charged in the case.

Defense attorney David Torres said he did not have access to the information Faller presented in court prior to the hearing.

Friends and relatives of Ali who live around Bakersfield were willing to put up five pieces of property worth a total of $550,000 to secure Ali's release, Torres said.

However, Judge Lawrence J. O'Neill said the decision to keep Ali in custody was based on Ali's numerous links to Yemen and his alleged connection to Al-Moayad.

New details emerge

Al-Moayad's name was found in Ali's address book in 2004 when Ali was questioned by officials upon arriving at Los Angeles International Airport, Faller said.

In addition, Ali's name and two phone numbers for him starting with the area code 661 were found in an address book owned by Al-Moayad, following his arrest in Germany in 2003.

Faller declined to comment on whether there was any contact between the two.

The court also heard allegations by the prosecutor that Ali may have been acting as a spy for Yemen.

Faller said official Yemen government forms that appeared to be visa and travel authorizations were found in a search of Ali's home the day he was arrested.

The documents, Faller said, allow someone to enter Yemen without doing anything more than completing the forms.

In audio- and videotaped surveillance during the government's two-year investigation, Ali allegedly told an undercover U.S. agent that he was a former officer in the Yemen military, Faller said. Ali also said he had ways of getting stolen U.S. military equipment into Yemen without American intelligence agents there discovering it.

Regarding Ali's ties to Yemen, Faller said the investigation also shows:

• Ali's Yemen ID card has a different name and birth date than his U.S. documents. On the Yemen card, his name is listed as Amen Ali Al-Hajj Al-Rouhani. His U.S. documents say he was born in 1950; his Yemeni documents say 1955.

• Ali tried to paint himself as a humble businessman, but that he had access to thousands of dollars. He allegedly had five bank accounts that would contain as much as $25,000 each at times, and then would be emptied. It is unknown where the money went.

• Ali was paid $30,000 last year by a Bay Area travel agency called Palm Air that specializes in discount flights to the Middle East. He could order plane tickets in anyone's name as part of his job, Faller said.

In issuing his ruling, O'Neill also noted that a pretrial services report indicated Ali had taken frequent trips to Yemen, has six siblings living there and owns land in the country.

Yemeni community reacts

Friends of Ali who attended the hearing disputed the evidence presented against him.

Ali had official Yemen documents in his home because he was recently nominated by the local Yemeni Association to be the organization's representative to the Yemen Consulate in San Francisco, according to Abdul Jobah and Nashwan Alrowhani, members of the Yemeni community and close friends of Ali.

They also said it was widely known that Ali worked for Palm Air. He made money by referring members of the local community to the company, they said.

"Every reservation I made was through him. He referred a lot of business to them because he was looked at like a leader to the community," Jobah said. "He'd go out of the way getting the ticket and (bring) it to my house, all for a lousy $50."

Jobah said Ali's arrest was only done to win votes and justify anti-terrorism efforts five years after 9/11.

"Amen is a victim of the 9/11 anniversary and voting time," he said. "He's a victim of timing."

Jobah and Alrowhani said Ali had come to Bakersfield 36 years ago, around the same time others from Yemen were settling here to farm. He was a fatherlike figure to many of the younger Yemeni men who migrated here in later years, helping them settle in the area. Ali also served as president of the local Yemeni Association.

"You can't live here until you're almost 60 an then commit a crime like this," Jobah said of Ali.

Following Ali's arrest last week, the FBI searched the homes of at least 15 members of the Bakersfield Yemeni community, the men said. Defense attorney Torres said many in the Yemeni community felt the FBI were coming down hard on them.

Alrowhani said FBI agents searched his home, froze his bank account and took his passport. His account was released and his passport returned, he said.

He was questioned for six hours by agents about his connection to Ali and presented with transcribed conversations he had with Ali over the phone, he said.

The FBI could not be reached to comment on the searches late Friday.

Jobah and Alrowhani feel their phones continue to be tapped. The situation is causing many here to consider moving back to the Middle East, the men said.

"I used to tell my wife, forget about Yemen. This is our life, our country," Alrowhani said. "Now I'm thinking differently."

Australia Denies Army Chief Visited Philippines In Hunt For Bali Bombers (AFP)

AFP, September 16, 2006

Australia's defence ministry has denied its army chief is on a secret visit to the southern Philippines this week to be briefed on a hunt for two suspects in the 2002 Bali bombings that left 200 people dead.

Contradicting Filipino military officials, Canberra's Defence Department said Lieutenant General Peter Leahy's trip to the Philippines was instead part of scheduled exchange of visits.

"The chief of the army is visiting the Philippines on a counterpart visit with the Philippine Army, that is all," a Defence Department spokesman told AFP, declining however to offer any details of Leahy's movements.

The denial came after Philippine military officials said Leahy flew Thursday to Zamboanga on the southern island of Mindanao where he was updated on the hunt for two fugitive members of the Jemaah Islamiyah (JI) extremist group.

The pair, Umar Patek and Dulmatin, are wanted for their involvement in the 2002 bombings on the popular Indonesian resort island of Bali in which 88 Australians were among the dead.

According the to Philippines military, Leahy was told that Filipino troops, backed up by US intelligence, had the militants surrounded in dense jungle on the nearby island of Jolo but is meeting strong resistance.

Regional military chief Major General Eugenio Cedo told Leahy that the JI militants were being sheltered by Abu Sayyaf, a local Muslim extremist group, in the jungle, the Philippine military said.

"Australia is concerned about the hunt for the two JI terrorists," said military spokesman Major Eugene Batara, adding that the country had offered to train Philippine special forces and help establish "riverine" units which were used during the Vietnam War to patrol waterways.

Philippines Defence Secretary Avelino Cruz said last March that Australia would donate 30 river boats to help hunt down JI suspects in the Mindanao marshways.

Australia's special forces commander Major-General Mike Hindmarsh visited Zamboanga last October but refused to speak to the press during his trip.

Yemen Foils Attacks On Oil Facilities (FT)

By Heba Saleh

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064196

Yemen said on Friday it had foiled two attempts to blow up oil facilities in different parts of the country, days after al-Qaeda urged Muslims to target western interests in the Gulf.

Only 35 minutes apart, one attack targeted a Canadian-Yemeni oil storage facility in Dubba port in Hadramawt province and the other an oil refinery in Marib in the north east of the country.

The Yemeni Interior Ministry said security men succeeded in exploding the bombers' cars, killing the four suicide bombers before they could do any damage. One guard was killed.

In the first attack, the ministry said that two cars were driven at great speed towards storage tanks filled with huge quantities of oil in the port of Dubba, but security men fired at the vehicles blowing them up before they could reach their target.

In Marib, security men also blew up two white cars similar to those driven by workers in the facility. The ministry said a spark from the exploding car strated a fire but that was brought under control.

The attacks come just days after Ayman Al Zawahiri, al-Qaeda's second-in-command, urged supporters to target oil installations in the Gulf region.

Yemen has been trying to shed its image as a haven for Islamic militants since 9/11, but the escape in February of 23 al-Qaeda operatives from a high-security jail in the country raised doubts in the United States about its commitment to the war against terrorism. Some of the escapees have since been recaptured but 14 remain at large.

They include a man convicted of involvement in both the bombing of the American warship, the USS Cole in 2000, and the attack against a French oil tanker two years later.

The attempts to blow up the oil facilties come amidst heightened security because of presidential and local elections due to be held on Wednesday.

President Ali Abdullah Saleh, already in office for 28 years, is seeking another term. He is facing a serious challenge from Fiasal bin Shamlan, a former oil minister backed by an alliance of the main opposition parties.

Suicide Attacks Foiled At 2 Oil Sites, Yemen Says (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Sept. 15 — Security officials in Yemen said they thwarted two suicide bombings of oil installations in the southern and central regions of the country early Friday. The four attackers and a security guard were killed, Yemen's Interior Ministry said in a statement.

Yemeni officials said an investigation was under way to determine who was behind the attacks, which came days after one of Al Qaeda's top leaders, Ayman al-Zawahri, threatened strikes against oil facilities in the Middle East that he blamed for "stealing Muslim oil." By late Friday, no group had claimed responsibility.

In the first attack, about 5:15 a.m., two cars sped toward an oil storage site near the Hadhramaut region, one driven by a man wearing a uniform similar to those worn by workers there, and the other by a man in a military uniform, the Yemeni authorities said. Guards opened fire on both cars, blowing them up outside the site. In addition to the drivers, a security guard was killed.

Shrapnel from the explosions sparked a small fire in one of the storage tanks, but it was quickly extinguished, the statement said.

About 30 minutes later, security guards at an oil refinery in Marib opened fire on two other cars that were carrying explosives and marked to look like vehicles used there. Both drivers were killed.

The attacks occurred just days before voters are to cast ballots in a hotly contested election pitting President Ali Abdullah Saleh against four challengers. Political analysts accused the government on Friday evening of capitalizing on the incidents to help Mr. Saleh's standing.

Yemen, a close ally of the United States in the campaign against terrorism, has long been a hotbed of extremist activity and recruitment. In February, 23 prisoners suspected of links to Al Qaeda escaped from a maximum-security prison in Sana, the capital. Fourteen of the fugitives remain at large. It was not immediately clear on Friday whether any of them were connected to the attack.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. Still In The Dark On Tracking Of Foreign Visitors (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - After spending $900 million to set up a database to track foreign travelers arriving in America, the government still doesn't know how many of them stay in the country illegally because the system is incomplete and snarled by controversy.

The US-VISIT system screens up to 2 million foreigners a month as they arrive at all international airports and seaports and at most border crossings. Visitors' personal information, fingerprints and photographs are logged electronically into a computer database and their names are checked against criminal records and terrorist watch lists.

But 10 years after Congress first ordered the system, the Department of Homeland Security hasn't set up a way for the same visa-holders to check out when they leave the country. Instead, the agency continues to test it at 14 airports and two seaports.

DHS officials said they didn't know when the checkout system would be launched nationwide because of the difficulty of creating a fast and effective method that travelers could use when they left the country.

"We're not ready," said Robert Mocny, the acting director of US-VISIT. "We're going to make sure before we put any exit system in place that we get it right."

With the program still up in the air, some DHS officials question whether the agency should spend millions more on a system that may lead to much longer delays at airports and border crossings without detecting a single terrorist.

"We need to have exit control but I'm not sure US-VISIT is the solution," said Jayson Ahern, who oversees the 322 U.S. ports of entry for Customs and Border Protection. "We need to find that right balance of something that provides the high level of security we need but at the same time allows us to move legitimate travelers."

Critics said the exit program might never be completed the way Congress originally envisioned it because of the lack of consensus within the agency and opposition from the travel industry and border communities.

"No government official is going to say publicly that they've given up on it because it's embarrassing," said Margaret Stock, an immigration attorney and lieutenant colonel for the Army's military police. "But the fact is, Congress mandated them to do this and they still haven't done it."

Congress ordered immigration authorities to set up a system to track foreigners in 1996 after the first terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, but the program never received enough money to get off the ground.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Congress renewed its mandate and promised the newly created Department of Homeland Security enough money to set up an entry-exit system.

Since US-VISIT launched three years ago, authorities have recorded 64 million visits in their database. They credit the new screening process with helping them to detect and turn back more than 1,300 criminals.

But Congress never set a deadline for a checkout system. The agency has spent $900 million so far, mostly on setting up new fingerprinting machines for arriving foreigners.

It's testing hand-held machines or kiosk checkouts for departing travelers, but officials said they wouldn't have a plan for a nationwide exit system until at least next year.

Mocny said his agency faced major challenges because U.S. airport and border crossings had never had the staff or resources to process people as they left the country.

"I think that's why Congress didn't give us a deadline," he said. "They told us to come up with a plan and that's what we're doing."

To determine whether a visa-holder has left the country, federal authorities rely on random checks of electronic passenger records or visa forms, known as I-94's.

A separate database tracks whether foreign students show up to register for classes. Recently, the student system alerted authorities when 11 Egyptians didn't enroll in their colleges as required by their visas.

But experts said the only reliable way to know how many people overstayed their visas and remained in the country illegally would be to require visa-holders to check out.

"Right now we really just have an expensive super-duper, high-tech entry system that doesn't make much sense to have," Stock said.

The gap in information helps fuel criticism of the Bush administration's proposed foreign guest-worker program. Opponents question how authorities would keep tabs on perhaps millions of new temporary workers if they can't keep track of tourists, students and business executives.

"An exit system is a very critical piece of having an effective immigration policy," said Jessica Vaughan, a senior policy analyst for the Center for Immigration Studies, a research center that advocates tougher immigration enforcement. "No matter what anybody feels about immigration, I think most people would agree that we should have a sense of who is authorized to be in the country and who isn't."

The ID Chip You Don't Want In Your Passport (WP)

By Bruce Schneier

If you have a passport, now is the time to renew it -- even if it's not set to expire anytime soon. If you don't have a passport and think you might need one, now is the time to get it. In many countries, including the United States, passports will soon be equipped with RFID chips. And you don't want one of these chips in your passport.

RFID stands for "radio-frequency identification." Passports with RFID chips store an electronic copy of the passport information: your name, a digitized picture, etc. And in the future, the chip might store fingerprints or digital visas from various countries.

By itself, this is no problem. But RFID chips don't have to be plugged in to a reader to operate. Like the chips used for automatic toll collection on roads or automatic fare collection on subways, these chips operate via proximity. The risk to you is the possibility of surreptitious access: Your passport information might be read without your knowledge or consent by a government trying to track your movements, a criminal trying to steal your identity or someone just curious about your citizenship.

At first the State Department belittled those risks, but in response to criticism from experts it has implemented some security features. Passports will come with a shielded cover, making it much harder to read the chip when the passport is closed. And there are now access-control and encryption mechanisms, making it much harder for an unauthorized reader to collect, understand and alter the data.

Although those measures help, they don't go far enough. The shielding does no good when the passport is open. Travel abroad and you'll notice how often you have to show your passport: at hotels, banks, Internet cafes. Anyone intent on harvesting passport data could set up a reader at one of those places. And although the State Department insists that the chip can be read only by a reader that is inches away, the chips have been read from many feet away.

The other security mechanisms are also vulnerable, and several security researchers have already discovered flaws. One found that he could identify individual chips via unique characteristics of the radio transmissions. Another successfully cloned a chip. The State Department called this a "meaningless stunt," pointing out that the researcher could not read or change the data. But the researcher spent only two weeks trying; the security of your passport has to be strong enough to last 10 years.

This is perhaps the greatest risk. The security mechanisms on your passport chip have to last the lifetime of your passport. It is as ridiculous to think that passport security will remain secure for that long as it would be to think that you won't see another security update for Microsoft Windows in that time. Improvements in antenna technology will certainly increase the distance at which they can be read and might even allow unauthorized readers to penetrate the shielding.

Whatever happens, if you have a passport with an RFID chip, you're stuck. Although popping your passport in the microwave will disable the chip, the shielding will cause all kinds of sparking. And although the United States has said that a nonworking chip will not invalidate a passport, it is unclear if one with a deliberately damaged chip will be honored.

The Colorado passport office is already issuing RFID passports, and the State Department expects all U.S. passport offices to be doing so by the end of the year. Many other countries are in the process of changing over. So get a passport before it's too late. With your new passport you can wait another 10 years for an RFID passport, when the technology will be more mature, when we will have a better understanding of the security risks and when there will be other technologies we can use to cut the risks. You don't want to be a guinea pig on this one.

Congressional Plan Would Bolster Disaster Agency (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — Congressional negotiators agreed Friday on a plan to restructure the Federal Emergency Management Agency that would give it somewhat more clout and responsibility, but still not as much as it had during the Clinton administration.

The compromise effectively ends the campaign by some in Congress to separate FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security and re-establish it as an independent agency reporting directly to the president.

Several alternatives to revamp the agency had been considered since its universally criticized performance after Hurricane Katrina.

Under the agreement, which will be inserted into a budget bill that Congress is scheduled to vote on this month, the FEMA director would still report to the secretary of homeland security, as he has since FEMA lost its independent status in 2003.

But the director, now R. David Paulison, would also be the principal adviser to the president for emergency management, a new role modeled on the relationship between the president and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who also report to the defense secretary. In a major disaster, the president could designate the FEMA director as a cabinet-level official.

“It is crucial that we strengthen FEMA and provide it with the resources and tools necessary to help us be better prepared,” said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and chairwoman of the homeland security committee.

FEMA, under the plan, would be in charge of preparing for disasters and responding to them. It would take back the agencies at the Department of Homeland Security that were removed from it last year and set up in a separate agency dedicated to preparedness.

The plan also calls for creating a National Operations Center to better coordinate response to catastrophes.

It would allow FEMA, with the permission of the president, to use “cost-effective semipermanent housing” for people left homeless in a disaster, instead of trailers.

And the plan would double the amount of money communities would be eligible for to protect against future disasters — like moving homes away from a river that often floods — to 15 percent of federal disaster relief. This so-called mitigation financing would be capped at $3 billion for one disaster.

Congress Agrees On Expanding FEMA (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

The Federal Emergency Management Agency would be expanded within the Department of Homeland Security, and FEMA's chief could obtain direct access to the president in a crisis, under terms of a compromise overhaul of the troubled agency announced last night by congressional negotiators.

Reached one year after Hurricane Katrina triggered a catastrophe on the Gulf Coast and a governmental emergency in Washington, the tentative deal would give the 2,500-worker agency more power to prepare for and respond to future disasters.

But the pact does not clarify whether FEMA would get more money to implement the scores of changes recommended by several post-Katrina reviews.

"It is crucial that we strengthen FEMA and provide it with the resources and tools necessary to help us be better prepared for the next hurricane or disaster. This agreement will move this legislation forward," Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said in announcing the deal with Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.).

The compromise now moves to a House-Senate panel that this month is hammering out a must-pass $33 billion Homeland Security spending bill.

The deal proposes increasing FEMA's $2.4 billion budget by 10 percent a year for three years, Collins's spokeswoman said. It also would increase emergency planning grants, now at $185 million, and boost funds for emergency medical and search-and-rescue teams, now $30 million and $20 million, respectively.

But there is no guarantee that budget writers will include the money, and congressional aides said the deal leaves out $3.1 billion to help the nation's 60,000 police and fire agencies communicate in emergencies.

"By refusing to provide desperately needed funds for interoperable communications, House Republicans and the White House have shamefully sold out our nation's first responders in an effort to score political points just weeks before the upcoming election," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.), a leading House Democrat involved in the talks.

Responding to flaws highlighted by Katrina, the deal would expand FEMA regional offices, reunite preparedness and response functions severed during the creation of DHS, set qualification requirements for its director, and protect it from department reorganizations by making it semi-independent, like the Coast Guard and Secret Service.

Immigration Reduces Big Backlog (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

The immigration service has nearly achieved its goal of processing immigration applications within an average of six months and will make an October deadline for eliminating the backlog, agency Director Emilio T. Gonzalez said yesterday.

"We're on track to get where we need to be, where we want to be," Mr. Gonzalez, the head of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS), which is part of the Homeland Security Department, told reporters yesterday.

The backlog elimination has been a major test for the agency that would have to administer any future guest-worker program, and members of Congress have been watching the effort's progress closely.

However, the goal will be reached in part because the agency no longer counts cases that are outside its control, such as those awaiting an FBI check.

With the former Immigration and Naturalization Service facing a backlog in the millions, Congress demanded in 2000 that the agency reduce processing time to six months.

In 2001, President Bush and Congress approved a $500 million package to pay for reducing the backlog. That allowed USCIS to shift employees and hire temporary employees to help.

"We have every expectation we'll be able to make the president a very happy person," Mr. Gonzalez said yesterday.

The backlog is defined as applications where the average processing time is more than six months.

In January 2004 the backlog reached 3.8 million applications. That has been whittled down to 1.1 million, and of that total just 139,000 are being delayed by factors under USCIS control.

USCIS officials call that smaller number the "net backlog," and that is the number the agency says it will eliminate by October.

In the case of applications for naturalization, for example, the average processing time dropped from 14 months in February 2004 to five months now.

A group of House and Senate members, mostly Democrats, wrote a letter last month calling on Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to rehire the temporary employees that helped reduce the backlog. The lawmakers said letting the temporary employees go would just cause the backlog to return, and said keeping the employees would make it easier to implement a guest-worker program.

"The Senate has already passed a comprehensive bipartisan immigration reform that has the support of President Bush. Passage of this legislation would make retaining these term employees particularly important, and we urge you to do so now," the lawmakers wrote.

The term employees were capped to a maximum of four years' work.

Mr. Gonzalez said the agency has hired many of them as permanent staffers, but he said he doesn't have the authority to keep them as term employees or the money to hire them all permanently.

The director also said officials are conducting a wide-ranging review of fees that will help restructure the agency so they can hire the employees needed to process applications in a timely manner.

Some members of Congress, and the Government Accountability Office in a report last year, have questioned how USCIS defines the backlog.

But Mr. Gonzalez said it makes no sense to blame the agency for a backlog in cases where the problem lies with another agency or when the applicant hasn't submitted all the information.

Of the about 1 million backlogged applications that are outside of USCIS control, 64 percent are for applications where a visa simply isn't available yet; 17 percent are for applications that are still lacking information; and 11 percent are awaiting an FBI name check. Another 8 percent have other issues.

Mr. Gonzalez also took issue with press reports that questioned bonuses the agency plans to give to most employees this month. Some employees have said they knew of other employees who cut corners to try to meet processing goals and earn the bonuses.

But the director said the bonuses are a way to reward solid work for the backlog reduction, and said the awards -- $500 for adjudicators who met production goals, were not disciplined and didn't "compromise process or program integrity" -- are a small token.

"Everything we've done is what every other federal agency does here," he said.

Illegal Immigrants Frequently Denied Compensation (MCT)

By Liz Chandler

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

CORAL SPRINGS, Fla. - Jose Hernandez was good with a machete. So he was the top choice when his boss needed someone to chop down young trees that were choking parts of Florida's Everglades.

On one trip to the swamps, the workers flew in by helicopter and quickly cut a stand of sprouting trees. But when they took off again, something went wrong: The chopper lurched left, then plunged into murky water.

To pay for his costly medical care, Hernandez filed a workers' compensation claim, which covered some of his bills.

Then, the insurance carrier, Florida Citrus, Business & Industries Fund, discovered that Hernandez was in America illegally, without work papers or permission from federal immigration officials. It halted all payments and left Hernandez to languish in a low-income Florida nursing home, unable to work to support his wife and four children in Mexico.

Thousands of illegal workers like Hernandez are hurt on the job every year in America, but don't get the compensation that's promised by law in every state.

Bosses often fire them, threaten them with deportation and commit an array of other misdeeds to avoid responsibility for workers' injuries. Some insurers refuse to pay their claims, citing reasons related to their illegal status.

As a result, injured workers often go without medical care or go to emergency rooms for treatment - and taxpayers get stuck with the bills.

"It's a violation of the American spirit," said Florida lawyer Gerry Rosenthal, who represents Hernandez. "Employers are hiring these people and pushing them hard to make a profit for the company, but when a worker gets hurt, they abandon him."

From field hands to garment workers to poultry processors to construction crews, injuries abound in industries that rely on an estimated 7 million undocumented workers, often to do dirty and dangerous jobs. Yet those who are undocumented are frequently cheated out of benefits that American workers have taken for granted for nearly a century, a McClatchy Newspapers investigation has found.

Federal labor officials haven't studied whether undocumented workers are wrongfully being denied compensation. But the exploitation is rampant, according to interviews with scores of illegal workers, employers, workers' comp lawyers, health care providers and workplace experts, and a review of lawsuits and workers' comp claims.

In one national study, university researchers surveyed 2,660 day laborers, most of them working illegally. One in five said he'd suffered a work injury. Among those who were hurt in the last year, 54 percent said they didn't receive the medical care they needed, and only 6 percent got workers' comp benefits.

Employers in at least 20 states, arguing that their employees shouldn't receive injury benefits because they're illegal immigrants, have fought and lost in courts and review boards. Among those employees were a California laborer who hurt his back lifting sacks of coffee, an Arizona auto mechanic who was hit in the eye by flying debris, a Maryland carpenter who cut his hand on a saw, and a North Carolina construction worker who suffered a brain injury when he fell 30 feet onto a concrete floor.

Juan Palacios, a 27-year-old husband and father from Guatemala, was working on the roof of a Florida home in March when a coworker accidentally splashed hot tar on him. Palacios fell 12 feet and smashed through a glass table and onto a tile floor. He was hospitalized for a week.

During that time, he heard nothing from his boss at Sunrise Roofing.

"They don't care about me," Palacios said. "I feel bad because I can't work. ... That's why I'm here."

Sunrise confirmed that it had employed Palacios, but its insurance carrier, the Insurance Company of the Americas of Bradenton, Fla., has refused to pay. It won't discuss the denial but said in documents that "there is no employee/employer" relationship.

Palacios remains out of work. He's scarred and in need of skin grafts, he said. He relies on his roommates to feed and care for him, and he's received nothing from Sunrise.

The U.S. Department of Labor tracks workplace deaths and injuries, but officials haven't assessed how undocumented workers fare. The only hint is the climbing and disproportionate number of workplace deaths among Hispanic and foreign-born workers, which includes many of those who are working illegally.

Workplace safety programs also are failing these workers, as the number of inspections and the staffers to do them has declined. The nation's 2,300 inspectors check 1 percent of 7 million employers each year, and critics say fines are so low that risky operators consider them a cost of doing business.

"The regulators are rooted in paralysis," said insurance analyst Peter Rousmaniere, who's studied abuses of undocumented workers in a dozen states. "They don't want to acknowledge these workers exist - so, in effect, they are allowing them to be abused."

Workers' compensation is regulated by the states, but most simply offer review boards to settle disputes. Few states look for abuses of undocumented workers, and some adopt regulations that freeze illegal workers out of injury benefits.

Florida recently rejected hundreds of workers' comp claims because they didn't include Social Security numbers, a procedure the state Supreme Court halted last year because the requirement violated privacy laws.

A few states - Florida, Michigan and Kansas - allow employers to limit benefits or fine injured workers who use phony Social Security numbers.

"What you have is 20th century legal principles trying to catch up with the 21st century reality of a global workforce," said Bill Beardall, a lawyer and professor at the University of Texas at Austin.

"It takes time - and persistent injustice - for us to figure out that the old rules don't fit." WORKERS' COMPENSATION

Workers' compensation is intended to protect labor and management.

The deal is employers pay for injured workers' medical treatment, partial wages, disabilities and deaths, and employees can't sue if they get hurt.

Every state requires such benefits, except Texas, which last year passed California to lead the country in workplace deaths of Hispanics. Workers comp is optional in Texas, but companies must cover all employees - legal and illegal - if they opt for the insurance.

While some states exempt tiny businesses and certain agricultural and domestic workers, almost all other workers are promised protection.

But employers have incentives to cover up injuries. Accidents drive up insurance costs and can attract investigators. And intimidation tactics work best against employees who speak little English, don't know their rights and fear the threat of deportation.

"They are terrified of getting fired or being deported," said Nan Lashuay, an assistant clinical professor and occupational health expert at the University of California, San Francisco. "There's a lot of pressure. Some of them have families who are literally on the verge of starvation. ... You can make here in a day what you make in a week in Mexico. And if you're deported, it can be extremely difficult to get back into the U.S."

Examples of abuse are widespread.

In Boston, when a Brazilian restaurant worker stabbed his hand with a knife, his supervisor, acting as translator, told doctors the injury happened at home, legal advocates said.

At a Mississippi poultry plant, bosses questioned the immigration status - then fired - an undocumented employee after he sought medical treatment for injuries to both arms, according to the worker and his case manager.

In Florida, a 15-year-old Guatemalan boy picking peppers was run over by a truck in the field, then dumped at a hospital 25 miles away with no name or contact information for his employer.

It's not unusual for bosses, known to workers only by nicknames and cell phone numbers, to abandon injured workers in unfamiliar areas without fear of reprisals.

"It's an ugly secret, and it's going on nationwide," said Texas lawyer Richard Pena, the chairman of the American Bar Association's immigration committee. "The employers and insurance companies profit ... (while) immigrant workers often go back to their home countries broken and in pain."

Insurers say they don't track how many illegal workers file for injury benefits or how many workers' families seek payment for deaths on the job. Most American companies take care of injured workers, employers say. They understand that the best way to keep productivity up and insurance premiums down is to run safe, responsible workplaces.

When someone is hurt, insurers say, they generally pay the claims, and immigration status doesn't arise. When it does, they interpret state injury laws conservatively.

"Most accept that illegal aliens should be compensated. That doesn't mean everybody is necessarily enthusiastic about it," said Eric Oxfeld, a Washington, D.C., lobbyist for businesses.

If injuries aren't reported, he said, "it has little to do with the employer, and everything to do with the workers' fear that he might be sent home."

SOME COMPANIES DISAGREE Some companies, however, continue to argue that undocumented workers shouldn't receive injury benefits.

Insurers may pay medical bills but refuse to cover workers' lost wages and retraining costs, arguing that the workers can't legally hold jobs and earn wages in the United States anyway.

"There are not across-the-board denials. My guess is that many thousands of illegal immigrants have been injured and treated through workers' comp," said Bob Hartwig, the chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute. "The problem is that many don't get to the door. ... Many of these people are intimidated in variety of ways by employers."

Some companies - particularly in competitive and dangerous industries - seek to gain an edge by hiring illegal workers and then cheating them on pay and injury benefits.

"It's a toxic cocktail," said insurance analyst Rousmaniere. "You have employers who have great incentive to cheat workers, and you have large numbers of illegal workers who will accept lower labor standards. It's causing our safety standards to erode - and that hurts legal workers, too."

One employers' trick is to go without workers' comp insurance.

Investigators say that kind of fraud is far more common than the much-publicized cases of workers who fake injuries. Offenders typically are small companies in high-risk pursuits, in which annual insurance premiums can cost 50 percent or more of a company's payroll. On average, companies pay about 1 percent of payroll toward premiums.

Employers also lie on payroll records - understating their size and job risks - to keep insurance costs down, which can leave workers without injury coverage.

Then there are more subtle tactics, such as the treatment an undocumented immigrant from South America got at a Mississippi poultry plant.

The worker slipped on a floor slick with chicken fat and landed hard, suffering two fractures in his back and a spinal dislocation.

The company-recommended doctor found no injury in his X-rays and cleared him to return to work, according to the worker and his legal advocates. He spent time sitting in a break room, too pained to work but prohibited from going home during work hours so the company wouldn't have to report the injury.

As the pain in the worker's leg grew, an orthopedic specialist finally examined the earlier X-rays and found the fractures, which required surgery.

"I can't work as I did before. I'm going to have pain for all my life," said the father of five, who asked not to be identified for fear of being fired.

He walks with a limp now. He gave up his $500-a-week job cutting bones from chicken thighs because he can't stand up for long periods. But he still works at the poultry plant, where he now makes $300 a week mopping floors.

"When you're cutting up chickens and working on a line where speed is everything, workers get cuts, broken fingers, repetitive motion injuries, or they get their hands caught in machines," said Anita Grabowski, who coordinates the Mississippi Poultry Workers Center near Jackson, Miss., which gets a steady flow of immigrant workers injured in area plants.

"They may see a company doctor or nurse, but many times they're given an aspirin or some cream and sent right back to the line that day. Their injuries are never reported, and they don't get the treatment they need," she said.

It was the insurance company, not the boss, that blocked benefits for Jose Hernandez. Adjusters for Florida Citrus, Business & Industries Fund began digging into his background on the day he lost his leg to the helicopter blade.

They quizzed his employer, Linda Rojas.

What's his history?

What kind of employee was he?

What documents had he provided when he was hired?

"They kind of hounded me to say things about him that weren't up to par," Rojas recalled. But "I wasn't going to say anything bad. ... He was an excellent employee."

Within a week, adjusters phoned Rojas with a decision: "We feel like he's an illegal alien, and we're going to use that to deny his claim," Rojas remembers the agent saying.

She didn't argue.

Rojas said she had mixed feelings. Hernandez deserved compensation because he was maimed for life, but she wasn't sure that an illegal worker should be entitled to benefits. So she left things to her insurer.

Florida Citrus declined to discuss the case, but in its denial, the insurer charged that Hernandez violated state law by making "false" or "fraudulent" statements about his identity.

When Rojas hired him, Hernandez presented a Social Security card he bought in North Carolina. He'd picked strawberries there, and before that, he'd planted shrubs in Kansas City, cut pines in Washington state and picked grapes in California, living and working in the United States periodically for more than a decade.

"The `false' statements Jose Hernandez made to get a job have nothing to do with his injury," said lawyer Rosenthal, of West Palm Beach. "This man was almost killed working for an American company. Isn't it right to compensate him?"

Florida Citrus settled the case for an undisclosed amount, but Hernandez remains in the Florida nursing home getting treatment, waiting to return to Mexico. His girls are 3 and 6 now, the boys 10 and 12. He hasn't seen them in three years.

"The important thing is that some money is there to take care of us," said Hernandez, 36. "I can't walk, but I'll keep trying to go forward. Thank God it didn't get my arm - with my hands I can do anything."

Rojas said she wasn't surprised when her insurer "dropped us like a hot rock" after Hernandez's injury. She paid double for a new policy and expects a price increase again this year.

She's not sure whether her company, Rojas Brothers Grove Service, can afford to stay open or can continue to find workers willing to wade into swamps to chop trees.

"Not everybody wants to do this kind of work," she said. "They're going into swampy areas where you've got snakes and alligators. ... It's rough work."

WAR NEWS:

Iraqis Plan To Ring Baghdad With Trenches (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 15 — The Iraqi government plans to seal off Baghdad within weeks by ringing it with a series of trenches and setting up dozens of traffic checkpoints to control movement in and out of the violent city of seven million people, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Friday.

The effort is one of the most ambitious security projects this year, with cars expected to be funneled through 28 checkpoints along the main arteries snaking out from the capital. Smaller roads would be closed. The trenches would run across farmland or other open areas to prevent cars from evading checkpoints, said the ministry spokesman, Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf.

"We're going to build a trench around Baghdad so we can control the exits and entrances so people will be searched properly," he said in a telephone interview. "The idea is to get the cars to go through the 28 checkpoints that we set up."

American officials said the military had approved of the plan, which has been in the works for weeks. General Khalaf said he did not know how much the construction would cost or how many laborers would be employed.

There has been a surge in the number of Iraqis killed execution-style in the last few days, with scores of bodies found across the city despite an aggressive security plan begun last month. The Baghdad morgue has reported that at least 1,535 Iraqi civilians died violently in the capital in August, a 17 percent drop from July but still much higher than virtually all other months.

American military officials have disputed the morgue's numbers, saying military data shows that what they refer to as the murder rate dropped by 52 percent from July to August. But American officials have acknowledged that that count does not include deaths from bombings and rocket or mortar attacks.

American commanders have made securing Baghdad their top priority. They have shifted troops to Baghdad to try to contain the sectarian conflict raging in the capital, which threatens to plunge Iraq into all-out civil war. A security plan promoted in June by American officials and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki involved setting up traffic checkpoints throughout Baghdad, but failed to quell the Sunni-Shiite sectarian violence, which reached a peak in July.

Last month, the Americans and the Iraqi government began a new tactic, flooding troubled neighborhoods with thousands of troops and doing searches block by block, then leaving battalions behind to try and win the confidence of residents.

That offensive began in southern and western Baghdad and is now moving into eastern neighborhoods controlled by the Mahdi Army, a powerful militia that answers to Moktada al-Sadr, a Shiite cleric.

It is unclear whether Baghdad can really be sealed off, given the city's circumference of about 60 miles. With so much terrain, guerrillas might find areas that are unconstrained by the trenches and checkpoints. On the main roads, traffic could be snarled for miles, especially in the final days of Ramadan, when people travel to celebrate with their families.

Studies are still being conducted to determine how traffic patterns will be affected. If the outer perimeter proves effective, then perhaps some checkpoints now being operated inside the city could be taken down, easing the traffic, officials said.

President Bush said at a news conference on Friday that the Iraqis were "building a berm around the city to make it harder for people to come in with explosive devices, for example." Military officials said the Iraqis had considered such a project earlier, but decided to go with trenches instead.

The wide cordon to be erected around the city is critical to the new security plan and will be completed within weeks, General Khalaf said. American and Iraqi officials have long said the capital is easily infiltrated because it abuts restive areas such as Anbar Province and the region to the south known as the Triangle of Death. Without a ring of security around Baghdad, insurgents and militiamen outside could return to areas cleared during sweeps, General Khalaf said.

Similar perimeters have been set up around troubled cities that are much smaller than the capital.

The most prominent example is Falluja, the insurgent stronghold in western Iraq that had 300,000 residents before a Marine-led siege in November 2004. Since then, the American military and Iraqi security forces have run the city as a mini police state, with people who want to enter required to show identification cards at checkpoints.

The American military built dirt berms with limited entry points around Samarra in the north and Rawah in the western desert.

The second-ranking American commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, stressed in an interview the importance of securing Baghdad. "I'll be perfectly clear with you, our main effort right now is Baghdad," he said. "It's our focus."

There are few quiet days in the capital.

Seven bodies were found in four different parts of Baghdad on Friday, an Interior Ministry official said. An American soldier was killed by a roadside bomb south of Baghdad, and another was killed Thursday night by a bomb northwest of Baghdad, the military said. A soldier was missing after an attack in Baghdad on Thursday in which a suicide car bomber killed two soldiers and wounded 30 others. In Anbar Province, a marine died in combat.

On the political front, a senior Shiite cleric rejected any immediate move to create autonomous regions in Iraq, further threatening a proposal by a Shiite politician to establish a legal process for partition.

The cleric, Ayatollah Muhammad al-Yacoubi, a fundamentalist Shiite, said that he believed in "maintaining the unity of the country" and that autonomous regions could not be formed without "preparing the proper conditions," according to a statement released Thursday by his office in Najaf.

The strong stand against autonomy by Ayatollah Yacoubi further calls into question the viability of a proposal for a mechanism to carve up Iraq that Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Parliament's Shiite bloc, tried to put to the Parliament earlier this month. Mr. Hakim has long been a strong proponent of creating a nine-province autonomous region in the south that would be ruled by religious Shiites and would include the country's main oil fields.

He called for Parliament to vote on a proposed mechanism much sooner than virtually anyone had expected.

Sunni Arabs generally oppose dividing Iraq because their provinces have little oil.

The bloc answering to Mr. Sadr, the Shiite cleric, later opposed any immediate move toward autonomy. Mr. Sadr and Mr. Hakim are bitter rivals, both struggling for dominance in the new Iraq, and both commanders of powerful militias that have skirmished several times since the American invasion.

Ayatollah Yacoubi is close to Mr. Sadr, and their united stand could be enough to block any serious consideration of autonomy for now.

Basim Sharif, an official in the ayatollah's Fadhila Party, said the ayatollah could decide to support the legislation if it included language saying that Iraq would not break up into autonomous regions anytime soon.

Security Ring For Baghdad Underway (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 15 -- U.S. military and Iraqi security forces have begun a massive effort to seal off Baghdad with a ring of reinforced checkpoints, berms, trenches, barriers and fences in an attempt to clamp down on insurgents, officials said Friday.

A few dozen checkpoints will be placed along key arteries in and out of Baghdad to ensure that people move through "predictable paths" that can be controlled, Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman, said late Friday night. Iraqi forces will man the checkpoints and patrol the terrain, with support from U.S. troops.

"We know there's a flow in and out of the city of those who are responsible for the violence," Johnson said. "The intent is to control Baghdad city."

The plans were announced on a day when officials said 52 bound and tortured corpses were found across Baghdad over a 24-hour period. Baghdad's body count has surged in recent days, despite a month-old push by thousands of U.S. and Iraqi forces to tame some of the capital's roughest neighborhoods.

The construction of a ring around Baghdad would be the most ambitious security endeavor yet for the U.S. military and its Iraqi allies as they try to block militias, death squads and insurgents from funneling in weapons, explosives, funding and recruits from outside the capital.

"The enemy is changing tactics, and we're adapting," President Bush said Friday in Washington. "The enemy moves, and we will help the Iraqis move. And so they're building a berm around the city to make it harder for people to come in with explosive devices, for example. . . . They got a clear-build-and-hold strategy."

The project is underway as sectarian violence is emerging as the biggest challenge to U.S. and Iraqi forces engaged in what some U.S. officials have called the Battle for Baghdad, a confrontation that might strongly influence the future path of Iraq.

"We're trying to knock down sectarian violence and go after those folks, those death squads that have caused this new form of violence, that if left unchecked could lead to civil war," said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. military officer in Iraq.

The effort to wrap Baghdad in a protective bubble is not a new tactic. In Fallujah, U.S. and Iraqi forces have controlled entry and exit since an assault by U.S. forces in November 2004. In the volatile town of Samarra, where the bombing of a Shiite shrine in February triggered the sectarian violence now ravaging Baghdad, the U.S. military has erected berms around the town. The dirt ridges, a few feet high, serve largely to channel traffic.

Johnson, the U.S. military spokesman, said the Baghdad project has been underway for a few weeks and that building has begun. The plan is to use the natural terrain where possible and reinforce existing barriers, "complementing them with trenches, in other places berms, and other types of fencing."

Such efforts are among the methods that counterinsurgency experts recommend to gain control over population movements. Yet some analysts also say that the United States has never taken what many of them contend is an essential first step: conducting a thorough census, then issuing identity cards and requiring all people to carry them at all times.

It is unclear whether the planned complex of berms, trenches and checkpoints will be effective in Baghdad, a megalopolis of 81 square miles that includes vast stretches of farmland and open terrain. Insurgents and members of private militias might still be able to avoid the checkpoints, and even if they don't, U.S. and Iraqi forces still face the problem of identifying them.

The Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which begins in October, is likely to increase the flow of people in and out of Baghdad. The Iraqi government, Johnson said, is trying to determine how the plan to seal Baghdad will affect the flow of vehicles in a city already clogged with heavy traffic.

The grisly discoveries of more bodies around the capital illustrated how serious the ongoing sectarian strife has become. According to Iraqi police officials, some of the corpses had disfigured faces. Most were shot in the head. All bore marks of torture. Some were found near a railroad track, others near a bus station. Five were beheaded. All were young men, in civilian clothes, between the ages of 20 and 35.

The bodies were dumped in both Shiite Muslim and Sunni Muslim neighborhoods, east, west and south of the Tigris River, which weaves through the heart of the city. In total, 114 bullet-riddled and tortured corpses have turned up since Tuesday.

Meanwhile, on Friday, five U.S. soldiers were reported killed. Military officials said they included two who were killed Thursday in a suicide bombing that also wounded 30 Americans west of Baghdad. Another American soldier died in combat in Anbar province on Friday, and two more were killed by roadside bombs -- one on Thursday in northwest Baghdad, the other in south Baghdad on Friday.

In the northern city of Mosul, a car bomb that targeted a U.S. patrol killed nine civilians, said Brig. Gen. Saed Jubury, a police spokesman.

In the political arena, a revered Shiite cleric indicated that he would not support a proposal to create a controversial autonomous Shiite region that many Sunnis and some Shiites fear could partition Iraq.

After a meeting with senior Shiite leaders, Ayatollah Mohammad Yaqoubi's office released a statement saying that Yaqoubi stressed "the maintenance of Iraq's unity and expressed his upset over the discord among the political parties and their preference for their factious interests over the public interests of the people."

The statement delivered another blow to efforts by Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, to pass a draft bill that would carve Iraq into a three-part federal system, including a separate Shiite region.

Sunni Arab political parties have accused their Shiite counterparts of trying to break apart Iraq and have threatened to boycott parliament. Both the Kurdish-populated north and the Shiite south are oil-rich, while most Sunni Arabs live around Baghdad or in Iraq's resource-poor western provinces.

Iraq To Dig Trenches Around Baghdad (AP)

By Rebecca Santana, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

Iraqi security forces will dig trenches around Baghdad and set up checkpoints along all roads leading into the city to reduce some of the violence plaguing the capital, the Interior Ministry said Friday.

To help halt that bloodshed, more U.S. troops have been shifted to Baghdad from the insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, a senior U.S. commander said.

Meanwhile, a U.S. Marine was killed Friday in Anbar province, and an American soldier was killed Thursday evening by a roadside bomb northwest of Baghdad, the military said. Five American soldiers died Thursday, making it an especially bloody day for U.S. forces.

A U.S. soldier is missing from a suicide bombing 30 miles west of Baghdad that killed two of those soldiers, U.S. military officials said.

The soldier "has been reported as Duty Status Whereabouts Unknown," the military said, without elaborating.

Neither U.S. military officials in Iraq nor in Washington would say whether they believed the soldier had been abducted or whether he may have been killed in the attack, and his remains had not been recovered.

An Iraqi civilian was killed and five others were wounded when a gunman on top of an abandoned building opened fire in a Sunni Arab neighborhood in central Baghdad, said police Lt. Ahmed Mohammed Ali.

A spokesman for a prominent Sunni Arab political party was shot and killed by gunmen, said a party official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he fears for his life.

Sheik Muhanad al-Gharairi was a spokesman for the Conference of People of Iraq, a Sunni Arab party headed by Adnan al-Dulaimi. He was also an imam at a mosque in Baghdad and was on his way to conduct prayers at a different mosque in Garma, 19 miles outside of Baghdad when he was killed.

The plan to dig trenches around Baghdad will be implemented in coming weeks, Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Kareem Khalaf told The Associated Press.

It comes as more than 130 people were slain in two days — either killed in attacks or tortured and dumped in rivers or on the city's streets.

"Trenches will be dug around Baghdad in the coming weeks when the third part of the Baghdad security plan is implemented," Khalaf said. Metropolitan Baghdad has a circumference of about 60 miles.

The security plan, known as Operation Together Forward, began June 15 and is being implemented in three phases. The first phase included setting up random checkpoints around the city, phase two began Aug. 7 and focused on the most violence-prone areas of Baghdad — mostly the Sunni Arab southern districts. Phase three reportedly includes cordoning off and searching other parts of Baghdad, including predominantly Shiite areas.

Khalaf said that except for the trenches, vehicle and pedestrian traffic would be restricted to just 28 entry points with manned checkpoints.

"We will leave only 28 inlets to Baghdad while all other inlets will be blocked. Supports will be added to the trenches to hinder the movements of people and vehicles. The trenches will be under our watch," he said.

He did not have any details, but did say that there would be no concrete walls or razor wire. Khalaf also did not know how deep or wide the trenches would be.

"They will surround Baghdad," he said of the trenches.

DOJ_NMG_0064209

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, a senior U.S. commander, said U.S. troops were shifted from Anbar province to Baghdad because quelling sectarian violence in the capital is a higher priority.

"The main effort is Baghdad, and we must ensure that we weight the main effort," Chiarelli said, using military terminology for drawing on available troops elsewhere in order to bolster the military effort in Baghdad.

In addition to extending the combat tour of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade and sending it from northern Iraq to Baghdad, a smaller unit was moved this summer from near Rawah, in Anbar province, to the capital. The 172nd was replaced by another Stryker brigade in the north, but the unit in Rawah was not.

Chiarelli said Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is "totally focused on ensuring that we keep what we need in Baghdad to do the job that we need to have done." He added that he believes that efforts to stabilize Anbar, which stretches west from Baghdad to the Syrian and Jordanian borders, are "moving in the right direction."

Both the Bush administration and military have said sectarian killings and violence are surging around Iraq and in the capital, although the military has said the attacks are limited to parts of Baghdad not yet included in the security operation.

A reduction in violence Friday was directly attributed to a vehicle ban went into effect around Baghdad to prevent suicide car bombers and others attacking worshippers during prayers. The ban is implemented every Friday.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, told the Security Council on Thursday that the average number of weekly attacks increased 15 percent and Iraqi casualties increased by 51 percent, compared with the previous three months.

One of the few positive developments for the U.S.-led coalition and the national unity government was the reported killing of a senior member of al-Qaida in Iraq and the capture of another al-Qaida leader.

The Interior Ministry said Abu Jaafar al-Liby, who it described as either the second or third most important figure in al-Qaida in Iraq, was killed by police earlier this week.

Four other insurgents were killed and two were arrested in the raid, a ministry spokesman, Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, told the AP.

Al-Liby was in charge of the Baghdad sector of al-Qaida in Iraq, Khalaf said. He said two letters were found on his body — one addressed to Osama bin Laden and the other to Abu Ayyoub al-Masri, who is thought to be al-Qaida in Iraq's leader. Both letters pledged loyalty and promised more attacks, Khalaf said.

The U.S. military also said it captured a senior al-Qaida figure and personal associate of the group's new leader during a Sept. 12 raid.

The man, who was not identified, led assassination, kidnapping and bomb-making cells in Baghdad, and played a key role in al-Qaida's activities in Fallujah before it was attacked by U.S. troops in November 2004, Caldwell said.

Shiite politicians, meanwhile, said they had made progress in trying to break a deadlock over legislation to establish autonomous regions as part of a federated Iraq. Sunni Arabs oppose the bill, fearing it could split Iraq into three sectarian and ethnic cantons. The proposed legislation, which could be introduced next week.

U.S. Frustrated By Pace Of Change In Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Officials praise many of Prime Minister Maliki's goals, including quelling militias. But his political ties make it difficult for him to pursue that aim.

WASHINGTON — Four months after Iraq's new government took office, U.S. officials are growing impatient with leaders in Baghdad and pushing them to move more quickly on the difficult agenda confronting them.

The top U.S. goal in Iraq is to help the regime led by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to suppress sectarian violence, strengthen the fragile government and economy and move toward national reconciliation, senior officials say. One of those officials, in a recent interview, praised goals Maliki had set in several of those areas, but suggested more could be done.

"The rhetoric has to be matched by concrete action," said the official, who asked to remain unidentified, citing the sensitivity of the subject. The Iraqi government "needs to begin acting, on the ground, on its own behalf."

Though the administration has confidence in the new prime minister, U.S. officials "are frustrated … there is a little bit of impatience," another senior U.S. official said.

President Bush has voiced similar sentiments, stressing U.S. patience and pledging continued support in an Aug. 31 speech, "as long as the new government continues to make the hard decisions necessary to advance a unified, democratic and peaceful Iraq."

U.S. officials maintained that the election of a full-term government last December would finally enable Shiite Muslims, Sunni Arabs and Kurds to agree on political accords, opening the way to peace and stability. So far, however, the Iraqi government continues to be divided by factional quarrels, and sectarian violence is spiraling.

More than 30 bodies of victims slain execution-style were found Friday. Over the last five days, 142 such killings have been reported. In addition, two U.S. troops — a Marine in Al Anbar province and a soldier in Baghdad — were reported killed. The U.S. military also announced a soldier had been missing since Thursday, when a bomb exploded west of Baghdad and killed at least two troops.

U.S. and Iraqi officials announced a new effort Friday to cut off the flow of weapons and bombs into Baghdad. The plan, announced by Bush during a White House news conference and confirmed by Iraqi officials, is to dig a series of trenches that would form a perimeter of about 60 miles around the city. Checkpoints on every road leading in would restrict entry into the capital, Interior Ministry officials said.

Overall, Iraqi government services have not improved and the most contentious decisions lie ahead.

Maliki, whose government was installed May 20, succeeded Ibrahim Jafari, another Shiite leader for whom the Bush administration at first had high hopes. But Jafari failed to deliver essential services, and it became clear that he had only vague plans for leading the country out of its predicament. U.S. officials lost confidence in him.

Should a second government fail, it would not only raise questions about Maliki's effectiveness but might indicate that anyone would have difficulty leading Iraq. Few in the U.S. government so far have suggested anything as drastic as another change in the leadership, although some, frustrated by the lack of progress, have voiced a private view in recent weeks that Iraq might be better off under a traditional Middle Eastern strongman.

"But that's not the policy," said the second senior U.S. official, discussing the idea of changing governments again. "The policy is to prevent that from happening by making this government succeed."

A key element in Maliki's program is the effort to reconcile the country's warring sects, tribes and militias. Committees have been formed and some tribal meetings have been convened. Yet the program remains in its early stages nearly three months after Maliki unveiled it.

The first senior U.S. official said that reconciliation was "a tough issue, but progress has got to be made." He said places such as Northern Ireland, Liberia and Ivory Coast had faced much the same challenge.

"Without a reconciliation deal, without a package which deals decisively and comprehensively with nongovernmental armed groups … you don't bring an end to any conflict anywhere in the world," the official said.

The Bush administration disagrees with the Iraqi prime minister on some issues, including Maliki's condemnation of Israel's July invasion of Lebanon to confront the Shiite militia Hezbollah. Maliki also disagrees with the U.S. military's efforts to strike at the paramilitary forces of Shiite leader Muqtada Sadr, who is one source of Maliki's political support. And this week, Maliki visited Iran, whose long-strained relations with Washington have grown increasingly acrimonious.

Despite their growing desire for action, U.S. officials say they recognize the difficulty Maliki faces in trying to lead a fractious government with only the narrowest base of public support. For example, though a top goal of both the Bush administration and the Maliki government is suppressing sectarian violence, it is difficult for the prime minister to try to bring pressure on groups associated with Sadr.

"People here recognize that it's a political reality that he depends on the votes of groups which, while not all dirty, have some ties to Shia death squads," the second senior official said. "He's a decent man, a serious person, but there are realities."

In addition to action to stem sectarian violence, U.S. officials want the Maliki government to move on a new investment law to bolster the economy as well as legislation to restructure the state oil company and set new rules for investing in Iraq's petroleum industry.

In an appearance at the Brookings Institution's Saban Center in Washington this week, Deputy Iraqi Prime Minister Barham Salih said the government had imposed a "very tough timetable" on itself for action on the legislative agenda.

He said parliament should pass the investment law this month, and next month should vote on a law to allow former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party to return to government and society. In December, the government will introduce its proposal for managing its petroleum reserves and adopt a law on the disarmament and re-integration of former anti-government militants, Salih said.

Analysts say the issues all are divisive and that action will be difficult. "There's no secret about what needs to be done, in broad terms, to put Iraq back together, in a national consensus," said Nathan Brown, a specialist in Arab politics at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "The question is, can it be done? The American frustration is only natural."

Another regional specialist said the Americans may have domestic reasons for publicly pushing the Iraqi government to move faster. "The goal here may be, 'Don't blame us — blame them,' " said Juan R. Cole, a veteran observer of Iraq at the University of Michigan.

U.S. officials say that also at the top of their agenda for Iraq is a renewed effort to draw financial and political support from regional governments and major world powers.

American government officials and their Iraqi counterparts have been frustrated by the reluctance of other countries to help what they see as the weak government of a troubled land.

The first U.S. official said that neighbors "have been very slow to move" to give political support, direct aid or even debt forgiveness. "That needs to change," he said.

A Time Of Killing, And Little Time For Why (LAT)

By Solomon Moore And Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Nearly 150 bodies have surfaced in Iraq this week, officials say. The toll is too heavy, the suspects too many, to bother with inquiries.

BAGHDAD — Some are largely intact — the flesh torn only where the bullets entered. Others are perforated by drill holes or slashed into ragged pieces. They lie in dusty ravines and pools of sewage, deserted roads and abandoned torture chambers.

Under normal circumstances, the bodies that appear every day in Iraq — 142 over the last five days, including more than 30 on Friday, Interior Ministry officials said — might be examined for clues by someone interested in solving the crimes. There is no shortage of potential evidence: handcuffs pulling the inert shoulders taut, blindfolds, a crowd of witnesses who saw the victim before masked assailants gunned him down in the street or stuffed him into a police car.

But in Iraq, there seems to be neither interest nor time for that. There are too many bodies and too many killers with too many ties to the nation's warring political factions.

Usually, the best anyone can do is point to a vague culprit — Shiite militias, Sunni insurgents, criminals and gunmen. The murderers are often as nameless as the victims.

A senior American official said U.S. personnel were investigating sites where corpses were recently found. U.S. officials are concerned that the killings may have been committed by Shiite-dominated government security forces in areas already secured by U.S. and Iraqi troops — inside jobs, in effect.

As part of a Baghdad offensive that started this summer, about 8,000 U.S. troops have stepped up patrols with Iraqi forces in an effort to bring order to the city's neighborhoods. But the Iraqi forces, particularly those controlled by the Interior Ministry, which include police and paramilitary units, are deeply intertwined with Shiite militias that have been linked to scores of extrajudicial killings.

The investigation has uncovered scant information, the U.S. official said. Victims are often found far from where they were kidnapped or killed, and forensic capability in Iraq is virtually nonexistent.

Iraqis have expressed skepticism about the security plan. And few seem to believe that investigations are necessary to unmask the killers. Many here seem to have a theory about who they are and why the violence increased last week. Generally, those theories support their political views.

Maj. Gen. Ali Hussein Kamal, intelligence chief of the Interior Ministry, said Sunni Arab terrorists and Baathists were to blame.

Ammar Wajeeh, a Sunni Arab political party member, blamed Shiite militias. "The militias are still terrorizing southern and northern Baghdad," he said.

Sheik Abdul Zahra Swaidi, a representative of the anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr, blamed Americans. "The occupiers are inventing the crisis," he said. "They are behind many explosions; we have proof of that. They are doing this to stay in Iraq."

The U.S. commander in charge of day-to-day operations in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, said Friday that he believed some of the body counts coming from Iraqi officials in recent days had been exaggerated. Chiarelli acknowledged an increase of violence, but said the stepped-up security effort in Baghdad had brought down the overall number of deaths in the capital.

"Some of the numbers that I've seen reported, and what happened in Baghdad yesterday … I cannot prove those numbers are correct, and again, they seem inflated, from my standpoint," Chiarelli said at a news briefing at the Pentagon.

"For some, I'm sure that there are agendas that are being worked, and I understand that," he said.

Iraq's Health Ministry, which oversees the Baghdad morgue, is largely controlled by officials loyal to Sadr, and American officials have suggested that the ministry is elevating death totals to undermine confidence in the U.S. security plan.

Iraqis also disagree with one another, and with American officials, over why the violence jumped so noticeably in recent days.

Some U.S. officials believe that Sunni Arab extremists have increased attacks to send a message to American and Iraqi troops that no matter how much security is bolstered, the insurgency will thrive.

Iraqi national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie said the killing of leaders of the group Al Qaeda in Iraq had hurt the organization, but might also have inspired it to ratchet up operations to prove it remained powerful.

"We believe that Al Qaeda every now and then tries to create a spectacular attack with a psychological impact to prove that they're still around and able to fight," Rubaie said.

But Suha Azzawi, a member of Iraq's parliament, said she suspected the death toll was being driven up by Shiite militias killing detainees to cover their tracks. Over the last year, several secret prisons run by militias have been uncovered.

"I think the most reasonable justification is the recent security sweeps in different areas of Baghdad, like Sadr City, Adhamiya and elsewhere, forced those who are detaining abducted Iraqis to kill them to avoid being captured," she said.

Whoever is behind the deaths and whatever their motives, they clearly have had an effect on U.S. policy. In a White House news conference Friday, President Bush acknowledged that violence in Iraq had dashed his hopes of being able to reduce the number of U.S. troops there. Troop levels now stand at 147,000, up about 20,000 from early in the summer.

"The unity government's intact. It's working forward. They're making tough decisions," Bush said. But, he added, the violence had prevented Gen. George Casey, the overall U.S. commander in Iraq, from recommending troop cuts.

"Hopefully, Casey would come and say, 'You know, Mr. President, there's a chance to have fewer troops there,' " Bush said. "It looked like that might be the case until the violence started rising in Baghdad."

U.S. Soldier Missing In Iraq After Blast (AP)

By Rebecca Santana, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0064213

A U.S. soldier was missing Friday, a day after a suicide truck bombing killed two soldiers and wounded another 30 west of Baghdad, U.S. military officials said.

The soldier "has been reported as Duty Status Whereabouts Unknown," the military said, without elaborating.

Neither U.S. military officials in Iraq nor in Washington would say whether they believed the soldier had been abducted or whether he may have been killed in the attack, and his remains had not been recovered.

"I'm sorry to add that we now have a soldier that we are counting as missing," Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli said in a video news conference from Baghdad with reporters at the Pentagon.

The attack occurred Thursday, when a truck driven by a suicide bomber exploded near an Iraqi power substation about 12 miles west of Baghdad, in an area where the U.S. troops were.

The soldiers had been guarding the power substation, U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said, adding that the blast occurred near concrete barriers, causing debris and shrapnel to be scattered across the area and inflicting many of the wounds.

Johnson could not comment on what type of explosives were used, whether there was more than one suicide bomber or whether the U.S. soldiers took any action against the vehicle before it exploded.

"The whole incident remains under investigation to determine how this happened and why," Johnson said.

Of those wounded in the attack Thursday, one was listed as very seriously injured and one as seriously injured, the military statement said. Eleven returned to duty, and 17 were slightly wounded, it said.

A total of five American soldiers died Thursday, making it an especially bloody day for U.S. forces. On Friday, a U.S. Marine was killed in Anbar province.

At least 2,678 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

U.S. Won't Abandon Fight In Anbar, Commander Says (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — The American military in Iraq will not abandon the fight against insurgents in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province despite a shift of troops toward Baghdad for a major operation to stifle sectarian violence in the capital, the second-ranking commander in Iraq said Friday.

The commander, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, of the Army, describing the Baghdad security mission as "our main effort," said he had ordered reinforcements to the capital from other parts of Iraq.

"Armies that don't weight the main effort really don't ever have a main effort," General Chiarelli told Pentagon reporters via videolink from his headquarters outside Baghdad. "And that's not the case with this force."

Even so, General Chiarelli stressed that the American military has not forsaken Anbar Province, a Sunni area stretching from west of the capital to the Syrian border that has been a haven for homegrown insurgents and foreign terrorists.

"We are not looking to walk away from that province. That is just flat wrong," said General Chiarelli, who is commander of day-to-day military operations in Iraq. "We are committed to the people of Al Anbar and will remain committed to the people of Al Anbar and do everything possible to make their life better."

General Chiarelli spoke at the end of a week in which it was revealed that a classified Marine Corps intelligence report on Anbar Province said security there would continue to deteriorate absent an infusion of money and an additional division's worth of troops.

After the report's contents were disclosed, the senior Marine Corps commander in Iraq, Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, said his force levels "are about right" for a mission that he described as primarily training Iraqi troops to take over the security effort.

General Chiarelli said the intelligence report's assessments of the problems in Anbar were "right on target." But he insisted that more troops would not guarantee success.

"I don't believe there is any military strategy alone, any kinetic operations that we can run alone, that will create the conditions for victory which we must have," General Chiarelli said. "The real heart" of the intelligence report, he added, was "that there are economic and political conditions that have to improve out at Al Anbar, as they do everywhere in Iraq, for us to be successful."

General Chiarelli also sought to erase any perception that a heightened emphasis on training Iraqi security forces to take over the mission from Americans meant that United States military forces had abandoned the goal of defeating the insurgency.

"We are fighting to win," he said. "But we understand that winning is a combination of a whole bunch of things in this insurgency we're fighting, and as I've indicated time and time again, this is different than any other fight I believe the United States of America has ever found itself in."

Iraq is not in a civil war, General Chiarelli said, but the threat has shifted from terrorist and insurgent violence to battling bombings and murders driven by sectarian tensions — although at times it is difficult to separate the motivation behind any single attack, he added.

As for whether Iraq is in a civil war, he said, "I state emphatically I do not believe it is, but I do believe sectarian violence is something we've got to get a handle on."

The general recounted conversations with local Iraqi officials across the country who told him the best route to lowering the level of violence is, "Find jobs for the angry young men."

To achieve economic progress, he said, "We need help, and we've got commitment from the Iraqi government for help. And as quick as we can get that help out there to start working those economic conditions, I think that that is, in fact, a strategy for victory."

U.S. Shifting Troops In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns, Ap Military Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

U.S. officials say they have not written off Iraq's troubled Anbar province — the country's largest, and one of its most violent — but neither are they sending more U.S. troops there to battle the insurgents.

In fact, they have shifted some troops from Anbar to Baghdad this summer, not because security conditions are improving in the western province but because they are deteriorating even more in the capital area. The Pentagon told Congress two weeks ago that Baghdad has some of the makings of an all-out civil war.

Anbar suddenly drew attention at the highest levels of the Pentagon this week with the disclosure in news reports of a remarkably pessimistic, secret assessment by the intelligence chief for Marines operating in Anbar. The assessment by Col. Pete Devlin said, in essence, that U.S. and Iraqi forces have battled to a stalemate with the insurgents in Anbar, and that economic and political breakthroughs are urgently needed.

Speaking to reporters at the Pentagon on Friday from his headquarters in Baghdad, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who oversees U.S. military operations throughout Iraq, said he agrees with Devlin's conclusions — but apparently not with Devlin's view that the situation cannot be rescued without an infusion of more U.S. troops.

"That's Pete's opinion," Chiarelli said when a reporter noted that Devlin called for adding thousands more troops.

When placed in the broader context of what's happening elsewhere in Iraq — namely the threat of civil war in Baghdad — U.S. commanders generally agree that Baghdad has to be a higher priority than Anbar, Chiarelli indicated. Therefore, the effort in Anbar should be seen as supporting, or secondary to, the Baghdad effort.

"That's what we're doing right now, and we're going to continue to do that until we get the conditions in Baghdad where they need to be," Chiarelli said.

The future of Anbar is in doubt, but Chiarelli strongly denied that U.S. officials consider it a lost cause.

"We are not, and I repeat we are not, looking to walk away from that province," he said.

In a telephone interview on Tuesday, the top U.S. commander in Anbar, Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, told reporters that U.S.-led forces were "stifling" the insurgency there but are not strong enough to defeat it. He said his main mission is not to defeat the insurgency but to train Iraqi soldiers and police.

"Now, if that mission statement changes — if there is a larger role seen for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight — then that is going to change the metrics of what we need out here" in terms of U.S. troop levels, Zilmer said.

Asked about that comment, Chiarelli said no one should doubt that the U.S. goal in Anbar is to prevail against the insurgents.

"It is our job to win, but winning is a combination of not only what U.S. forces do on the ground, but our Iraqi counterparts," Chiarelli said, adding that the government in Baghdad needs to follow through on promises to provide more resources for Anbar to revive the economy and get jobs for young men who are otherwise attracted to joining the insurgents, who offer higher pay than either the Iraqi army or police.

Barham Saleh, the deputy Iraqi prime minister, said Thursday during a Pentagon visit that he met recently with the governor of Anbar and promised to release "a lot of funds" to improve security and the economy.

"It's not just a matter of security operations," Saleh said. "People need to see reconstruction and they need jobs being made and so on."

Anbar has been an uphill struggle for U.S. forces since the war began in March 2003. It is populated mainly by Sunni Arabs, whose lost their grip on power to the majority Shiites when Saddam Hussein was toppled that April. The Sunnis have been the driving force behind the insurgency, whose main strongholds have been Fallujah and, more recently, Ramadi, the provincial capital.

In a Sept. 1 report to Congress on conditions in Iraq, the Pentagon said that from May 20, when the new Iraqi government was seated, through Aug. 6 there was an average of more than 30 attacks a day in Anbar — more than any other province in the country and slightly more than in Baghdad.

Of the 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, about 30,000 are in Anbar.

General Says Suppressing Violence In Baghdad Is Top Priority In Iraq (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Although U.S. military forces aren't giving up on defeating the insurgency in Iraq's Anbar province, their primary effort has shifted to quelling violence in Baghdad, the No. 2 American general in Iraq said Friday.

Lt. Gen. Pete Chiarelli acknowledged that a leaked classified intelligence report recommended that another division, about 10,000 to 15,000 troops, was needed to stabilize Anbar province, but he said the main effort now was to secure Baghdad. Some U.S. forces have been moved out of Anbar and other parts of Iraq and sent to Baghdad.

"That's what we're doing right now. We're going to continue to do that till we get the conditions in Baghdad where they need to be," Chiarelli said, speaking by teleconference from Iraq to reporters at the Pentagon.

Anbar province, which stretches west of Baghdad to the borders of Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, has long been a stronghold for the Sunni-led insurgency and al-Qaida fighters. The classified report, which was leaked this week, reportedly said that the political and security situation in the province had deteriorated so much that only more aid and another troop division could turn things around.

The commanding general of coalition forces in Anbar, Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, said Tuesday that he had enough troops for his main mission, which was training and recruiting Iraqi forces, but would need more to win against the insurgency.

His comments and the classified report were among the first acknowledgements that more troops would be needed to defeat the insurgency in Anbar.

President Bush brought up Anbar on Friday in response to a reporter's question about whether Iraq was in a civil war. He said Anbar hadn't been lost, adding, "That's not what our commanders think."

"No question it's a dangerous place," the president said. "It's a place where al-Qaida is really trying to root themselves."

A U.S. Marine was killed in Anbar province Friday, and two soldiers were killed near Baghdad by a roadside bomb. Five U.S. troops were reported killed in Iraq on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0064216

In its quarterly report to Congress earlier this month, the Pentagon said that although the struggle between Sunni and Shiite extremists seeking to control Baghdad was now the greatest threat to security in Iraq, the Sunni-led insurgency against coalition forces remained "potent and viable."

Chiarelli expressed dismay over the leak of the report, which was written by Marine Col. Pete Devlin, but he said its findings that more political and economic support were needed in the province were "right on target."

He said he didn't believe "there is any military strategy alone . . . that will create the conditions for victory which we must have."

Chiarelli said that when he asks governors and local officials what would help most to reduce the violence, "their number one answer, the thing they always tell us is, `Find jobs for the angry young men.'

"As quick as we can get that help out there to start working those economic conditions, I think that is, in fact, a strategy for victory," he said.

U.S. forces "will remain committed to the people of al Anbar and do everything possible to make their life better," he added.

Chiarelli said coalition forces had seen a 35 percent decrease in sectarian violence in the targeted Baghdad neighborhoods since security was tightened more than a month ago.

"I've been into every one of those areas," he said. "I've talked with the people. I've seen markets open up. I've seen people on the streets at times when there used not to be anyone on the streets."

Iraq's Ministry of Health reported earlier this month that more than 1,500 bodies were delivered to the Baghdad morgue in August, compared with 1,855 bodies that were reported delivered in July, an all-time high.

Coalition officials said their new figure, which shows the 35 percent decrease, didn't include victims from car bombings, mortar attacks or other mass-casualty violence.

Chiarelli said that opinions differ over what constitutes sectarian violence.

General Says Quelling Baghdad Violence Priority (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

U.S. troops were shifted from Iraq's Anbar province, where the insurgency is still strong, to Baghdad because quelling sectarian violence in the capital is a higher priority, a senior U.S. commander said yesterday.

"The main effort is Baghdad, and we must ensure that we weight the main effort," said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, using military terminology for drawing on available troops elsewhere in order to bolster the military effort in Baghdad.

Gen. Chiarelli, who is responsible for U.S. military operations throughout the country, said he may see Anbar through "a different lens" than even the U.S. commander in charge of the province.

In addition to extending the combat tour of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade and sending it from northern Iraq to Baghdad, a smaller unit was moved this summer from near Rawah, in Anbar province, to the capital. The 172nd was replaced by another Stryker brigade in the north, but the unit in Rawah was not.

Gen. Chiarelli said Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is "totally focused on ensuring that we keep what we need in Baghdad to do the job that we need to have done." He added that he thinks that efforts to stabilize Anbar, which stretches west from Baghdad to the Syrian and Jordanian borders, are "moving in the right direction."

"The forces that were taken out of al-Anbar and moved to support the Baghdad security plan were part of the process that I talked about, of winning the main effort," he said, adding that they were moved from a location that is "nowhere near any of the locations that you would commonly look at for increased violence in al-Anbar."

In a Sept. 1 report to Congress on conditions in Iraq, the Pentagon said that from May 20, when the new Iraqi government was seated, through Aug. 6 there was an average of more than 30 attacks a day in Anbar -- more than any other province in the country and slightly more than in Baghdad.

Of the approximately 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, about 30,000 are in Anbar.

DOJ_NMG_0064217

On Tuesday, the commander of U.S. forces in Anbar, Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, told reporters his main mission is to train Iraqi security forces, not to defeat the insurgency. "Now, if that mission statement changes -- if there is seen a larger role for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight," then it might require an infusion of U.S. troops, Gen. Zilmer said.

Gen. Chiarelli, however, said no one should doubt that the goal in Anbar is to win.

"We are fighting to win, but we understand that winning is a combination of a whole bunch of things in this insurgency we are fighting," he said, mentioning a requirement for more economic and political progress. Local Iraqi leaders in Anbar tell him, Gen. Chiarelli said, that their top need is "jobs for the angry young men."

Gen. Chiarelli also said he agrees with the central conclusions of a recent intelligence assessment by the top Marine intelligence officer in Anbar, Col. Pete Devlin, who wrote that more economic and political progress must be made to break what amounts to a military stalemate with the Sunni Arab-led insurgency there.

Gen. Chiarelli called on the Iraqi national government to do more to improve economic conditions in Anbar.

"Commitments have been made out in al-Anbar; I hope that those commitments come through and come through sooner rather than later," he said. "And when they do they will go a long way to our combined goal of winning in al-Anbar."

Anbar Called Secondary To U.S. Efforts In Baghdad (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

American troops face "significant challenges" in western Iraq's volatile Anbar region -- the deadliest province for U.S. forces -- but military efforts there are secondary to the priority of quelling sectarian unrest in Baghdad, the second-ranking U.S. commander in Iraq said yesterday.

"Al Anbar today is a supporting effort to what we're doing in Baghdad," Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, commander of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said in a videoconference with Pentagon reporters. "Baghdad is our main effort right now," he said, explaining why a battalion of U.S. troops was recently moved from Anbar to Baghdad.

On a day of sober talk about Iraq, Chiarelli also issued a dire warning on the risks of pulling out U.S. troops and allowing the country to slide into civil war, drawing an analogy from the 1980s Iran-Iraq war to suggest the loss of life from such a conflict could be staggering.

President Bush acknowledged serious problems in both Anbar and Baghdad yesterday, revealing that U.S. and Iraqi forces are constructing an earthen berm around the capital city of 5 million people and reinforcing checkpoints to try to stop the inflow of insurgent bombs.

Bush said he had hoped U.S. commanders would be able to reduce U.S. troop levels in Iraq, currently at about 140,000, until violence surged in Baghdad in June and July.

Anbar, Bush said, is "a dangerous place . . . a place where al-Qaeda is really trying to root themselves." But he rejected any suggestion that U.S. military had failed in the Sunni Arab insurgent stronghold. "This business about . . . 'Anbar is lost' is just not the case," Bush said.

Implicit in Chiarelli's remarks on Anbar was the idea that, given limited overall troop numbers in Iraq, American commanders must make difficult trade-offs as they concentrate forces in one troubled region at a time. "There's not a commander in the world who wouldn't say he could use more forces," he said.

Anbar has emerged as Iraq's most violent province, followed by the far smaller but more densely populated province of Baghdad. More than 30 percent of all attacks in Iraq from May to early August took place in Anbar, slightly more than in Baghdad, which ranked second for daily attacks, according to a Pentagon report released this month. More than 900 U.S. troops have been killed in Anbar since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, compared with more than 600 in Baghdad, according to the Web site iCasualties.org.

Chiarelli said he agreed with a classified intelligence report on Anbar that surfaced in the media this week, which concluded U.S. forces had fought to a military stalemate in Anbar as political and economic conditions there deteriorated. The report, by Col. Pete Devlin, intelligence officer for the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, is "right on target," he said.

"I don't believe there is any military strategy alone . . . that will create the conditions for victory," Chiarelli said. "We need the political support. We need economic support in al-Anbar," especially jobs for disgruntled young men, he said. The U.S. military will not abandon Anbar and is working to step up recruiting of Iraqi security forces there and improve their literacy, he said.

But asked for his reaction to the report's conclusion that another full U.S. ground division -- about 10,000 troops -- is needed to achieve success in Anbar, Chiarelli stated: "That's Pete's opinion." Troop levels in Anbar are appropriate, he said, "given conditions in Baghdad."

U.S. and Iraqi military operations reduced sectarian attacks in August in Baghdad neighborhoods, Chiarelli said, although he did not provide any statistics. Among the biggest problems, he said, are car bombs or other spectacular attacks that then prompt Shiite death squads to torture and execute Iraqis who are "picked off the streets, sometimes from lists."

Yet he warned that if a U.S. withdrawal led to civil war, the casualties would be far worse.

"If we're not successful . . . and Iraq would descend into civil war, the lens we look at and think about the casualties that could occur in that civil war may be totally different," he said, recalling his visit Thursday to an Iran-Iraq war battlefield on Iraq's southeastern border, where by official counts a million people perished in the 1980s.

One More Time, A Mission To Iraq (PHI)

By Edward Colimore

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 16, 2006

Three years ago, they were called up to serve in Iraq, in dangerous places such as Mosul and Hilla, south of Baghdad. Many of them came under sniper fire in convoys and were attacked by mortar rounds and rockets in their camps. Some were wounded. One was killed by a car bomb.

Now, members of the Army's Norristown-based 358th Civil Affairs Brigade are among the relatively few reservists heading back for a second tour of duty. Amid increasing violence, they will help restore electricity and water supplies, and reestablish hospitals, schools and law enforcement.

Post Your Comment

About 10 percent of reserve units across the country have been returned to Iraq, and that percentage is likely to increase if the American military presence continues, Pentagon officials said.

"My family is not happy about it, but they support me," said Maj. Christopher Lewis, 38, a 358th member and Coatesville resident who is married and has two children, 6 and 3. "I just got back, but I'm going over for another year.

"The kids don't understand; they just know I'm going away for a long time."

Under the present system, reserve units can be called back to Iraq a year after they have returned from a tour of duty, but the vast majority have not, said Pentagon spokesman and Army Reserve Maj. Nathan Banks.

The Defense Department hopes to create a six-year cycle that would require a unit that has served overseas to rest for two years, train for two years and have two years during which it can be mobilized, Banks said.

"We're trying not to overuse the soldier and his family," said Banks, 42, a Blackwood resident who also will be heading to Iraq this fall. "We're not there yet, but that's our future plan. That way, when you join a unit, you know its status."

About 20 percent of the National Guard force across the country have volunteered to return to Iraq, said National Guard Bureau spokesman Emanuel Pacheco. Troops trained as military police or engineers have been especially in demand.

National Guard troops normally are under control of the states, but they can be federalized by the Pentagon for national military service such as duty in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The military reserves are federal troops.

Active-duty members of the Marine Corps, who are usually more involved in combat roles, have seen three or more tours of duty, according to Banks.

This week, the troops in the 358th Civil Affairs Brigade were training at Fort Dix for their return. Among them were teachers, doctors, engineers, lawyers and environmental experts who spent Tuesday morning in a classroom learning how to tow a disabled humvee out of the "kill zone" without stopping - and without holding up a convoy.

They spent the afternoon getting hands-on instruction from Sgt. Steven Pyluck, 38, of Hightstown, N.J., who demonstrated a tow with humvees in an open field. They also practiced convoy and "aggressive" driving maneuvers that could help save their lives.

On Wednesday, the troops ran convoys through mock battles in which they came under attack by Iraqi role-players. They are scheduled to leave next Saturday for Fort Bragg, N.C., where they will undergo six weeks more of training before heading to Kuwait, then on to assignments in Iraq.

Col. Chuck Steinmetz, 49, of Drexel Hill, said about 20 percent of the more than 125 members of the 358th heading to Iraq served there in 2003 and 2004. The rest are new to the unit.

"Civil Affairs is a small community of reservists," he said. "It's like being in a family; they take care of one another. Many feel a duty to go back. Morale is high."

The last time Lewis, of Coatesville, was in Iraq, he helped coordinate operations and went on about 10 convoys, never coming under fire.

Others were not so lucky. A member of the 416th Battalion of the 358th was manning a gun turret of an armored humvee when a sniper shot him in the chest. He survived because of a bulletproof vest, with only the wind knocked out of him.

Col. Chuck Hutt, 48, of Langhorne, who helped train the troops this week, wanted the other soldiers to see the result of the shooting, and displayed the vest with an AK-47 round embedded in it.

Lt. Col. Paul Dougherty, 45, a Philadelphia native living in Exton, said he and other troops came under attack from rocket and mortar fire fairly regularly when they were in Iraq the first time.

"One of my buddies and another [soldier] were killed when a car bomb slammed into his [convoy] vehicle in Mosul in 2004," he said, referring to the death of Lt. Col. Mark Phelan of Green Lane.

One way of avoiding casualties is constantly training. "There are new lessons to learn," said Lewis. "The emphasis is on force protection. They brought in a trainer who just got back from Iraq to tell us about the latest tactics of the enemy."

While ducking bullets, the unit will be trying to rebuild Iraq and bring in humanitarian relief. The 358th "identifies the critical infrastructure needs," said Dougherty, a special-education teacher who plans to marry when he returns. "It means getting things turned on, whether it's electricity, water purification or a sewage system. It may mean getting a hospital or university going."

On his second tour, Sgt. Ryan Wildermuth, 23, of Coatesville, hopes to continue rebuilding the police department and local government.

"I worked on the public safety team with [Iraqi] firefighters, police and prison guards," said Wildermuth, who wants someday to join a police force or the Secret Service. "We were training and equipping the Iraqis, and you should have seen their faces when they got new equipment, things as simple as handcuffs and nightsticks. I'm proud to be going back."

Another member of the unit, Lt. Col. Kathy Brill of Philadelphia's Overbrook Park section, is also looking forward to the rebuilding mission. She has served Bosnia and Afghanistan and "is married to the Army."

"We don't know what they need until we get there," she said. "But we're trained to do all civil-affairs missions and work with the people and communities."

Col. Kevin McAleese, the 358th's spokesman, who lives in Philadelphia's Fairmount section, said that part of the mission for him in 2004 involved working with U.S. corporations and Kuwaiti officials to provide donated items such as sneakers, school supplies, medical equipment and computers.

As the training progressed at Fort Dix this week, Col. Toby Pennels, commander of the 358th, said he had "seen things over the past five days that I didn't anticipate - new tactics and procedures.

"I'm never above learning," said Pennels, a Portland, Maine, resident who leaves a wife and children for his second tour. "Everybody has got to know everything. The key is repetition."

In the back of everyone's mind, though, was family.

"My family is concerned but supportive," said Maj. Steven Hart, 44, a Plymouth Meeting resident who is married and has a 9-year-old daughter and 7-year-old son.

"But I tell them what they do is harder than what I'm doing. I'm trained well and confident."

Second Tour of Iraq

DOJ_NMG_0064220

About 10 percent of federal military reserve units across the country have been returned to Iraq.

About 20 percent of state National Guard forces across the country have volunteered to return to Iraq.

In Pennsylvania, 500 of the 15,000 members of Army National Guard and 10 of the 4,000 Air National Guard have chosen to go back.

In New Jersey, 2 percent to 5 percent of the Army National Guard's 6,000 members and about 20 percent of Air National Guard's 2,300 have volunteered to return.

Twenty percent of the more than 125 members of the 358th Civil Affairs Brigade served in Iraq three years ago and are heading back.

Iraqi Ambassador Accuses U.S. Of Stonewalling In Cousin's Death (FREEP/AP)

By Sarah Karush

Detroit Free Press/AP, September 16, 2006

SOUTHFIELD, Mich. (AP) -- Iraq's ambassador to Washington on Friday accused U.S. officials of stonewalling him in his efforts to find out what happened to his cousin, who was killed by the military near Haditha.

The military announced in July that it had completed an investigation of the incident and determined that a U.S. Marine acted in self-defense.

Ambassador Samir Sumaidaie said he learned of the investigation's result in March or April from Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq. He said he was promised a copy of the military's report on the case, but has not received it.

Sumaidaie called the delay "unsatisfactory."

"It sounds to me very much like bureaucratic stonewalling," he told The Associated Press in an interview in suburban Detroit, where he was meeting with members of the area's large Iraqi community.

A request for comment was left with the Defense Department press office.

The cousin, a 21-year-old engineering student named Mohammed Sumaidaie, was killed during a search of his family's home near Haditha on June 25, 2005.

Ambassador Sumaidaie, who at the time was Iraq's representative to the United Nations, has said his cousin was killed after he escorted Marines to a bedroom to show them where a rifle that had no live ammunition was kept.

In July, Maj. Douglas Powell, a military spokesman, said the Marine "acted properly in self-defense in response to unexpectedly encountering a man pointing an AK-47 at him."

Sumaidaie said Friday that he found the self-defense conclusion "incredible."

Mystery Deepens In Case Of Missing Colorado Marine (NYT)

By Mindy Sink

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

BOULDER, Colo., Sept. 12 — The story was compelling. A marine home on leave from his first tour of duty in Iraq was injured in a fall while hiking down a mountain with a friend and vanished after the friend went to call for help.

As one of the largest search and rescue operations in state history was under way, speculation ran high that the marine, Lance Cpl. Lance Hering, 21, might have lost his memory or become disoriented as a result of his head injury or that a mountain lion or bear had attacked him.

On the second day of the search, investigators began to have their suspicions and have since said that it was all probably a hoax and that the marine might be on the run.

“The mystery has gotten deeper,” said Lloyd Hering, the corporal’s father.

What is known is that Corporal Hering left his parents’ house on Aug. 29 to hike with a high school buddy, Steve Powers, 20.

The search for him lasted five days, using helicopters, dogs and hundreds of volunteers, before it was called off.

“It is certainly disappointing for that have all to have been a waste and unnecessary exercise,” said Kevin Harner of the Rocky Mountain Rescue Group.

DOJ_NMG_0064221

In the first days of the search, Corporal Hering's mother, Elynne, wore a T-shirt with the Marine motto "Semper Fi" as she combed the mountains. She later collapsed from dehydration and exhaustion.

Mr. Powers also joined the searchers, with many risking their lives.

Days after the search ended, Mr. Powers confessed to detectives that it had all been a set-up to help Corporal Hering avoid returning to Iraq. Mr. Powers, a student at the University of Colorado here, was charged with false reporting, a misdemeanor.

Calls to Mr. Powers's lawyer were not returned, and his father, answering a call to his house, said his son was not answering questions.

Corporal Hering's parents now say that they do not know what to believe and that they fear that their son may be a victim of foul play.

"There is no shred of evidence at all to confirm this man's new story," Mr. Hering said of Mr. Powers's confession. "It may be as completely false as the lies he told us all for 10 days."

Lloyd Hering is a Vietnam veteran, and the corporal's brother Brendan, 23, who flew in to join the search, is in the Air Force. The family has repeatedly said that Corporal Hering, who is due back at Camp Pendleton, Calif., on Monday, is a proud marine who would not flee.

"His parents have one perspective," the Boulder County sheriff's commander of detectives, Phil West, said. "A couple of people have come forward saying that Lance thought it would be cool to stage his own death and go live in a foreign country under an assumed name."

Commander West said Corporal Hering's access to $2,000 that he owed his parents and his criminal record were red flags. In 2004, Corporal Hering and Mr. Powers were caught trying to break into a store. They were given deferred sentences for the felony charges, but they have now violated their probation.

Commander West said the authorities would seek restitution for the more than $10,000 that the search cost.

Corporal Hering could face legal trouble with the Marines on charges of lying on his application — he did not mention his arrest — and desertion if he does not return to his base on time.

On Tuesday, Corporal Hering's parents returned to the rocks and rushing river of Eldorado Canyon to ask the public to help find their son.

"Our heartfelt thanks to the hundreds of volunteers," Lloyd Hering said. "We now know lots of places where Lance is not."

Iraqi President Travels To Colorado (AP)

AP, September 16, 2006

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani spent Friday in this posh mountain resort as part of an annual conference sponsored by a New York investment company, The Associated Press has learned.

Talabani's participation was confirmed by a U.S. State Department official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to make statements about the president's schedule. His arrival was first reported by the Aspen Daily News and KREX-TV in Grand Junction.

Talabani was expected to travel to New York this weekend and then to Washington for a private meeting with Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice next week, Assistant Secretary Kristen Silverberg said in Washington.

Talabani arrived late Thursday so he could attend the closed-door conference sponsored by Forstmann Little Co., the Daily News said. A spokeswoman at Forstmann Little said she could not comment, though the upscale resort 100 miles west of Denver often attracts political and corporate leaders for conferences.

Talabani, a Kurd who once took up arms against ousted dictator Saddam Hussein, was elected president last year. Earlier this month, Talabani said he expected fighting in Iraq to slow by the end of 2007 and that Iraqi forces will be able to handle any remaining violence.

Born in 1933 in the village of Kelkan, Talabani attended law school and in 1975 founded the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan. He led armed resistance against Saddam until 1988, when the Iraqi leader expelled Kurds from strategic areas in the north and gassed Kurdish towns near the Iranian border, killing tens of thousands of people.

After the 1991 Gulf War, Talabani and Kurdish Democratic Party leader Massoud Barzani began fighting over control of the north. A U.S.-sponsored truce was signed in 1998 and the two formed a Kurdish alliance.

Talabani's PUK also worked with the CIA in the months before the March 2003 invasion of Iraq.

Forstmann Little and Co. is a leading investment firm in New York run by sometime Aspen-area resident Ted Forstmann, now the chief executive and chairman of IMG, a media conglomerate best known for representing star athletes and sports organizations.

NATO Chief: More Troops For Afghanistan (AP)

By Paul Ames

AP, September 16, 2006

NATO's top commander renewed an appeal Friday for allies to urgently provide up to 2,500 troops for the battle with Taliban insurgents in southern Afghanistan, but officials said it likely would take two weeks before governments reply.

Gen. James L. Jones told a closed meeting of ambassadors from the 26 NATO allies that Poland's welcome offer of 900 troops in February had not diminished the immediate need for more troops, planes and helicopters, according to officials at NATO headquarters.

Diplomats said they expected the call for more troops to feature at a meeting of allied foreign ministers Thursday in New York, but said decisions likely will have to wait until defense ministers gather Sept. 28-29 in Slovenia.

They said governments needed time to assess what forces they could make available, to test political support for deployment and to find funding for such a mission.

Officials spoke on condition of anonymity because the meeting was closed.

Canada announced Friday that it was sending tanks and about 200 more soldiers to Afghanistan, bringing its total commitment to 2,500 troops.

Last week, Jones said the reinforcements were needed to pursue the Taliban before the onset of winter enabled them to take refuge in the hills.

Allies have been reluctant to commit forces, as they already are stretched by other international missions and are worried about the risk of high casualties from the tough Taliban resistance.

Although key allies such as Spain, Italy and Turkey have said they would not send combat troops, NATO commanders said they were confident of eventually getting the reinforcements. The delay, however, meant they had less time to be effective before the snows set in.

NATO has about 20,000 troops in Afghanistan. Most are engaged in peacekeeping and reconstruction efforts in the north and west, but since July about 8,000 troops — mostly from Britain, Canada, the Netherlands and the United States — have pushed into the Taliban's southern heartland.

They have been surprised by the ferocity of Taliban resistance and have sustained more than 30 deaths. NATO has said, however, that enemy casualties run into hundreds, and Jones told the ambassadors that an ongoing campaign to push the Taliban out of two key districts west of Kandahar was going well.

NATO Secretary Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said the possibility of speeding up the Polish deployment was being negotiated. Diplomats said funding from other allies could help facilitate an earlier deployment, and perhaps encourage other financially strapped eastern European nations to participate.

Canada's Defense Department said the reinforcements it was sending include an infantry company, a squadron of about 15 Leopard tanks, some military engineers to bolster Canada's provincial reconstruction team and a special anti-mortar unit.

The Canadian infantry will help protect the provincial reconstruction team while the tanks will provide some heavy-hitting combat support.

Danish Defense Minister Soeren Gade said his country may send special forces to support a separate U.S.-led counterterrorism operation in eastern Afghanistan. Denmark already has about 300 soldiers in southern Afghanistan with the NATO force.

Norwegian Deputy Defense Minister Espen Barth Eide also said his country's government is discussing whether to send more troops. He said no troops would be sent immediately. Norway's three-party coalition government is split on the issue.

Tensions Overshadow Gains In Afghanistan (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 15 -- Despite scattered gains by international troops fighting Taliban insurgents in the country's south, Afghan and foreign analysts here have voiced concern that a recent peace initiative is backfiring and that lapsed Afghan militias could be drawn into the conflict unless it is quickly quelled and replaced by aid and protection.

NATO and U.S. military officials here said this week that an intensive two-week operation against Taliban fighters in Kandahar province had been a tactical success, killing more than 500 insurgents and forcing others to retreat. Afghan and foreign forces also retook a district in neighboring Helmand province that had been seized twice by the Taliban.

But these pockets of progress on the battlefield are part of a larger, murkier political map. As other Afghan militias begin defensively rearming, ethnic tensions have risen, raising the specter of the kind of civil conflict that devastated the country in the early 1990s.

A call for additional troops by NATO's senior commander has so far drawn only one positive response, Poland's offer of 1,000 personnel. Military officials here say pro-government forces need to win key areas soon and to begin delivering aid and security if they are to halt the slide in public support.

"We can't just keep fighting endless battles without having something to offer the next day," a senior Western military official said. "We have killed a lot of Taliban, but they are not running out of foot soldiers, and for every one we kill, we create new families that hate us."

On Sept. 5, Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, announced a peace pact with domestic Taliban forces operating in the tribal areas of Pakistan along the Afghan border. The next day, he traveled here to promote the agreement and to try to ease tensions with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, saying the two leaders should work together to fight the Taliban and terrorism.

Under the peace deal, Taliban groups in Pakistan pledged not to cross the border to attack in Afghanistan. But since Sept. 5, assaults on Afghan and foreign forces near the Pakistani frontier have continued.

Musharraf, meanwhile, infuriated Afghan officials by making comments in Europe this week that equated members of the Taliban with Pashtuns, the largest Afghan ethnic group, and suggested they were more dangerous than al-Qaeda.

"Associating the Pashtuns with the Taliban is an affront to a community who is eager to establish security and sustainable stability all over Afghanistan," the Afghan Ministry of Foreign Affairs said in a statement. The ministry expressed "profound regret over Pres. Musharraf's attempt to attribute a murderous group and the enemy of peace to one of the ethnic groups living on the both sides of the Durand line."

The Durand Line, arbitrarily drawn by the British in 1893 to separate Afghanistan from what is now Pakistan, is a perennial irritant for both countries. It divides Pashtun tribal lands and is not accepted by many Afghans.

Many Afghans say they suspect that Musharraf's deal with Taliban forces in his own country is an attempt to wash his hands of a domestic problem and push it across the border into Afghanistan. At the same time, they say, he has gratuitously insulted a neighbor that had hosted him just days before.

Musharraf has stood by his pact and denied intending to give offense. He and Karzai are scheduled to meet separately with President Bush in Washington this month. The Bush administration strongly backs both rulers and is eager to patch up their tense relations. Since the overthrow of Afghanistan's Taliban rulers in late 2001, the United States has made a major investment in troops and money in an effort to bring stable and democratic rule to the region as an antidote to Islamic extremism.

Inside Afghanistan, persistent and widening attacks by anti-government insurgents have provided ethnic militia leaders in both the north and south with an excuse to regroup and potentially rearm their forces, many of which were disbanded after 2001 under an ambitious, U.N.-sponsored program.

In the Pashtun south, where Afghan army and police forces are underpaid, poorly equipped and scattered thinly across the conflict zone, the government has authorized local police forces to form auxiliary contingents, most likely drawing on idle former militiamen. In some cases, tribal leaders have threatened to form their own defense forces.

In the north and west, dominated by the Tajik and Uzbek ethnic groups, former Islamic militia figures who fought Soviet troops in the 1980s are said to virtually control daily life in many areas. Despite a new program to disarm and pacify the region, Afghan and foreign observers said some commanders appear to be gaining further strength as the Taliban threat draws closer and villagers seek powerful patrons to protect them.

"In the north, they ask how they can be expected to disarm if the south is arming itself," said one Western diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity. Ethnic divisions are so deep in Afghanistan, the diplomat added, that if the Karzai government were to fall, civil conflict might resume almost immediately.

"Five years ago, the Taliban were very weak and the warlords had all fled the country," said Sayed Daud, director of the Afghan Media Resource Center, a nonprofit research agency. "Now the Taliban are back and the warlords are back. They have made a lot of money, they have weapons, and the government can't touch them."

The insurgency continues to spread beyond the south. In the past week, fresh attacks have taken place as far apart as Ghazni province in the east, where Taliban and NATO forces have been battling over several villages, and Farah province in the far west, where 150 Taliban fighters stormed the provincial capital and others shot and killed an Afghan U.N. employee.

But the most urgent need, military officials and diplomats said, is to contain the southern conflict, defeat the insurgents in key districts of Kandahar and Helmand, and begin providing support to civilians there.

British and Canadian troops have fought intensely and suffered numerous casualties since NATO took over command of the southern front from the U.S.-led coalition on July 31. But military and diplomatic observers cited concern that forces from other NATO countries, operating under narrower mandates laid down by edgy governments, will not shoulder enough of the burden.

"A great deal is at stake here for NATO. It's their first operation outside Europe and an important test case," said one foreign observer. "If the fighting worsens, some members may ask whether it is worth the risk, and some may ask why they should put their soldiers in harm's way while others are sitting in easy places."

Even more is at stake for Afghans, who felt abandoned by their Western supporters after Soviet troops withdrew in 1989 and now fear the same could happen again. NATO and U.S. military officials reiterated this week that their commitment is long-term, but they also said time is running short.

"It took us four years to learn how to operate here. NATO doesn't have four years," a U.S. military official said. "It's not enough to kill Taliban. We're trying to help build a government that is weak and still fighting off the competition. That's the really hard part."

4 Taliban Militants Die In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, September 16, 2006

About 60 suspected Taliban militants attacked a police checkpoint in southern Afghanistan, starting a battle in which four militants died, police said Saturday.

The clash occurred Friday in the Khas Uruzgan district of southern Uruzgan province, said Mohammad Zahir, the district police chief.

The militants attacked a checkpoint near the district police headquarters, and NATO and Afghan soldiers came to the aid of the police, Zahir said. He said there were no casualties among the Afghan security forces or NATO.

Police recovered the bodies of the four suspected Taliban, Zahir said.

NATO has about 20,000 troops in Afghanistan. Most are engaged in peacekeeping and reconstruction efforts in the north and west, but since July about 8,000 troops — mostly from Britain, Canada, the Netherlands and the United States — have pushed into the Taliban's southern heartland.

They have been surprised by the ferocity of Taliban resistance and have sustained more than 30 deaths. NATO has said enemy casualties run into hundreds.

Afghanistan Body Count Raises Skepticism (APY)

By Matthew Pennington

AP, September 16, 2006

NATO's estimate of Taliban killed this month has created skepticism and worry in Afghanistan, with local officials saying that either the militant force has grown bigger than imagined — or too many innocent Afghans are being killed.

NATO says its forces, backed by the Afghan army, have killed more than 500 Taliban militants near Afghanistan's main southern city of Kandahar in Operation Medusa, a sweep launched Sept. 2.

The figures, if accurate, make it the deadliest battle since U.S. warplanes bombed the extremist militia, host of Osama bin Laden, out of power in late 2001.

"If they kill that many, the Taliban must have thousands of fighters on that front," said Mohammed Arbil, a former Northern Alliance commander. In the recent past, Taliban units have been described in terms of dozens or hundreds at most.

But NATO has stood by its battle assessments as solid, even conservative.

One official with the military command, called the International Security Assistance Force, said internally circulated estimates of militant dead were more than double the tally released to journalists.

"We'd rather have a lower figure that we can back up than a higher one that stretches your willingness to trust us," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

NATO says the high toll is due to its superior firepower, including fighter jets and artillery, compared to the Taliban militia's roadside bombs and assault rifles. It says it avoids civilian casualties by warning residents to evacuate.

The inability of journalists to reach the area has made it virtually impossible to check the figures.

Hundreds of families displaced from the war zone, in the Panjwayi district, are also in the dark, and don't even know if their homes are still standing.

The onslaught has dispelled any doubts that NATO, which recently took over in southern Afghanistan, is willing to use overwhelming military force. But Afghans, while eager for the Taliban uprising to end, have mixed feelings.

In the capital Kabul, there's disbelief that so many guerrillas could be killed and citizens escape unscathed. In Kandahar city, closer to the battle, there's dismay over the intensity of the fighting, and calls for peace talks.

"Who are these Taliban? They are Afghans," said Mira Jan, a displaced 42-year-old grape farmer from Panjwayi. "NATO and the government must convene a ulema (Muslim clerics') council with tribal elders and convince the Taliban to stop fighting."

By all measures, the Taliban have stepped up their attacks this year. NATO forces that took charge of security in the south last month expected hit-and-run guerrilla tactics, but instead have often faced well-organized militant forces that stand and fight.

Nowhere has that been more apparent that in Panjwayi, a rural district of dried-mud houses scattered among orchards where hundreds of Taliban militants had massed, posing a threat to Kandahar city, the former stronghold of the hard-line Islamic regime, just 15 miles away.

NATO launched Operation Medusa to wipe out the militants.

When NATO announced by the second day of the offensive that its artillery and airstrikes had killed more than 200 militants, skeptical journalists without access to the action — following a government warning that anyone straying off the main road could be shot as suspected Taliban — pressed for details: where were the bodies and how are they counted?

"Your know what you can see through a telescope? We have those kind of capabilities all over the battle field," said NATO spokesman Maj. Scott Lundy. "We are reliant on every soldier on the battlefield to feed up the information that they have, from what they have seen through weapons' sights and with other surveillance assets. It all gets thrown into the mix."

Lundy said such estimates are "imprecise," but stressed that NATO makes every effort to make them as accurate as possible and usually goes with a conservative number. "We would be quite happy to speak about military success without going into the detail, but it's what the media want," he said.

To date, NATO has reported at least 517 militants dead compared to 20 from its force, 14 of them in an accidental plane crash.

The Taliban has denied suffering such high casualties. Neither side has offered details about how many militants have been wounded.

According to an Associated Press count based on reports from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials, 2,800 people have died so far this year in violence nationwide, including militants and civilians — about 1,300 more than the toll for all of 2005.

Andrew Krepinevich, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington, said that given the circumstances in which the Taliban had massed in one place, the figures given by NATO were plausible and could well be an underestimation, because of the effort the Islamic militia makes to bury their dead quickly.

He also said that given NATO's aim to create secure zones, they had little incentive to inflate the death toll.

"I have no suspicion they are trying to widely inflate the casualty numbers. They are not trying to measure success that way anyway," Krepinevich said in a telephone interview.

"They would be trying to measure success in terms of the population feeling secure, is reconstruction proceeding, is commerce growing."

Insecurity has clearly prevented any progress on those counts. And the alliance's success in battle has induced little optimism among Afghans that NATO — struggling to marshal enough forces for its mission — is close to defeating the resurgent Taliban.

"All these bombardments leave behind a bad name for the international community for killing Afghans," said Taj Mohammed Wardak, a former Afghan interior minister. "It will only create more motivation for revenge."

Top Arrests Soon To Cut Off Afghan Drugs Trade: US Official (AFP-Y)

AFP, September 16, 2006

Some of the key players behind Afghanistan's record-high opium trade are expected to be brought before court over the next year, a top US counternarcotics official said.

The arrests would be vital to a strategy to stem the increasingly sophisticated narcotics trade before links between insurgents and drug traffickers become entrenched, Thomas A. Schweich said on Friday.

"I think you are going to see some big people being prosecuted over the season ... over the next 12 months," the US deputy assistant secretary for international narcotics told reporters in Kabul.

There have been doubts about the will of the authorities to round up the kingpins of the trade, as some of them are allegedly in top positions in government.

Afghanistan's opium production soared to a record 6,100 tonnes this year, a nearly 50 percent jump on the previous year. This was despite Afghan and international efforts costing millions of dollars to cut output.

Schweich said there had been a "very slow start" to a two-year-old strategy to fight the drugs trade, but he was confident the plan was the correct one and would pay off if implemented more aggressively.

The "carrots" of the strategy, such as development help for areas that cut production, and the "sticks" -- eradication, interdiction and prosecution -- had not been as effective as they could have been, he said.

And in the southern province of Helmand, which produces more opium than any other province in Afghanistan, top officials "practically encouraged poppy growth," he said.

But there had been small improvements: interdiction of drugs had doubled over the past year to two percent of the volume, and about four times more of the crop was eradicated, although this only came to a low 16,000 hectares (39,500 acres).

The total area under cultivation was 165,000 hectares.

"We don't need to change the fundamental strategy, I think it will work given enough time," Schweich said.

The official said the United States had "no doubts" that insurgents were getting money through the narcotics trade.

It was important that this relationship be stopped before the financial ties between them became too strong, entrenching unrest, he said.

And while heroin production was also increasing inside Afghanistan, the narco-industry was not as sophisticated as in countries like Colombia, he said.

"There is a window of opportunity here in Afghanistan to prevent that level of sophistication ... but we have to act very quickly," Schweich said.

Afghanistan's Catch-22 (WSJ)

By Dana White

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

"Hong Kong harbor? Well, that's not all that different from my view here in Kabul," quips Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the commander of U.S.-led coalition forces in Afghanistan, as we begin our telephone interview. The three-star general is chipper, given how far he is from the creature comforts of our last encounter -- a black-tie affair at Washington, D.C.'s Ritz-Carlton.

It was inside the Beltway that I noticed the general's striking resemblance -- both physically and intellectually -- to Gen. Douglas MacArthur, the military man who rebuilt Japan six decades earlier. A fluent Mandarin Chinese speaker and a Harvard and Stanford graduate, Gen. Eikenberry, like MacArthur, is a brainy soldier. And like MacArthur, he's trying to come to grips with "an unprecedented undertaking," as he puts it: the reconstruction of an entire country, from scratch.

From an armchair in Washington or Brussels or Tokyo, it's hard to grasp the magnitude of the security problems that U.S. forces, and the NATO troops operating separately from the U.S.-led coalition, are facing. Modern-day Afghanistan has rarely existed in this, its current form. It was a notional nation -- bound more by kinship and ethnic tribalism, than nationality or rule of law. After the Soviets withdrew and the country fell into civil war, the country was ripe for the Taliban to settle in, but they, too, couldn't tame the rugged Afghan outback and provincial warlords and strongmen.

"In my 33 years in the military, I have never seen tougher terrain than here," says the general, who adds that the "vast majority of the country" is now secure. "There are about five or six provinces that have significant security challenges and they are primarily in rural areas." Translation: Kabul and major cities are calm, but in the southern and eastern provinces, where the government hasn't established its authority, violence prevails.

In some regions, peace admittedly won't come easily, if at all. Take the border with Pakistan, which is roughly twice as long as California -- and twice as mountainous. Gen. Eikenberry says the area can't physically be secured, no matter how many boots are planted on the ground. True, Pakistan has committed nearly 80,000 troops to the effort, but the general -- while lauding the cooperation between the Pakistani and Afghan forces, which are old foes -- avoids questions about why Taliban insurgents are still finding safe haven in Pakistan.

Other areas, however, could be secured, and haven't been -- particularly the southern provinces. In recent months, Taliban fighters seized on the transfer of control from U.S. to NATO forces and engaged in pitched battles. NATO's top commander said last week that he needs 15% more troops to effectively roll back the Taliban threat. They may not get there before the Afghan winter sets in and the Taliban retreats into well-fortified caves.

"The insurgents are better equipped and better trained than they were a year ago," Gen. Eikenberry says. "People often fail to understand the full complexity of the violence here. There are several causes for violence in these provinces, including land disputes, tribal feuds and property titles. Taliban fighters often capitalize on these existing divisions to garner support in local communities."

Gen. Eikenberry understands the root of the problem. And it's a big one. In 2005, Afghanistan earned $2.7 billion in opium exports, or 52% of its GDP -- plenty of cash to support an insurgency. That fighting has, in turn, basically halted all of the infrastructure build-out that was meant to provide Afghan farmers and other rural residents alternatives to growing poppy.

"In traveling around the country, the top concern of Afghans is unemployment, education and irrigation," Gen. Eikenberry confirms. But to address these issues -- and here's the catch-22 -- violence in rural Afghanistan must first be quelled. If it isn't, the infrastructure that will facilitate trade cannot be built.

It's not the military's job to tackle the drug trade head on, Gen. Eikenberry explains. He argues that it's a police matter that should be handled by Afghanistan's police force (which is not nearly as well-trained as the army). Rather, the U.S.-led coalition forces assist local law enforcement with intelligence gathering, training, medical assistance and some combat power, he explains.

But even with military assistance, Afghanistan's law enforcement is woefully ill-prepared to uproot the firmly entrenched drug enterprise. NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer reiterated last week that NATO forces wouldn't take a leading role in combating the Afghan drug trade. But calls for change are growing: This week even the United Nations called on NATO to take up the fight.

Afghans have been growing opium for centuries, and without a practical alternative, they will continue to grow the cash crop. Despite the Karzai government's effort to eradicate the plant, and $780 million in U.S. aid to promote crop replacement, old habits die hard. In many rural areas, there are no schools or hospitals, and water is scarce. The population is largely illiterate. It will be hard for Kabul's democratic methods to take root as long as the violence continues, and no roads or schools are built. "It's going to take education. And it will take a long-term international commitment. It was never going to be easy." Gen. Eikenberry says. "There are some fundamental problems that have no easy answers."

Since NATO relieved U.S. forces in southern Afghanistan in July, more than 500 suspected Taliban fighters have been killed. "The insurgents are no match for the forces here and can be managed," Gen. Eikenberry says. While the general is confident the military can suppress the insurgency, it's unclear whether the violence can stop long enough for the government to provide viable alternatives to Afghans. That's not a question for the general, but for the politicians.

Alternative Futures (WT)

By Paul Greenberg

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

I knew Jay Rockefeller was a U.S. senator from West Virginia, but before now I had no idea what a seer the man is.

Not only can Mr. Rockefeller peer into the future and confidently tell us how it turns out, he can turn the clock back to the past, specifically March 2003, and, like a projectionist putting in an alternate reel, show us the better future that might have been. If only the United States and its allies had not invaded Iraq, Swami Rockefeller explains, the world would be a better place today -- even if Saddam Hussein were still in power.

How does he figure that? Well, Saddam "wasn't going to attack us. He would've been isolated there. He would have been in control of that country, but we wouldn't have depleted our resources." It's all right there, in the senator's crystal ball.

But two can play at this purely speculative game. Turn the clock back to 1936 and ask what would have happened if the West, instead of appeasing Adolf Hitler when he started his aggression by remilitarizing the Rhineland, had stood up to him.

Suppose an Allied expeditionary force had crossed the Rhine early on and deposed Der Fuehrer in a blitzkrieg of its own -- but then found itself bogged down in a guerrilla war, having to fend off suicide bombings, improvised explosive devices, and attacks on the freely elected government that had replaced the Brownshirts. Who knows what would have happened?

But surely this is certain: Some isolationist senator with Mr. Rockefeller's gift for second-guessing would have explained how much safer the world would have been if only we had let Hitler stay in power, obnoxious little irritant that he might be. After all, "He wasn't going to attack us. He would've been isolated there. He would have been in control of that country but we wouldn't have depleted our resources."

But as it happens, the Free World did appease Herr Hitler. Again and again, until it was almost too late. And we all know the result: the most disastrous war in the history of the world.

Back in the present, the president of the United States continues to speak out for his strategy in this war on terror, or whatever History in its wisdom/hindsight, will call it.

Was the president's address from the Oval Office this week political? He was accorded the airtime on the major networks because it wasn't supposed to be political -- and in the narrow, partisan sense, it may not have been.

But it was certainly a political speech in the broader sense, laying out the president's grand strategy in this contentious conflict. In particular, his address to the nation emphasized his faith in freedom as the best defense against a fanatical enemy, one as devoted to violence and tyranny over others as the fascist movements of the last century.

Reasonable men may agree or disagree with the president's policy, but fair-minded Americans will recognize his sincerity. For there is no reason other than honest belief for this president to pursue a course that has imperiled his popularity and divided the country.

George W. Bush could have laid back, temporized just as his immediate predecessors did, and allowed Saddam to remain in power in Iraq and the Taliban in Afghanistan. He could have treated terrorism, even on a September 11, 2001, scale, as a matter of law enforcement rather than war. Instead, he has moved boldly against a great and growing threat.

Mr. Bush's presidency could turn out as tragically as Lyndon Johnson's or Woodrow Wilson's, other presidential idealists. Much depends on the patience and perseverance of the American people. Or he may yet prove as farsighted as Franklin Roosevelt or Ronald Reagan in understanding the threat to the Free World in their time.

But this president continues to plead his case, and his refusal to swerve from its basic justification, even in difficult times and as the leader of an increasingly divided nation, testifies to his honest convictions. One need not share those convictions to recognize that the man has some, and will fight for them.

Winners And Losers Five Years After 9/11 (FT)

By Jurek Martin

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

I am not sure there are many words left to say after a week like this. But perhaps it is worth thinking about the winners, big and small, of that awful day five years ago rather than dwelling on the losers, of whom there are far more.

At a personal, insignificant level, I confess 9/11 was good for me. I was in a kind of male, menopausal funk, writing too little, spinning my wheels, generally uninspired. Even the golf game was bad.

At ten that morning, as I was glued to the TV, the phone rang. It was Johannesburg, amazingly, on the line, Caroline Southey, a dear friend and former colleague then editing South Africa's best magazine. She had five hours to press time. "Give me all you can," she ordered.

I did, 4,000 words in all. I don't really know if they were good, bad or indifferent but I was back doing what I had done for 35 years, writing hard and fast to a deadline. Another old friend told me later that week: "Think how miserable you'd have been if this happened and you had nobody to write for."

The funk disappeared just like that.

Moving up the cosmic scale, my wife benefited from 9/11, though she first feared the worst. The think-tank she had co-founded, the Migration Policy Institute (MPI), had opened its doors on 3/11, with just enough backing from foundations to get going.

When the stock markets reopened and lost an immediate bundle, cutting into foundation endowments, she thought MPI would be virtually stillborn. But suddenly the world wanted to know more about immigration and national security. They rushed out a paper on the subject within two weeks – and haven't looked back since.

At the national and global level, Paul Wolfowitz also seized the moment. (I invoke his name as the symbol of the neo-conservative movement.) Then deputy secretary of defence and now head of the World Bank, he talked about toppling Saddam Hussein as early as 9/12, at Camp David, with the president.

As the world now knows to its cost, the neo-cons, using 9/11 as their pretext, hijacked American foreign policy and still have not lost full control of it. They did not even have to tell the truth to justify their goals. (Wolfowitz himself had admitted that weapons of mass destruction were little more than a convenient rationalisation.) Intelligence was manipulated to prove their point.

And when Iraq went sour, Wolfowitz had no compunction in blaming a cowardly press that didn't have the guts to go out and report the good news. I will never forgive him for that. This was the man who never set foot outside Baghdad's Green Zone without protection from battalions of American troops.

But it is all part of the piece. Mendacity and exaggeration have profited enormously from 9/11. Just this week the ABC "docu-drama" The Path to 9/11, seemed to imply that if Bill Clinton had not been dallying with an intern Osama Bin Laden would be six feet under. It was unadulterated CSI vs al-Qaeda rubbish, much more fiction than fact.

But we keep reading that more and more Americans believe, courtesy of internet babble, that the US government somehow took down the twin towers on 9/11 and that the plane hijacks never happened. Surely not even Michael Moore would concede the Bushies are good enough to pull that one off.

It is almost as if FDR's great dictum "we have nothing to fear but fear itself" has been taken to exactly the opposite extremes he intended. Fear has unleashed the xenophobia that powers anti-immigrant sentiments in America; fatuously, it gave us "freedom fries" in the US Congress.

It also made beneficiaries of non-American universities, only too happy to accommodate the foreign students who used to come here in droves but found short-sighted national security considerations putting obstacles in their way. This will hurt America over the longer term.

Others have come out ahead of the game, too. As John Tierney wound up his New York Times column a week ago, "the terrorist threat is still small; it's the terrorism industry that got big." It is one of those comments, saying it all, which I would give my eye teeth to have written.

It is an industry that is all around us, when we board planes or watch "experts" pontificating on TV when they are not writing books without number that raise the fear factor further. Government deficits soar as the industry grabs even more of the federal and state dollar.

Fear even frames the national debate or will be seen to have done if the president and his Republican strategists succeed in turning back the tide that ought, objectively, to engulf them in the November mid-term elections.

After all, it worked in 2002 and 2004.

But mostly the biggest winners were those who found a voice, even in, or because of, their own losses. It was the widows of 9/11 who forced a secretive government to form an independent commission to investigate what happened and why. It may not have found all the answers but it surely increased national awareness – and that is a blessing in these fear-ridden times.

Turkey's Iraq Problem (WP)

By Lenore G. Martin

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Although the world is paying more attention to Hezbollah and the Iraq insurgency, there's another guerrilla group that poses a severe threat to the stability of the Middle East.

The Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), operating from havens in northern Iraq, has been attacking Turkish security forces in southeastern Anatolia and occasionally civilians elsewhere. Turkey is determined to prevent a repetition of the 1984-99 guerrilla war with the separatist PKK, in which it suffered more than 30,000 deaths. It has mobilized a large force on its Iraqi border and is threatening to invade northern Iraq.

A Turkish invasion would create chaos in that part of Iraq and potentially destabilize the region. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's response -- moving to reinvigorate a tripartite commission made up of the governments of Turkey, Iraq and the United States -- is insufficient. The United States needs to take much firmer action to stop the PKK guerrilla war from undermining its Middle East policy.

In the previous guerrilla war, the PKK operated from Iran, northern Iraq and Syria. Syria also gave sanctuary to Abdullah Ocalan, the PKK leader. Saddam Hussein and then the British and the Americans, under their no-fly zone, permitted Turkey to attack the PKK in northern Iraq. After Turkish troops massed on the Syrian border, the late Syrian leader, Hafez al-Assad, expelled Ocalan, who was eventually captured and imprisoned in Turkey.

The PKK then declared a cease-fire but renounced it in 2004. During the current Iraq war, the United States has prevented Turkish forces from crossing into Iraq, contributing to Turkey's frustration and the current crisis.

If the United States does not oppose a Turkish invasion it will face a more chaotic situation in Iraq and the loss of a long-term relationship with the Iraqi Kurds, who are Washington's best hope for obtaining rights for U.S. bases in the future. If Washington opposes the invasion, it risks further estrangement from Turkey, a state positioned to play a critical strategic role in a region where Iran increasingly challenges the United States for dominance.

Turkey fears Kurdish irredentism coming from an independent Kurdistan. The Iraqi Kurds perceive a Turkish invasion as aimed at controlling oil-rich Kirkuk, thereby denying the Iraqi Kurds an economic base for their independence. Furthermore, Turkish intervention in Iraq would create a terrible precedent for Syrian and Iranian intervention in the Iraqi civil war.

What should the United States, Turkey and the Iraqi Kurds do to avert this crisis?

Difficult as it may be for the Iraqi Kurdish leaders, they must be willing to deny the PKK havens in northern Iraq and prevent PKK leadership from traveling freely throughout the country.

The Turks, for their part, must more assertively address the cultural, political and economic demands of the Kurds in southeast Anatolia, an area suffering from high unemployment and in need of economic development. To its credit, Turkey has already begun the process of increasing Kurdish cultural rights. Encouraged by its European Union accession negotiations, Turkey has passed laws giving Kurds the right to speak and publish in Kurdish and, to a more limited extent, to broadcast and teach Kurdish.

Recognizing minority rights has been a difficult accommodation for a state that is proud of the integration of its Kurds and their full participation in every aspect of society, including parliament and the cabinet. The Turkish state generally views all of its citizens simply as Turks and believes that recognition of ethnic differences would threaten the cohesion of its political life. On the other hand, by increasing Kurdish cultural rights, Turkey will give greater voice in government to its Kurds and dilute the appeal of the separatism advocated by the PKK.

For its part, the United States needs to avert a Turkish invasion of Iraq. It must throw its full weight behind efforts to eject the PKK from northern Iraq. Furthermore the United States needs to pressure Europe more energetically to block the transfer of funds to the PKK, which it has classified as a terrorist organization. It cannot rely on a tripartite commission to stop the next guerrilla war in the Middle East.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

House Panel Pursues Key Figures At HP (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

The firm's chairwoman and lawyer are asked to testify in the spying flap. A shareholder files suit.

A congressional panel wants to question key figures in the scandal surrounding Hewlett-Packard Co.'s investigation of media leaks, and a shareholder lawsuit was filed in state court accusing the company's top brass of breaching their duties.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee sent letters Friday requesting that HP Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn and General Counsel Ann O. Baskins appear at a Sept. 28 hearing of its oversight and investigations subcommittee.

HP spokesman Mike Moeller declined to say whether either would testify.

"HP is fully cooperating with all ongoing investigations and inquiries, including the one being conducted by the House subcommittee," he said.

Silicon Valley attorney Larry Sonsini, who served as an outside legal advisor to HP during its investigation, was also asked to appear, as was Ronald DeLia, who runs a Boston-area private investigation firm that was hired by HP to conduct the probe.

Calls to Sonsini and DeLia were not immediately returned.

The congressional panel has been conducting an inquiry into "pretexting," the practice of impersonating people to access their personal information.

Dunn has acknowledged that she authorized the probe, in which private investigators hired by HP used Social Security numbers and other personal information to pose as company directors, employees and journalists to gain access to logs of their home and cellular phone calls.

The probe resulted in the resignation of two HP directors and the demotion of a third. George A. Keyworth II quit the board after acknowledging he was a source of the leaks. Thomas Perkins stormed out of a May 18 board meeting in protest of the investigators' tactics. Dunn will step down as chairwoman in January and be replaced by HP Chief Executive Mark Hurd.

As HP's staff attorney, Baskins allegedly oversaw the leak investigation and declared it to be legal.

HP insiders and contractors are likely to invoke their 5th Amendment right against self-incrimination rather than testify before Congress and possibly expose themselves to criminal charges, one legal expert said.

"Though the appearance will be gruesome … to do otherwise might not be prudent," said Ed Harmon, a partner with Thorp Reed & Armstrong in Pittsburgh.

The lawsuit was filed Thursday in Santa Clara County Superior Court by Juliet Worsham on behalf of all HP shareholders. It alleges "substantial expense and damage" to the company from the investigators' use of pretexting and seeks to have Dunn, Baskins, Hurd, DeLia and several members of the HP board found to have breached their fiduciary duties and abused their power.

It asks for the defendants to reimburse Hewlett-Packard for any financial damage suffered by shareholders as a result of the pretexting scandal and to "reform and improve its corporate governance and internal control procedures."

HP spokesman Moeller declined to comment on the suit.

California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer has said HP insiders and the outside investigators are likely to face criminal charges tied to the pretexting scandal. The FBI and the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California are also investigating, as are the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Federal Communications Commission.

Also Friday, Carly Fiorina, ousted as HP's CEO last year, steered clear of the scandal during a speaking engagement at Babson College in Wellesley, Mass. An audience member asked her how she would handle the controversy if she were Dunn, but Fiorina declined to answer.

HP's stock, which has been all but immune to the boardroom scandal, fell 7 cents to $36.18.

A Clubby World Turns Aggressive And Combative (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

The once-clubby atmosphere of the public company boardroom has undergone a makeover during the past several years, as board members become more willing to flex their muscle and aggressively press management for changes.

Since early 2005, directors of some of corporate America's biggest names have pushed out their chief executives. At American International Group Inc. and Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., the board members acted in response to concerns raised by prosecutors. The head of Pfizer Inc. lost his job amid criticism over his $83 million retirement package as the company's share price slumped and the rollout of new drugs lagged.

The unfolding scandal at Hewlett-Packard Co. -- where the company's chairman, who was concerned about leaks, ordered an investigation of directors' phone records that may have been conducted illegally -- offers an extreme example of the new tensions inside some boardrooms.

Legal analysts, governance experts and directors agree that the nature of boardroom politics has changed in the years since Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. collapsed and directors of both companies were held personally liable for investor losses. New stock exchange listing standards that require a majority of directors to be independent of company management, the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law that lays more responsibility on boards and pressure from shareholder activists have combined to change how directors view their jobs.

"It's been a dramatic change in the last five years. It's the era of the empowered independent director," said Richard H. Koppes, former general counsel of Calpers, the California state employees pension plan, who now sits on the boards of two public companies.

Governance experts were quick to note that the situation at Hewlett-Packard is unusual and that its woes seem to stem from a board that was feuding and dysfunctional. They also noted that while the board voted to remove Patricia C. Dunn as chairman, they allowed her to stay in place until January and keep her seat as a director. But the governance experts said the mess should serve as a cautionary tale for newly assertive directors on how not to handle disagreements.

Independent directors now hold 81 percent of board slots at companies on the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, up from 77 percent in 2001, said Julie H. Daum, who heads the board services practice at the search firm Spencer Stuart.

Many of the new outsiders are former regulators and retired executives who have been welcomed by longtime directors and management for their expertise. But board deliberations at some public companies have been complicated by pressure from large activist shareholders -- such as hedge funds and private equity funds -- to add directors who have a specific mandate to push for change.

General Motors Corp., for example, recently added Jerry York to its board under pressure from investor Kirk Kerkorian, who has acquired a nearly 10 percent stake in the automaker. Similarly, Acxiom Corp., an Arkansas data integration firm, headed off a proxy fight with the investment firm ValueAct Capital Partners in August by adding ValueAct managing partner Jeffrey W. Ubben to its board.

In 2001, Ubben's firm took a large stake in Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia Inc., and he joined its board. When the firm's founder and namesake ran into legal trouble, Ubben assumed the chairman's role and helped the company survive Stewart's conviction and imprisonment.

"They're bringing the boardroom back to where it was originally in the 1920s when large shareholders were managing the company," said Charles M. Elson, director of the University of Delaware's Center for Corporate Governance. Management-appointed boards are a more recent phenomenon that sprang up when companies grew too large for single individuals to hold a significant stake, he said.

But the result has been a bit of a culture shock for directors and management accustomed to a less contentious era.

"Compared to a generation ago, boards take longer to reach common agreement because people are more outspoken," said Phil R. Lochner Jr., a former Securities and Exchange commissioner who sits on the board of five public companies. "Older directors often still view things from a management point of view or are more supportive of management. Younger directors who supported Sarbanes-Oxley tend to be more outspoken and more willing to challenge things."

A few boardroom struggles have turned into all-out war. Take, for example, Atmel Corp., a Silicon Valley chipmaker where the five independent directors banded together to fire chief executive George Perlegos, his brother and two other top executives. Perlegos responded by filing a lawsuit arguing that his termination was unlawful because he had already called a shareholder meeting to remove the directors. The lawsuit is pending.

"Anybody who believes that CEOs are protected by clubby boards hasn't looked around lately," said William J. Holstein, editor in chief of Directorship magazine. "People are beginning to worry whether boards are being too aggressive in pushing out CEOs rather than giving them time to work out a strategy."

Even companies with famously accommodating boards, such as Home Depot Inc., are starting to feel the heat. The home improvement chain recently yielded to shareholder pressure and changed the way directors are elected to require candidates to get a majority of votes cast rather than a simple plurality.

The nature of the boardroom -- confidential and consensus-oriented -- has put some limits on what would-be activists can do, the governance experts said. Though an individual director may want to challenge management, he or she has only one vote and must win the respect and support of the rest of the board to have much impact.

"It's something that has to be done over a period of time. If [a new director] comes in and says, 'I'm new to the board and I think we should break up the company tomorrow,' that's not going to be terribly well received by people who have worked at this for a long time," said Theodore L. Dysart, who heads board practice for the consulting firm Heidrick & Struggles.

Directors also have to keep in mind that they are charged with representing all shareholders, not just a particular group that put them on the board, governance experts said. And just about everyone agreed that leaks -- particularly of market-moving information -- are an absolute no-no.

"If you disapprove of the action that's being taken, then there's not a whole lot you can do except resign," said Charles H. King, head of global board services for Korn/Ferry International.

In Grasso Case, Justice Ramos Rules On Himself (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

His Own Fairness Questioned, He Declines to Step Aside; Interest in Particle Physics

The legal battle over the paycheck of the New York Stock Exchange's former boss -- was he overpaid, or not? -- took an unusual twist this past week: The judge had to make a ruling on his own conduct.

On Thursday, Justice Charles Ramos declined to remove himself from the case, despite an argument by lawyers for Dick Grasso, the NYSE's former chief, that the judge couldn't be fair. One reason: Twice in recent years, Justice Ramos applied for a job on the NYSE's board, which decides what to pay executives at the stock exchange.

Mr. Grasso was paid more than $100 million in 2003, his last year on the job, He's being sued by New York state's attorney general on the grounds that he didn't deserve that much money at the exchange, now owned by the publicly traded NYSE Group Inc.

It's not the first time that the 64-year-old Justice Ramos, of the state Supreme Court (a trial-level court in New York), has played a big role in a controversial case. In 2002, he took the surprising step of trying to cut the $625 million in fees claimed by lawyers involved in a tobacco-related lawsuit, calling the size of the sum "offensive." (He was overruled, and the lawyers did get their fees.) He is also presiding in the high-profile case involving American International Group Inc.'s former chief executive, Maurice R. Greenberg.

In 1990 he was the judge in an unusual court battle over whether the movie "Tie Me Up! Tie Me Down!" deserved an X rating. At that time, Judge Ramos criticized the movie-rating system as a "form of censorship," but he upheld the X rating. And in 1988, he presided at the wedding of Robin Givens to boxer Mike Tyson, the heavyweight champ at the time. (They got divorced the next year.)

After 16 years as a private attorney, Mr. Ramos was appointed to the New York City bench in 1983 and elected in 1985, according to a résumé filed in Mr. Grasso's legal papers. Since 1993, he has served in New York State's commercial division, where he has become known for moving complex cases through the system involving Wall Street, the insurance industry and the entertainment business. According to the résumé Mr. Ramos submitted when applying for the NYSE's board, he enjoys driving race cars and reading and writing about particle physics.

Justice Ramos declined to comment.

Robert E. Rodes Jr., a professor at Notre Dame Law School, said applying for a job and getting turned down "isn't an obvious basis" for a problem.

According to attorneys who have tried cases in his courtroom, he has a reputation for volatility and wit. At times, for instance he compliments lawyers for making persuasive arguments -- moments before denying the motion.

Other times, he's less patient. During settlement discussions in a case last year between the NYSE and some disgruntled investors in the Big Board, he scolded one attorney in chambers for interrupting him. According to two people present at the time, he walked around from behind his desk, and jabbed his finger at the attorney's face, saying that if it happened again, the judge would throw him out of the courtroom.

In another instance, in open court he yelled at an attorney who suggested trying to view an issue in a case in layman's terms. "We have to look at it like lawyers. I am not looking at it like a bricklayer," Justice Ramos shot back.

In the Grasso case, Justice Ramos has ruled against the former NYSE chief in several key pretrial motions: He has denied Mr. Grasso's motion to dismiss parts of the case, and has thrown out Mr. Grasso's lawsuit against former Big Board director H. Carl McCall.

Last month, the judge also ruled that he -- as opposed to a jury -- would decide the crucial question of whether Mr. Grasso's pay was "reasonable" under New York state law governing the pay for executives at not-for-profits. (Until going public earlier this year, the NYSE was technically a not-for-profit, member-owned organization.) New York's attorney general Eliot Spitzer sued Mr. Grasso in May 2004 alleging his pay package was excessive.

Mr. Grasso has fought the case and said he was awarded the money by a board that knew what it was doing.

In his decision Thursday to stay in the case, Justice Ramos said he had "formed no premature opinion" and had no reason to pull away.

A lawyer for Mr. Grasso, Gerson Zweifach of Williams & Connolly LLP, said he was considering a possible appeal.

In his efforts to find a new judge, Mr. Grasso cited two letters, sent by a job recruiter on Judge Ramos's behalf, to the NYSE in October 2002 and October 2003. In the letters, the recruiter, George V. McGough, recommends Justice Ramos for one of the NYSE's directors' spots. Those jobs now pay $75,000 annually.

The judge, whose current salary is $136,700, was considering retirement at the time, but decided to stay on the bench. He didn't get the job either time.

Mr. Grasso's lawyers have known about the letters for more than a year, according to court papers. They didn't make an issue of it until August, when it became clear Justice Ramos planned to rule on part of the case himself, instead of leaving it to a jury.

They also argue that comments made by Justice Ramos last spring also signaled that he might be biased against the former NYSE chief.

According to the motion to remove Justice Ramos, the judge said in a meeting with attorneys that Mr. Grasso received "terrible advice" about his pay. He added that, even though Mr. Grasso may have done nothing wrong, "the number" of his compensation could be a problem, according to the motion.

Justice Ramos didn't address these comments in his Thursday decision to stay on the case. Mr. Spitzer's lawyer on the case, Avi Schick, calls the comments "unremarkable" statements by a judge who was speaking in the context of a possible settlement.

A Former Peregrine Exec Pleads Not Guilty (SDUT)

By Bruce V. Bigelow, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 16, 2006

Extradition to U.S. created stir in Britain

The former European vice president for Peregrine Systems pleaded not guilty to federal fraud and conspiracy charges in San Diego yesterday after he was extradited amid a political rumpus in the United Kingdom.

Jeremy Reeve Crook, 53, became a cause celebre in London this summer because of growing popular opposition to changes in British extradition law that Parliament enacted in 2003.

The changes, which were prompted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, allow U.S. authorities to extradite British citizens and other residents without first establishing a preliminary case against them in British court.

The changes made the extradition process lopsided because British authorities “basically just turn over” anyone wanted by the U.S. Justice Department, said Douglas McNabb, a lawyer in Washington, D.C.

In contrast, British authorities seeking to extradite individuals under current U.S. extradition law have to make a case showing “probable cause” in federal court, McNabb said.

Before the end of the year, the U.S. Senate is expected to vote on changes to relax the current U.S. requirements for extradition, McNabb said. But even if those revisions are approved, McNabb said, the extradition process still will be stiffer in the United States than in the United Kingdom.

Crook became the subject of a U.S. extradition request after he was indicted in October 2004 with 10 others for their alleged roles in the massive accounting fraud at Peregrine Systems, the San Diego software developer now operated by Hewlett-Packard Co.

Prosecutors asked Crook to return voluntarily to the United States to respond to the charges. He declined, and U.S. authorities subsequently sought an extradition order.

Meanwhile, Crook's lawyers in London fueled public indignation over Britain's new extradition law and voiced their doubts about the evidence that U.S. authorities had assembled against their client.

Despite the flap, British authorities ordered Crook's extradition in August.

He appeared in San Diego yesterday morning before U.S. Magistrate Judge Ruben B. Brooks, who ordered Crook to post a cash bond of $250,000 and prohibited his travel beyond the Southern District of California.

The judge also ordered Crook to be monitored by a global positioning satellite system and prohibited any unsupervised contacts with any current or former Peregrine employees, auditors or business associates.

The indictment alleges that from March 1999 through 2002, Crook and others at Peregrine intentionally disseminated false financial reports to investors. Prosecutors contend that the alleged conspirators intended to deceive the public and investment community about Peregrine's true financial performance and condition so they could reap windfall gains from their own shares.

Nine defendants, including Crook, are scheduled for trial April 3, 2007. Eight other defendants have pleaded guilty to felony charges arising out of the conspiracy.

Ex-Enron Official Gets 4 Years Probation, $10,000 Fine For Lying To Credit-rating Agencies (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-A former assistant treasurer at the disgraced Enron Corp. was sentenced Friday to four years probation and a $10,000 (â,¬7,889) fine for lying to credit-rating agencies to make the financial picture at the one-time energy giant appear healthier than it was.

Timothy DeSpain, 41, pleaded guilty nearly two years ago to a single charge of conspiracy to commit securities fraud. At the same time, he agreed to cooperate with federal authorities investigating the company, which toppled into bankruptcy in December 2001, evaporating more than $60 billion (currently â,¬47.3 billion) in market value, almost $2.1 billion (â,¬1.6 billion) in pension plans and, initially, 5,600 jobs.

U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein, who could have imposed up to a five-year prison term and $250,000 (â,¬197,239) fine under federal sentencing guidelines, said he was impressed by DeSpain's level of cooperation with federal prosecutors looking into the Enron debacle and with letters of support from relatives and friends.

"I'd like to apologize," DeSpain said in a brief statement to the judge. "I'd like to go back and change everything if I could."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney To Enter Guilty Plea To Conspiracy (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican, has agreed to plead guilty to conspiracy to defraud the public, becoming the first member of Congress to admit peddling influence for convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Ney, who had repeatedly denied any wrongdoing, admitted illegally receiving expensive trips, sports tickets and casino chips from Abramoff and an unidentified foreign businessman in exchange for trying to win favorable legislative results, according to court papers filed yesterday.

"I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them. I am very sorry for the pain I have caused my family, my constituents in Ohio, and my colleagues," said Ney, 52, a six-term congressman.

He also said he was seeking treatment for alcohol dependency, but that he is not "making any excuses."

DOJ_NMG_0064237

Assistant U.S. Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said as part of the plea agreement prosecutors will recommend a 27-month sentence for crimes that could bring Ney 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

Democrats immediately jumped on the election-year conviction and linked the Republican candidate vying to fill Ney's seat to the disgraced congressman.

The Ohio Democratic Party complained that State Sen. Joy Padgett, who won a special Republican primary Thursday, has "extensive ties to" Ney and has been unwilling "to return Ney's past campaign contributions." She will face Democrat Zack Space in the fall.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said it "confirms what we have long said: The Republican culture of corruption has pervaded Congress."

The California Democrat also said House Republicans "have failed to pass a single substantive reform."

Kevin Madden, spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said Mrs. Pelosi "is delusional to think that her party has even a shred of credibility on the issue of reform."

"Capitol Hill Democrats have either resisted or tried to obstruct every substantive effort of reform in this Congress," Mr. Madden said.

He also noted the top Democrat on the ethics panel, Rep. Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia, had to resign because of ethics questions. Mr. Mollohan is under investigation for reputed misstatements on his financial disclosure forms.

Ney is pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit honest services fraud, violating the one-year lobbying ban on congressional officials and making material false statements, and to one count of making false statements. He will remain free until an Oct. 13 hearing when he officially enters his guilty plea.

Prosecutors said Ney improperly accepted trips to play golf, gamble or vacation in Scotland, New Orleans and New York between August 2002 and August 2003. The total cost of the trips by Ney and others exceeded $170,000, court papers said.

Separately, Ney twice flew to London during 2003 to meet with a foreign businessman who was not identified by name in court papers.

The foreign businessman is Fouad al-Zayat, a Syrian-born partner in FN Aviation of Cyprus, two people close to the investigation told the Associated Press. These people spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the plea agreement. Mr. al-Zayat is known in Britain as a prominent gambler nicknamed "the Fat Man."

The February 2003 meeting with FN Aviation was arranged to discuss U.S. sanctions against the sale of aviation parts to Iran, but those involved did not discuss specific sales or proposals, according to one of the people familiar with the case.

The Justice Department said Ney on those trips accepted thousands of dollars' worth of free casino chips from the foreign businessman and parlayed them into $50,000 in total gambling winnings playing card games.

Mr. al-Zayat could not be reached immediately for comment by the Associated Press.

The Justice Department said the foreign businessman and his partner sought Ney's help in obtaining a travel visa and selling U.S.-made airplanes and parts to a foreign country, and that the businessman's company paid for Ney's trip to London in February 2003.

FN Aviation's former U.S. lobbyists, Roy Coffee and David DiStefano -- a former Ney aide, have said they worked with Ney to seek a special government permit to let FN Aviation sell plane parts to Iran despite U.S. trade sanctions. The permit never was awarded.

Ney's named co-conspirators in the court papers include Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January to mail fraud, former Capitol Hill public relations specialist Michael Scanlon, former lobbyist Tony Rudy, and Ney's former chief of staff, Neil Volz.

Volz left Ney's office in 2002 to join Abramoff's powerful lobbying firm. The charge that Ney violated a one-year ban on lobbying by officials who leave Congress relates to Volz's failure to wait a year before going to work for Abramoff.

In May, Volz pleaded guilty to being part of a conspiracy to provide Ney with the trip to Scotland and other pricey gifts from Abramoff.

Scanlon pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to bribe public officials in connection with lobbying work on behalf of Indian tribes and casino issues. Rudy pleaded guilty in March to conspiring with Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0064238

Democrats earlier this year focused heavily on Republican ethical problems, especially lambasting former Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican.

Mr. DeLay resigned his majority leader post and then his House seat after being indicted by a Texas prosecutor and seeing some of his aides convicted in the Abramoff scandal.

Prosecutors are looking at whether Mr. DeLay filed false public reports to disguise the source and size of political donations, travel and other gifts he received from special interests, including some with ties to Abramoff.

In a separate Justice Department corruption probe, Rep. William J. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, is being investigated on suspicion he accepted bribes. According to a search warrant affidavit, the FBI videotaped the congressman accepting $100,000 from an informant wearing a concealed microphone.

Lawmaker Pleads Guilty To Corruption (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Ohio Republican Ney admits accepting illegal gifts from lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

WASHINGTON — In court documents, he was known only as "Representative 1," an anonymous member of the House who always seemed to have his hand out when super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff came calling for favors for his clients.

On Friday, the lawmaker, Ohio Republican Bob Ney, officially emerged from the shadows and acknowledged his guilt.

Ending months of denials that he had betrayed the public trust, the politician once known as "the Mayor of Capitol Hill" agreed to plead guilty to federal corruption charges.

Ney, 52, admitted in a plea agreement with federal prosecutors filed in federal court in Washington that he had accepted tens of thousands of dollars in illegal favors from Abramoff and from a Syrian businessman nicknamed "the Fat Man."

The lawmaker said he had agreed to use his clout on behalf of Abramoff clients in return for gifts and other largesse that included nights of casino gambling in London and a lavish golf junket to Scotland. In a statement, he said that alcohol abuse had contributed to a downward spiral in his life, and that he had checked himself into a rehabilitation facility for treatment.

Prosecutors said they would recommend a sentence for Ney of 27 months in prison, although his crimes carry a maximum penalty of up to 10 years. He is expected to formally enter his plea at a hearing in federal district court in Washington on Oct. 13.

The six-term Republican is the first lawmaker to admit to criminal actions as part of the lengthy Justice Department probe of Abramoff, once one of Washington's most influential lobbyists.

The plea agreement also marked the latest fallout from an ongoing Justice Department crackdown on corruption in the capital that has focused attention on members of both parties, including Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), who is being investigated for bribery. That probe, which does not involve Abramoff, gained nationwide notoriety after Jefferson was allegedly caught with cash from an FBI sting in his freezer.

The Abramoff investigation, which mostly involves Republicans, has led to the conviction of several former congressional aides who were in the lobbyist's inner circle. It also was a key factor in the political downfall of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), who once worked closely with Abramoff and who resigned his congressional seat in June.

Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges in January, is continuing to cooperate with authorities. He and his clients lavished tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions on scores of lawmakers.

But aside from the political scandal created by the case, it remained uncertain whether other elected officials would join Ney in facing legal problems from it.

Although Ney has long been viewed as likely to face charges, evidence of possible wrongdoing by some of his colleagues has not seemed as strong. Moreover, his own plea agreement with authorities does not require him to point fingers and cooperate in the investigation.

Democrats seized on Ney's plea agreement to buttress their argument that the Republicans who control Congress have shown themselves unfit to lead.

Ney's guilty plea "confirms what we have long said: The Republican culture of corruption has pervaded" Capitol Hill, said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco).

Republicans said Ney should be held accountable, but that his misdeeds were an isolated matter that should not be used to taint his GOP colleagues.

"Clearly, Bob made mistakes, and he is now feeling the full weight of those mistakes," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Ney, in a statement issued through his lawyers, expressed remorse.

"I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them," he said. "I know that this plea agreement will probably forever change the way people view my public service. I regret this very much."

He said he has gone through a great deal of soul searching recently, and has "come to recognize that a dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me. I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions."

Before becoming ensnared in scandal, Ney headed the House Administration Committee, the post that earned him his nickname. Although the panel rarely makes news, it controls House office budgets — making it vitally important to other lawmakers.

Nudged by GOP leaders, Ney resigned the chairmanship this year. And he announced last month that he would not seek reelection in November.

Ney agreed to plead guilty to two charges, including conspiring with Abramoff and others to commit "honest services fraud," a form of corruption that is considered less serious than bribery. He also admitted that he made false statements in reporting gifts he received.

Prosecutors said that Ney accepted trips to play golf, gamble or vacation in Scotland, New Orleans and upstate New York in 2002 and 2003. Ney also admitted accepting meals and drinks at an Abramoff restaurant, tickets to rock concerts and sporting events, and tens of thousands in campaign contributions from the lobbyist and his clients.

In return, Ney supported legislation that would have allowed a Texas Indian tribe to operate a casino and helped another Abramoff client win a lucrative contract to install wireless telephone service in the House. He also entered remarks in the Congressional Record supporting an attempt by Abramoff to acquire a Florida cruise line.

Ney also admitted that he had accepted thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips during trips to London in 2003 from a firm that was hoping to win an export license to sell U.S.-made airplanes to Iran. He allegedly parlayed the money into $50,000 playing cards; on the trip home, he gave a staff member $5,000 before passing through U.S. Customs to conceal the amount.

Lobby Scandal Topples U.S. Rep (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, September 16, 2006

U.S. Rep. Bob Ney agreed to plead guilty Friday to charges that he accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in trips, cash and campaign donations for political favors, making the once obscure Ohio Republican the first lawmaker to fall in the probe of a once-powerful lobbyist.

Ney, 52, admitted his involvement in the influence-peddling enterprise run by convicted Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who brought the scandal to South Florida with the fraudulent purchase of a local fleet of gambling ships.

Abramoff, in his plea deal with prosecutors, detailed Ney's role in helping him and his clients in exchange for everything from a golf trip in Scotland to meals in the GOP lobbyist's Washington restaurant.

With November's congressional midterm elections looming, Friday's announcement of Ney's plea agreement reignited Democratic accusations of a Republican "culture of corruption" on Capitol Hill.

Ney had strongly denied wrongdoing even as the investigation closed in around him over the last year.

Now the 12-year veteran of Congress is set to plead guilty on Oct. 13 to charges he conspired to commit fraud and violate federal lobbying laws and that he made false statements. Under federal sentencing guidelines, he faces at least 27 months in prison.

In a statement, Ney apologized -- but said "a dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me." Then he added: ``I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions."

Justice Department officials condemned his misconduct.

"He illegally deceived the public and the House of Representatives about his actions," Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general heading the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said in Washington. ``In doing so, the congressman was acting in his own best interests, and not in the best interests of his constituents."

ASSISTANCE IN MIAMI

Fisher said Justice's public corruption prosecutors received "substantial assistance" from the Miami offices of U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta and the FBI.

Indeed, Ney's downfall began in South Florida, where he had used his congressional influence to sway the sale of SunCruz Casinos to Abramoff and his New York partner Adam Kidan.

The SunCruz case against Abramoff and Kidan gave Justice Department officials the leverage to pressure the lobbyist to turn on other colleagues, congressional aides and politicians early this year.

The charges against Ney are based primarily on his behind-the-scenes work for Abramoff's Indian tribal clients and for a foreign businessman who gave him tens of thousands of dollars in casino chips and cash. But the charges also include the lawmaker's unusual tactics to help the lobbyist purchase the Dania Beach-based SunCruz gambling fleet.

During negotiations in the SunCruz deal, Abramoff asked his lobbying partner, Michael Scanlon, to do him a favor. That's when Ney entered the picture.

Scanlon contacted Ney's chief of staff, Neil Volz, to arrange to have Ney disparage SunCruz owner Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis in the Congressional Record. Scanlon drafted a statement that Ney put into the record in March 2000, calling Boulis "a bad apple" to handicap the seller.

After the deal was completed that September, Ney praised Kidan in the Congressional Record as a businessman with a ``renowned reputation for honesty and integrity."

Law enforcement officials said that just weeks after the controversial SunCruz sale, Abramoff and Kidan took $10,000 from their gambling business and donated the money to the National Republican Congressional Committee on Ney's behalf.

That SunCruz was the actual contributor was first reported by The Miami Herald in late November 2005.

Although Ney did not receive the $10,000 directly, U.S. officials said SunCruz's donation in his name to the GOP campaign committee was improper. The then-unknown Ohio congressman stood to gain stature with the Republican leadership.

Volz, who has already pleaded guilty in the Washington investigation, admitted to participating in the Congressional Record activities. Scanlon, who has also pleaded guilty, was the former communications director for former House Republican leader Tom DeLay of Texas. At the time Scanlon sought Ney's help in early 2000, Scanlon had already left DeLay's office. Scanlon and Volz were close friends on Capitol Hill.

CORRESPONDENCE

After the SunCruz sale in fall 2000, Abramoff and Scanlon exchanged e-mails about the company's $10,000 contribution to the GOP's campaign committee on Ney's behalf, according to law enforcement officials.

Scanlon, who did public relations work for SunCruz, also corresponded with Ney's staff about the Nov. 1, 2000 political contribution.

As lobbying partners, Scanlon and Abramoff would go on to rake in as much as $80 million from their work with Indian tribal clients that owned casinos (none from Florida). Those fees drew the scrutiny of the House Ethics Committee, Senate Indian Affairs Committee and the Justice Department.

As for the former SunCruz owner, Boulis, he was gunned down in Fort Lauderdale in February 2001. Three men -- including one who was a former FBI informant with ties to the Mafia -- have been charged in his slaying.

A year ago, a South Florida federal grand jury indicted Abramoff and Kidan on charges of defrauding lenders of $60 million in the SunCruz sale. Both men pleaded guilty and were sentenced to nearly six years in prison.

Both remain out on bond, while they cooperate with federal authorities.

Several Miami prosecutors have been involved in the SunCruz and Washington investigations: Lawrence LaVecchio, Paul Schwartz, Jeff Sloman, Paul Pelletier and Edward Nucci -- along with FBI agent Susan Sprengel.

Who's The Next Target In The Abramoff Probe? (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin

Time, September 16, 2006

Former Ohio Congressman Bob Ney has admitted his role in Washington's influence-peddling scandal, but prosecutors still have other politicians in their sights

After months of defiant protestations of innocence about his role in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, has pleaded guilty to making false statements, to conspiracy to commit fraud and violating post-employment restrictions for former congressional aides. But the probe into the lobbying scandal is far from wrapped up.

A source close to the investigation told TIME that scores of US prosecutors and FBI agents continue to examine the activities of other sitting members of Congress and prominent individuals who could face prosecution, though not necessarily before the November 7 election. The source confirmed previous public reports that particular scrutiny is being paid to Sen. Conrad Burns, a Montana Republican who faces a tough campaign for reelection.

"A lot of the conduct to which Ney has pleaded guilty is similar to the alleged conduct of Senator Conrad Burns and his staff," points out Melanie Sloan, Executive Director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), a non-profit watch dog group. "Abramoff has said that Burns and his staff used Signatures (Abramoff's restaurant) like their cafeteria. And Burns took a number of legislative actions on Abramoff's behalf, even as members of his staff went on trip to the 2001 Super Bowl on private jet and visited Sun Cruise gambling ships, which were partly owned by Abramoff." Abramoff himself said in an interview earlier this year that, "Every appropriation we wanted (from Burns's committee) we got. Our staffs were as close as they could be. They practically used Signatures as their cafeteria. I mean, it's a little difficult for him to run from that record."

But Erik Iverson, a senior advisor to Sen. Burns campaign in Montana told TIME: "There is no federal investigation. Certainly no one has ever told us there is, or contacted us. And there is absolutely no similarity between what's happening to Mr. Ney and Mr. Burns. That is all just politics." As a matter of policy, the Justice Dept. does not comment on possible targets of its investigations.

Ney, 52, is the first member of Congress to admit wrongdoing in the federal probe. Prosecutors are likely to insist that he spend as much as 27 months in prison, although a judge could impose up to 10 years, though that stiff a sentence is considered unlikely. His plea agreement lacks language that would require him to testify or to cooperate in other federal prosecutions — in contrast to earlier plea agreements of Ney's longtime chief of staff, Neil Volz, as well as Abramoff himself. The absence of such language suggests that Ney was able to provide little information beyond the scope of his own activity.

By the same token, some observers had predicted prosecutors would insist that Ney plead guilty to bribery, which carries a possible 15 year sentence, in part because Abramoff and another defendant admitted bribing a public official who has been identified as Ney. Right up until his guilty plea, Ney had always denied wrongdoing, even after his former chief of staff pleaded guilty in May. That aide, Neil Volz, confessed to conspiring to corrupt the congressman and others. After leaving the congressional payroll Volz went into business with Abramoff.

Court papers detail Ney's acknowledgment of exchanging official acts for benefits, including an August 2002 golf trip to Scotland, paid for by Abramoff and his clients. The junket, which included a White House procurement official as well as Ney's then chief of staff, cost in excess of $160,000, according to the papers.

Ney also asked for and received trips to Lake George, N.Y. and New Orleans as well food and drink costing thousands of dollars at Abramoff's swanky Washington restaurant, not to mention concert and sports tickets and thousands of dollars more in campaign contributions, the government said.

In return, Ney achnowleded in the plea, he took actions to benefit Abramoff clients. The Congressman also also admitted receiving gambling chips worth thousands of dollars from a foreign businessman.

"Congressman Ney and his co-conspirators engaged in a long-term pattern of defrauding the public of his unbiased, honest services as an elected official," Alice Fisher, assistant attorney general, said in a statement. "Congressman Ney admits that he corruptly solicited and accepted a stream of benefits, valued at tens of thousands of dollars, in exchange for agreement to perform, and performing, a series of official acts. He also admitted deceiving the public and the U.S. House of Representatives about his actions."

Ney occupied a special role as chairman of the committee with jurisdiction over internal workings of the 435-member House of Representatives. But GOP Speaker Dennis Hastert demanded that Ney surrender his chairmanship earlier this year, and Ney then withdrew his candidacy for reelection in his Ohio district. This week, the Congressman's office indicated he had entered residential treatment for alcohol dependence. In a statement, he said, "I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them. I am very sorry for the pain I have caused to my family, my constituents in Ohio and my colleagues."

FBI Assistant Director Chip Burrus, head of the Criminal Investigative Division put the Ney plea deal in context, stressing that it is just part of a much wider federal crackdown on corruption. "The FBI is deeply committed to tackling corruption anywhere we find it—this is our promise to the American people, and corruption is the FBIs top criminal priority," he said. "We have more than 600 agents and dozens of analysts working more than 2200 investigations in all 56 field offices right now. Nationwide indictments are up 40 percent. In the past year alone, we have had over 950 arrests, 700 convictions, over 300 million dollars in restitution and over 15 million dollars in fines. The FBI participates in over 30 public corruption task forces and over 100 public corruption working groups." With that kind of tough talk, no one on Capitol Hill remotely linked to Abramoff will be breathing easy for quite some time.

Rep. Bob Ney Agrees To Plead Guilty (AP-Y)

By Ted Bridis

AP, September 16, 2006

Ohio Rep. Bob Ney admitted improperly accepting tens of thousands of dollars worth of trips, meals, sports tickets and casino chips while trying to win favors for a disgraced Washington lobbyist and a foreign aviation company run by a gambler known as "the Fat Man."

Ney, a six-term Republican, had defiantly denied any wrongdoing for months, but he reversed course and agreed to plead guilty in court papers filed Friday. Prosecutors will recommend he serve 27 months in prison. Ney was expected to formally plead guilty in court Oct. 13.

"I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them," Ney, 52, said in a statement. "I am very sorry for the pain I have caused to my family, my constituents in Ohio and my colleagues." His lawyer said he had begun treatment for alcohol dependency.

Ney became the first lawmaker to admit wrongdoing in the election-year congressional corruption probe spawned by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Ney said he was hopeful "that someday the good I have tried to do will be measured alongside the mistakes I have made."

Ney agreed to plead guilty to making false statements and conspiracy to commit fraud, make other false statements and violate U.S. lobbying restrictions. The charges could carry a prison sentence of up to 10 years and fines of up to $500,000 plus repayment of any improper gifts.

The chairman of Ohio's Republican Party, Bob Bennett, said Ney's apology "rings hollow," and he urged the lawmaker to resign "and begin paying the price for his arrogance and greed."

Ney's attorney, William Lawler, said the congressman, who announced last month he wouldn't seek re-election, has no plans to resign.

"He's taking it one step at a time," Lawler said. "Today was a step, the treatment is a step."

Prosecutors said Ney improperly accepted trips to play golf, gamble or vacation in Scotland, New Orleans and New York between August 2002 and August 2003. The total cost of the trips by Ney and others exceeded $170,000, court papers said. Ney also admitted accepting meals and sports and concert tickets for himself and his staff from Abramoff and his lobbyists.

Separately, Ney twice flew to London during 2003 to meet with a foreign businessman who was not identified by name in court papers. The foreign businessman is Fouad al-Zayat, a Syrian-born partner in FN Aviation of Cyprus, according to two people close to the investigation. These people spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the plea agreement. Al-Zayat is known in Britain as a prominent gambler nicknamed "The Fat Man."

Ney's congressional travel records indicate he and an aide met with al-Zayat's business partner in FN Aviation, Nigel Winfield.

The February 2003 meeting with FN Aviation was arranged to discuss U.S. sanctions against the sale of aviation parts to Iran, but those involved did not discuss specific sales or proposals, according to one of the people familiar with the case.

The Justice Department said Ney on those trips accepted thousands of dollars worth of free casino chips from the foreign businessman and parlayed them into $50,000 in total gambling winnings playing card games. On one occasion, Ney gave $5,000 to a staff member to carry through U.S. Customs so that Ney could report receiving a lesser amount, prosecutors said.

FN Aviation paid the $5,414 cost of the four-day February trip by Ney and an aide, according to Ney's congressional travel records.

Al-Zayat could not be reached immediately for comment by The Associated Press.

The Justice Department said the foreign businessman and his partner sought Ney's help obtaining a travel visa and selling U.S.-made airplanes and parts to a foreign country, and that the businessman's company paid for Ney's trip to London in February 2003.

FN Aviation's former U.S. lobbyists, Roy Coffee and David DiStefano — a former Ney aide — have said they worked with Ney to seek a special government permit to let FN Aviation sell plane parts to Iran despite U.S. trade sanctions. The permit never was awarded.

DiStefano was Ney's chief of staff before becoming a lobbyist and coordinated Ney's first congressional campaign in 1994.

"People must have faith and confidence in their elected officials," said Alice Fisher, who runs the criminal division of the Justice Department. She said Ney had "acted in his own interests, not in the interests of his constituents."

House Majority Leader John Boehner, also from Ohio, described Ney as a skilled lawmaker and good friend. "Clearly Bob made mistakes, and he is now feeling the full weight of those mistakes," Boehner said. "His actions violated the law, and he must be held accountable."

Ney did not participate in any of the 10 roll call votes in the House on Thursday, an indication he was away from the Capitol.

Republican voters in Ney's district selected a replacement candidate Thursday as word of legal developments surfaced. State Sen. Joy Padgett, backed by party leaders, won easily and will face Democrat Zack Space in the fall.

Ney had a unique power perch in the House when the year dawned, as chairman of the committee with jurisdiction over the internal workings of the 435-member chamber. Speaker Dennis Hastert pressured Ney into surrendering his chairmanship earlier this year as concern rippled through the GOP ranks about the Abramoff scandal.

Still, as recently as early summer, Ney said he intended to seek re-election in the sprawling, rural district in eastern Ohio he has represented since 1994. He changed his mind at the prodding of party leaders who feared the loss of his seat in November if he remained on the ballot.

At Abramoff's request, prosecutors said, Ney proposed four amendments in early 2002 that would have helped Abramoff and his lobbying clients. These included proposals to allow commercial gambling by two Indian tribes, help a Russian drink manufacturer and compel the U.S. government to give property to a religious school founded by Abramoff.

None of the amendments succeeded.

Ney had sought to add them to the "Help America Vote Act," a law aimed at election reform.

Rep. Ney Admits Selling Influence (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi And Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) agreed yesterday to plead guilty to corruption charges after admitting to performing a variety of official acts for lobbyists in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel, sports tickets and thousands of dollars in gambling chips. He is the first elected official to face prison time in the ongoing influence-peddling investigation of former GOP lobbying powerhouse Jack Abramoff.

After fiercely proclaiming his innocence for more than a year, Ney signed a two-count plea agreement Wednesday that the Justice Department filed in federal court yesterday. The charges of conspiracy and making a false statement could carry a prison sentence of up to 10 years, but prosecutors plan to seek a term of 27 months. He faces up to $500,000 in fines.

The six-term Republican said in a statement yesterday that he was seeking treatment for alcoholism and was sorry for "serious mistakes" that have brought pain to his family and constituents. He is scheduled to appear in U.S. District Court in Washington on Oct. 13 to formally enter his plea.

Coming just seven weeks before the midterm congressional elections, Ney's admission of guilt was cited yesterday by Democrats as evidence that Congress is beset by a "ring of corruption." But Republicans were quick to note that a Democrat, Rep. William J. Jefferson of Louisiana, is the focus of a separate federal bribery investigation.

At a news conference announcing the acceptance of the plea agreement and the filing of the charging document in court, the chief of the Justice Department's criminal division, Alice S. Fisher, said Ney had breached the public trust. "Congressman Ney and his co-conspirators engaged in a long-term pattern to deprive the public of his honest, unbiased services as an elected official," Fisher said.

Court papers made no mention of any agreement on Ney's part to provide evidence against anyone else in the ongoing probe, unlike in other plea agreements that prosecutors have reached with Abramoff and his former associates. Ney is the eighth person to be indicted or to admit wrongdoing in connection with the Abramoff investigation, under which lobbyists, government officials and other lawmakers continue to be scrutinized.

Ney, once one of the most powerful members of the House, admitted to offering legislation at the behest of Abramoff and his team of lobbyists, which included former Ney chief of staff Neil G. Volz. In exchange, Ney accepted a stream of things of value, such as luxury vacations to Scotland, Lake George, N.Y, and New Orleans; tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions; restaurant meals; and tickets to sporting events, including the use of exclusive stadium suites. Prosecutors valued the trips alone at more than $170,000.

In 2002, Ney sought to insert four amendments into an election-reform bill to benefit Abramoff's clients. He further admitted to helping another Abramoff client win a multimillion-dollar contract to provide wireless communication service to the U.S. Capitol, and to inserting comments into the Congressional Record to help Abramoff purchase a casino cruise line in Florida.

Ney, 52, under legal and political pressure for months because of his connections to Abramoff, announced this summer that he would not seek reelection. Ney has not been seen publicly in the House since he cast a vote Tuesday night, and he missed more than a dozen votes on Wednesday and Thursday. His phones went unanswered in his Washington office. His Chillicothe, Ohio, office released the congressman's statement.

"I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them," Ney said in the statement. "I am very sorry for the pain I have caused to my family, my constituents in Ohio and my colleagues." He said he recently recognized that "a dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me."

"I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions. Over the years, I have worked to help others, but now I am the one that needs help," Ney's statement said.

As chairman of the House Administration Committee, Ney was known as the mayor of Capitol Hill. The committee oversees the Capitol Police and the administrative functions of Congress.

Ney has been under mounting pressure in the investigation, first with Abramoff's guilty plea and agreement to cooperate in the investigation early this year, and then with the guilty plea in May of his former aide Volz, who admitted to conspiring to corruptly influence the congressman and others. Ney admitted to encouraging Volz to violate the one-year ban on lobbying by staffers who leave Congress.

Ney had resigned his committee post earlier this year. William E. Lawler, an attorney for Ney, declined to say yesterday whether the congressman would now resign his seat. "He is taking things one step at a time," Lawler said.

Lawler said Ney is receiving treatment for "alcohol-dependence issues" but declined to say whether he has entered a rehabilitation facility. Lawler said treatment was the deciding factor in setting the date for next month's court appearance.

Others familiar with the case said that Ney's representatives tried to put off the announcement of the plea deal until then.

Ney will be eligible for a government pension because Congress has not acted on legislation that would ban pensions for convicted lawmakers.

Ney and his attorneys have professed his innocence for more than a year, even as the congressman's legal position deteriorated. Ney himself acknowledged the difficulty in facing down the "tremendous pressure from the government" when his close friend and former aide Volz agreed to testify against him. Tony C. Rudy and Michael Scanlon, onetime lobbyists and aides to former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), are also cooperating witnesses, as is former Abramoff casino business partner Adam Kidan.

Court papers make reference to other lobbyists and staffers with ties to Ney, including one called "Staffer C" in court papers. Public records and sources identify him as William Heaton, who, when he replaced Volz in 2001 at the age of 23, was the youngest chief of staff on Capitol Hill.

Ney admitted, in addition to the Abramoff ties, accepting free airfare, luxury accommodations and thousands of dollars' worth of gambling chips in 2003 from a foreign businessman, who was not identified in the court papers but has previously been identified by Ney attorney Mark H. Tuohey as Fouad al-Zayat, a high-rolling denizen of London's gambling clubs nicknamed "The Fat Man."

Zayat, who has been described in British media as a Syrian-born arms middleman, was seeking Ney's help in getting a visa and an exemption to a U.S. law that bars the sale of airplane parts to another country. The exemption was meant for Zayat's company, FN Aviation, a Cyprus-based aircraft-leasing firm.

Zayat and a partner, Tuohey said in an interview last year, were "offering to play a role or be intermediaries" with Iraq and Iran in the run-up to the war in Iraq. In day-long meetings in London, said Tuohey, Ney talked to the men about "potential transactions that could favorably affect our relations with those countries."

Ney admitted in court documents that he failed to disclose on forms filed with Congress the full amount of his winnings at a London casino -- reporting that he had won $34,000 on a game of chance instead of $50,000.

Ney also failed to disclose other winnings -- $5,000 worth of pound notes that he had handed to a staff member to avoid carrying them through U.S. customs himself.

In the court documents, Ney admitted later contacting the State Department on Zayat's behalf.

In March 2002, Ney -- at the urging of Volz, Abramoff, Rudy and Scanlon -- agreed to sponsor legislation that would reopen a shuttered casino for a Texas Indian tribe that the lobbyists represented. The Tigua tribe's casino had been shut down at the urging of state officials. Abramoff had secretly agitated for the closing, then signed the tribe up as a client, promising he could help get the casino reopened.

After Ney agreed to sponsor the legislation, Scanlon e-mailed Abramoff in one of the more memorable exchanges to become public in the lobbying scandal: "Just met with Ney!!! We're f'ing gold!!!! He's going to do Tigua."

Six days later, Abramoff directed tribal officials to make three contributions totaling $32,000 to Ney's campaign and political action committees.

Ney, at the urging of Volz and the other lobbyists, also pushed through a 2002 license for an Israeli telecommunications company to install cellphone antennas for the House. The company, Foxcom Wireless, now known as MobileAccess and based in Vienna, Va., later paid Abramoff $280,000 for lobbying, according to disclosure forms.

The Washington Post reported in 2004 that the wireless firm had donated $50,000 to the Capital Athletic Foundation, a charity that Abramoff sometimes used to secretly pay for lobbying activities. In the summer of 2002, Abramoff had the foundation pay for a golfing trip to Scotland for Ney and others.

"The whole thing was just nauseating," said John Spindler, vice president of LGC Wireless, the company that lost the House contract to Abramoff's client. "You know these kind of things are going on, but when you get embroiled in it, you go, my God, how could this go on?"

Lawmaker Admits He Took Illegal Gifts (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — Representative Bob Ney of Ohio admitted Friday that he had effectively put his office up for sale to corrupt Washington lobbyists and a foreign businessman in exchange for illegal gifts that included lavish overseas trips, the use of skyboxes at sports arenas in the Washington area and thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips from London casinos.

DOJ_NMG_0064246

In a plea agreement announced by the Justice Department, Mr. Ney, a six-term Republican who once seemed poised to rise far in the House leadership, admitted to a wide-ranging criminal conspiracy and to making false statements about the gifts.

With the agreement, Mr. Ney became the first member of Congress to acknowledge criminal acts in the investigation of the former superlobbyist Jack Abramoff, an inquiry that threatens to ensnare other Republican lawmakers and dim the party's hopes in the November elections.

Although Mr. Ney could face up to 10 years in prison, federal prosecutors said they would recommend a 27-month sentence for the lawmaker, who announced last month that he was abandoning his campaign for another term. He could also face up to $500,000 in fines.

Mr. Abramoff, once a leading fund-raiser for the Republican Party, pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials, including Mr. Ney.

In a statement released by his lawyers, Mr. Ney, 52, suggested that his criminal acts were related to alcoholism.

"I have come to recognize that a dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me," said Mr. Ney, who friends say entered an in-patient alcohol-treatment facility this week. "I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions."

He said the plea agreement "will enable me to accept responsibility for what I have done, to start repairing the damage I have caused and to start healing my family."

After several months with little public activity in the two-year-old investigation into Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation, Mr. Ney's plea agreement offered new ammunition to Democratic political strategists hoping to end Republican control of the House and Senate this fall.

The House Democratic leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, said Mr. Ney's plea agreement was proof of "what we have long said: the Republican culture of corruption has pervaded Congress." Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, said, "The illegal behavior that Congressman Bob Ney has admitted doing was unacceptable."

In the plea agreement, Mr. Ney admitted that he had "corruptly solicited and accepted a stream of things of value" from Mr. Abramoff and his lobbying partners. Those partners included Neil G. Volz, Mr. Ney's former chief of staff, who pleaded guilty to similar conspiracy charges in May.

The list of illegal gifts accepted by Mr. Ney from Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation was long: an all-expense-paid golfing trip to Scotland in 2002; a gambling vacation in New Orleans in 2003; meals and drinks at restaurants in and around Washington, mostly at one owned by Mr. Abramoff on Pennsylvania Avenue; and large campaign contributions "from Abramoff's clients for whom Ney had agreed to perform official acts."

The official acts, the Justice Department said, included Mr. Ney's efforts to insert language in House bills to aid Mr. Abramoff and his clients, as well as to place statements in the Congressional Record on their behalf.

The plea agreement suggests that Mr. Ney may have done his most important favor to Mr. Abramoff in 2001 and 2002 when he helped direct a multimillion-dollar Congressional contract to one of Mr. Abramoff's lobbying clients, a technology company that was contracted to install the infrastructure for wireless telephone service in the House.

In 2002, Mr. Ney admitted, he introduced an amendment in the House to allow a "foreign-beverage-distiller client of Abramoff's lobbying firm" to label its alcohol as "made in Russia" when in fact it was to be distilled in a former Soviet Republic outside of Russia.

Mr. Ney also admitted accepting thousands of dollars in gambling chips from a foreign businessman who was not named in the court papers but had previously been identified by government officials as Fouad al-Zayat, the Syrian-born owner of an aviation company in Cyprus that sought Mr. Ney's help in Washington.

In its court papers, the Justice Department said Mr. Ney traveled twice to London — in February and August 2003 — to meet with the businessman, who wanted Mr. Ney's help in easing an American embargo that barred the sale of airplanes and aviation parts "in a foreign country," previously identified as Iran; he also wanted Mr. Ney's help in obtaining an American visa.

During both trips, prosecutors said, Mr. Ney received thousands of dollars worth of chips from London casinos that the lawmaker then parlayed, through his gambling, into an estimated $50,000 — most of it, $47,000, on the August trip.

On returning home in August, the plea agreement said, Mr. Ney gave about $5,000 to a staff member to carry so the lawmaker "could carry and report a lower dollar amount to Customs Services officials upon re-entry into the United States." On his customs form, Mr. Ney reported that he was bringing only $32,000 into the country. The court papers did not explain the $10,000 discrepancy.

Representative No. 1: Guilty (WP)

Meanwhile, Congress doesn't even fiddle with lobbying reform.

HOW SORDID does it have to get before Congress does something to tighten the rules governing lobbyists and lawmakers, all-expenses-paid trips, and lavish dinners? Former representative Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), once a leader in the Republican hierarchy, pleaded guilty yesterday to selling his office in exchange for golf trips and gambling junkets, marking another milestone in a year of congressional disgrace. Yet lawmakers are poised to go home and explain to voters how they failed to act despite vows earlier in the year to fix the badly broken system.

On Thursday, the House of Representatives passed a fig leaf of a change in earmarking rules that will simply require lawmakers, in some cases, to attach their names to special-interest projects that they sponsor. We'll offer a more detailed analysis of this faux reform another time, but the most disturbing point is this: Apparently, that's it for lobbying reform this session. There will be no action to limit the free trips that lawmakers and staff members can take, beef up the broken system of ethics enforcement, slow the revolving door between public service and K Street riches, or improve disclosure of lobbying activities.

It was striking, then, that yesterday, the day after the House's non-action action, the court documents were replete with disgusting details about the rapaciously unethical behavior of Mr. Ney and his staff -- scooping up thousands of dollars in free gambling chips from a Syrian-born arms merchant nicknamed "The Fat Man," who was seeking the congressman's help to sell airplanes and obtain a visa; Mr. Ney having a staffer carry back $5,000 worth of British pounds from a London gambling junket to hide his winnings from U.S. Customs officials; Mr. Ney taking thousands of dollars in free meals and skybox tickets from lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In return, Mr. Ney inserted amendments into legislation to help the clients of those who helped the congressman. In his role as chairman of the House Administration Committee, he issued a multimillion-dollar wireless telephone contract to one of Mr. Abramoff's clients. He lobbied executive branch officials at the behest of Mr. Abramoff and his other benefactors.

The tightest lobbying rules in the world can't halt a lawmaker bent on corruption. Mr. Ney lied on his financial disclosure forms, his travel forms and his customs reports. He knowingly helped his former chief of staff violate the one-year prohibition against lobbying former colleagues -- not only encouraging the former staff member, Neil G. Volz, to violate the lobbying ban but also helping Mr. Volz set up a client list even before he left Mr. Ney's staff.

Still, a combination of tighter rules, increased disclosure and more-effective enforcement could help deter and detect criminality on the grand scale practiced by Mr. Ney. It could lessen the small-bore, run-of-the-mill corruption that has become a seamy fact of life in the halls of the Capitol. But that won't happen. At least not from this Congress.

In Case Against Politician, A Tale Of Friendship, Ambition And Betrayal (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — In July 2005, Vernon L. Jackson returned home to Louisville from Washington, where he had just met with Representative William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat who had been helping promote his fledgling digital-technology company. David Harper, a lawyer for the company, said he had never seen Mr. Jackson so demoralized.

For nearly five years, the inventor and the congressman had carried the message that Mr. Jackson's company, iGate, could help close the "digital divide" by delivering high-speed Internet access to poor blacks around the world.

They had flown to Africa to seek business opportunities, and they had talked up iGate to potential partners at the Kentucky Derby and the United States Open tennis tournament in New York.

But now, with iGate starved for cash, Mr. Jackson was convinced that Mr. Jefferson, his "friend on the Hill," was about to betray him, Mr. Harper recalled.

Over breakfast at the Grand Hyatt Hotel, the congressman had made a proposal that, in Mr. Jackson's view, was tantamount to theft: in return for a quick infusion of cash, Mr. Harper said, Mr. Jefferson and his investors would take control of iGate and its promising broadband patents while easing Mr. Jackson aside and cutting off most of the company's creditors.

Unbeknownst to the two men, the Federal Bureau of Investigation had been monitoring their dealings. Less than three weeks later, agents raided Mr. Jefferson's homes, in Washington and in New Orleans, and found stacks of cash stuffed in a freezer.

Mr. Jackson, 54, has pleaded guilty to paying more than $400,000 in bribes for Mr. Jefferson's help; on Sept. 8, he was sentenced to seven years in prison. An F.B.I. search of the congressman's office last May set off a showdown between Congress and the Justice Department. Mr. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing and remains under investigation.

In recent months, the outlines of the case have emerged in court filings and news reports. But an examination of court records and dozens of internal iGate documents, as well as interviews with a number of Mr. Jackson's associates, offers a far clearer picture of the relationship between the two men, and of how Mr. Jefferson went from helping a small company to trying to take it over for his family's benefit.

Mr. Jefferson, 59, grew up poor on a cotton farm yet became one of the most prominent black members of Congress, with a seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee. He developed a reputation for nurturing black entrepreneurs, like Mr. Jackson, and working to expand trade with Africa.

Jobs for Family Members

Soon after meeting Mr. Jackson in late 2000, Mr. Jefferson prodded the Pentagon to test one of iGate's products, documents show. He recruited investors and did favors for iGate's leading supplier. He also lobbied political leaders in Nigeria, Ghana and Cameroon to include iGate in telecommunications projects, while repeatedly urging the Export-Import Bank of the United States to finance the deals.

And each time the company seemed poised to take off, records show, Mr. Jefferson sought a greater share of the potential profits for his family.

His wife, Andrea, had a marketing contract with iGate; their eldest daughter did legal work for iGate and one of its investors; and Mrs. Jefferson's brother-in-law was iGate's chief engineer. Even before the congressman brought up the takeover proposal, he had arranged for a consulting firm owned by his wife and five daughters to receive nearly 31 million shares of iGate stock, roughly a quarter of the company, at no cost, documents show.

The F.B.I. has said that Mr. Jefferson also sought a substantial share of profits made by iGate's partners in a Nigerian venture, and that a complaint from one of those investors prompted the investigation.

"Greed is one thing," said William A. Warner, a former I.B.M. executive who had a contract to market iGate's products. "But this guy took it to another level."

Mr. Jefferson's lawyer, Robert P. Trout, said that given the investigation, the congressman and his family would not discuss their dealings with iGate. Mr. Jefferson, who is seeking a ninth term in office, said earlier this year that his family's dealings with Mr. Jackson were legitimate, and that when "all is said and done, you will see that there is an honorable explanation for everything."

But in his guilty plea, Mr. Jackson asserted that iGate's payments to the family's consulting firm amounted to bribes for Mr. Jefferson's help. He also said he believed that if he had stopped paying, Mr. Jefferson would have quit helping him.

Mr. Jackson, a boisterous man as big as a football lineman, has been cooperating with federal authorities. In a recent interview, he declined to talk about details of the case. But he said that while he had lost an earlier company to chicanery by business associates, "I didn't think it was going to happen to me in dealing with someone in government."

Several of Mr. Jackson's associates described him as an innovative engineer, if a bit naïve about business.

As a minority student with top science scores, he was recruited in high school by Bell Labs, which paid for him to get an associate's degree in electronics. After rising over 20 years to senior engineer, Mr. Jackson said he retired and started a company to develop videoconferencing from desktop computers.

The collapse of that business led him to start iGate in 1998, with a focus on delivering high-speed Internet access over the old copper phone wires. Mr. Jackson said he thought military bases, corporate campuses, hospitals and schools would be able to use iGate's relay boxes to send graphics and streaming video to outlying buildings without expensive fiber-optic lines. He also hoped to interest the phone companies.

Vying for an Army Contract

Mr. Jackson and Mr. Jefferson were introduced in late 2000 by a Washington consultant, Jack W. White, who had been hired to sell iGate's technology to the Army. Mr. Jefferson soon called an Army official to his office to press for a test of the device, which supported iGate's claims about data-transfer speeds.

In early 2001, the congressman told Mr. Jackson that he could not provide any more help, according to court documents filed in connection with the F.B.I.'s search of the congressman's office and Mr. Jackson's guilty plea. Instead, he recommended hiring the ANJ Group, a consulting firm just incorporated under the names of his wife and his daughters.

The women were hardly marketing professionals: Mrs. Jefferson was vice chancellor of the New Orleans campus of Southern University, and while the Jeffersons' oldest daughter was a lawyer, the others were still in school. Even so, iGate's agreement with ANJ provided for payments of $7,500 a month, plus 5 percent of any money it raised from investors and 5 percent of sales over $5 million it made for iGate. Mr. Jackson also gave ANJ 100,000 shares of stock and options for a million more.

Former iGate officials said Mrs. Jefferson made at least two marketing contacts in Louisiana, with a telephone company and a university, though nothing came of them. But, the officials said, it was her husband who kept driving most of the action.

Over dinner in New Orleans that spring, he and Mr. Jackson persuaded five men, mostly Jefferson campaign donors, to invest $375,000 total. One of them, Lloyd L. Villavaso, said he had left feeling an iGate contract with the Army was "pretty much a done deal."

By mid-2002, Mr. Jackson had persuaded a unit of Siemens, the German conglomerate, to manufacture iGate's devices. Mr. Jefferson attended iGate's annual shareholder meeting with a Siemens executive and an Army testing official, and that summer, Siemens invited Mr. Jackson to a stock-car race, where iGate's slogan, "Communications in Motion," was painted on two cars.

The congressman later did several favors for Siemens, at Mr. Jackson's request. Mr. Jefferson offered, for example, to arrange for the company's chief executive to be taken to the front of the customs line when he flew in from Germany, and he set up a meeting with Army officials about possible contracts, said Paula Davis, a spokeswoman for Siemens USA.

Reaching Out to Nigeria

Africa was another promising market, former iGate officials said, because few countries there could afford fiber-optic lines. In June 2003, the congressman introduced Mr. Jackson to officials at Netlink Digital Television, a Nigerian company that agreed to invest $45 million to use iGate's products in Africa. At this point, Mr. Jackson was developing a new product, a "triple play" switch that could deliver voice, data and video communications to home and business consumers. Netlink was to put up $6.5 million and finance the rest, with Mr. Jefferson's help, through the Export-Import Bank.

As Mr. Jackson began gearing up, Mr. Jefferson moved to increase his family's stake: in late July 2003, court papers show, he presented Mr. Jackson with an amendment to the ANJ contract, giving the firm 35 percent of iGate profits in Africa.

But relations soured with the Nigerian company, and by early 2004, Netlink was demanding some money back. The F.B.I. said Mr. Jefferson had also expected to receive a share of Netlink's profits. Agents found a letter the company's lawyer had sent the congressman that May, accusing him of breaking Nigerian laws.

In June 2004, Brett M. Pfeffer, a former aide to Mr. Jefferson, introduced him to a Virginia investor, Lori A. Mody, who ran a foundation that supplied technology to public schools. When Ms. Mody wired iGate $3.5 million for a new Nigerian deal, it looked as if the company was finally starting to click.

Mr. Jackson's original device had passed a field test at Fort Stewart, Ga., and Fort Sam Houston in Texas was about to begin what would become another successful test. Siemens had installed the technology in security systems at Howard University and Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport. That August, after the company demonstrated the triple-play switch, a top research official at SBC Communications, which later merged with AT&T, asked in an e-mail message to an iGate engineer how the company had managed to surpass an industry standard.

On Aug. 20, 2004, company records show, iGate granted the ANJ Group 30 million shares of stock. And that Labor Day weekend, said Ms. Davis, the Siemens spokeswoman, Siemens treated the congressman, Mr. Jackson and their wives to a weekend in New York, including airfare, lodging and tickets to the United States Open and "The Lion King."

An Informer Wears a Wire

But before long, nearly all of iGate's sales initiatives had stalled or begun to crumble. The Army had to pay for the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism. The biggest phone companies had decided to extend their fiber-optic networks or develop triple-play switches with other suppliers.

Ms. Mody, meanwhile, had become suspicious, and in March 2005, she agreed to wear a wire for the F.B.I.

Over the next several months, she recorded conversations in which Mr. Jefferson pushed for 30 percent of her profits. According to court documents, he suggested that 3o percent go to a Nigerian company owned by his daughters, and that both his sons-in-law be involved in the deal. The F.B.I. said he asked Ms. Mody for $100,000 to bribe Nigeria's vice president, and agents found nearly all of it in his freezer.

The wire also captured the congressman telling Ms. Mody that he was frustrated with how Mr. Jackson was running iGate, and asking her to help ANJ buy a controlling interest and replace Mr. Jackson. According to the F.B.I., he told Ms. Mody, "I'm in the shadows, behind the curtain."

Three days later, on July 15, 2005, at the Washington breakfast, the congressman revealed his takeover plan to Mr. Jackson, proposing that iGate be merged into a new company, with Mr. Jackson's ownership shrinking to 3 percent from 60 percent, said Mr. Harper, the iGate lawyer. Mr. Jackson was offered an incentive: $500,000 in cash and two years on the company's payroll, at a total additional salary of $1 million. But he rejected the deal, Mr. Harper said.

Since the case became public that August, Mr. Pfeffer, the former Jefferson aide, has pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges. IGate has rescinded nearly all the Jefferson family's stock grants. Siemens has severed its ties with Mr. Jackson, and iGate has closed its offices and furloughed its staff.

But even with his looming prison term, which could be reduced if he continues to cooperate, Mr. Jackson has not given up on his dream of providing broadband access both here and in the developing world. He remains disappointed in how slowly the phone companies have upgraded broadband services, and he continues to talk to investors about providing more bandwidth over leased phone or power lines, he said.

He has also become a minister at the Spirit of Peace Missionary Baptist Church here.

The pastor, R. Z. Miller, said that at first he was afraid the scandal might have set Mr. Jackson on "a run for the cross." But he said Mr. Jackson recently preached about his struggle to embrace forgiveness and atone for his mistakes. "I told Vernon that even though I teach forgiveness," Mr. Miller said, "I don't know if I could really forgive like he has."

Katrina Task Force Charges 400 With Fraud In 1st Year (FEDTIMES)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, September 16, 2006

More than 400 people have been federally charged with Hurricane Katrina-related fraud since Attorney General Alberto Gonzales convened a task force to investigate the cases last September.

According to Gonzales, charges have been filed in 30 federal districts in all U.S. regions.

"To take advantage of the devastation and recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast is both shameful and illegal," Gonzales said in a statement. "We must ensure that the criminals who have exploited this time of human suffering are brought to justice and that their crimes do not undermine the programs intended to rebuild the homes, businesses and communities destroyed by hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma."

The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force reported that as of last month, the Federal Emergency Management Agency had received more than 2.5 million applications for disaster assistance related to the 2005 Gulf Coast hurricanes. While most of these applicants had legitimate needs, the task force found that numerous people committed fraud in seeking benefits to which they were not entitled.

According to the task force, criminals often seek to exploit perceived systemic weaknesses in oversight or internal controls associated with disaster relief programs. The task force found that these people often work in groups.

In one example, 48 Mississippi residents were charged with creating and submitting fraudulent debris removal slips totaling more than $700,000. Four of these people were indicted for conspiracy.

The task force also found that insiders had exploited the system.

"A particularly distressing pattern of criminal activity has involved individuals who use their positions with governmental agencies and charitable organizations to exploit the disaster relief programs they are supposed to protect," the report said.

The task force encouraged reporting of possible fraud.

Vast Majority Of Katrina Fraud Complaints Not Investigated (NEWHOUSE)

By Sean Reilly, Newhouse News Service

Newhouse News Service, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Gulf Coast was still drying out last September when federal officials promised aggressive action against fraud stemming from Hurricane Katrina. A year later, complaints of disaster aid abuse are pouring in to one key watchdog entity -- the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's inspector general's office -- but only a small fraction have resulted in investigations, government figures show.

By the end of last month, the inspector general had received more than 11,000 such complaints for fiscal 2006, which ends Sept. 30, according to statistics provided by the office. Of those, 999, or about 9 percent, have been pursued, the numbers indicate.

Asked why such a low proportion of fraud allegations appear to be getting attention, spokeswoman Tamara Faulkner said via e-mail that all are reviewed, but some don't warrant further action.

Even if a complaint furnished only a little information, Faulkner said, "it would be evaluated, and a determination would be made on a case-by-case basis" whether to pursue an investigation or refer it to the Federal Emergency Management Agency or some other branch of the homeland security department.

At the same time, she said, some complaints are closed out-of-hand, because they lack "specificity or clarity."

As a rule, however, the inspector general "has to pursue those cases that have the biggest economic impact and seem the most believable," said Clark Kent Ervin, who headed the office in 2003 and 2004, in e-mailed answers to questions. "One can't go after every `nickel and dime' claim because there are too many of them and too few resources."

With 490 employees, the inspector general is a major gatekeeper for complaints of fraud, waste and abuse affecting a wide range of homeland security programs, including emergency aid. Since the homeland security department's creation in 2002, the office has won praise for its hard-hitting inquiries into subjects ranging from port security spending to the training of airport screeners.

After Hurricane Katrina struck in August of last year, the inspector general set up a special oversight operation that has since issued dozens of audits and reviews aimed at ensuring wise use of disaster assistance funds. That class includes emergency payments to households, money funneled to local governments for debris removal and payments to contractors.

But Katrina was just one in a string of storms to hit the Gulf Coast region in the last two years. Allegations of FEMA fraud have shot up almost 900 percent since fiscal 2004, while the size of the inspector general's staff has increased only about 9 percent, according to government numbers.

"Clearly, the figures underscore that more people are needed," said Leslie Phillips, a spokeswoman for U.S. Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the Senate committee that oversees the homeland security department.

A spokeswoman for the committee's chairwoman, U.S. Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, did not respond to requests for comment. Also not reachable were spokespersons for the Republican chairman and top Democrat on the House homeland security committee. In June, the House passed legislation stiffening penalties for fraud related to disaster relief.

The bill, which still needs Senate passage, won House approval soon after congressional investigators concluded that FEMA dished out between $600 million and $1.4 billion in improper and potentially fraudulent payments following Katrina and Hurricane Rita.

The inspector general is also part of the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, a combined federal effort announced by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last September.

Saying he would need more information, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra declined comment this week on the figures showing the low proportion of inspector general investigations. While the task force says its work has produced federal prosecutions of more than 400 individuals, Sierra did not know the total number of complaints received by all the agencies -- such as the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service -- that are participating.

Many of the allegations received by the inspector general involve allegations that FEMA gave money to people or companies who weren't supposed to get it, according to brief summaries obtained under the Freedom of Information Act.

In the summaries, all personal identifying information was blacked out, making it impossible to know whether the complaints stem primarily from ordinary citizens or other sources.

One complaint filed last year, for example, charges that an individual got $19,500, evidently for a home that suffered no flood damage.

Another claims that a nursing home received $50,000 "for a security camera that was not working prior to the disaster," the summary states. The inspector general has closed both cases, apparently without taking action, the summaries show.

They also reflect complaints from workers who say that FEMA contractors or subcontractors failed to pay them what they were owed. As a rule, the inspector general refers such complaints to FEMA's legal office, Faulkner said.

In most cases, FEMA takes no further action, spokesman James McIntyre said in an e-mail, "as these are not employees of a contractor the agency hired or has responsibility for paying."

Officials Want Former Governor In Prison (AP-Y)

By Mike Robinson

AP, September 16, 2006

Former Gov. George Ryan should not remain free while appealing his racketeering conviction and should start his prison sentence as scheduled Jan. 4, prosecutors said Friday.

Authorities argued in court papers that decisions made by U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer during the seven-month trial of Ryan and co-defendant Larry Warner were likely to be upheld by appeals judges.

Ryan, 72, and Warner, 67, were convicted April 17 of racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud and other offenses involving corruption when Ryan was secretary of state in the 1990s and later governor. Ryan was sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison.

Whether Ryan gets to remain free on bond is likely to depend on whether judges believe his appeal stands a good chance of winning him a new trial.

Ryan's attorneys said the dismissal of two jurors who were replaced with alternates means Ryan could easily win a new trial. They said that unauthorized documents brought into the jury room poisoned the deliberations.

Prosecutors took sharp issue with that contention, and warned of the "dangers that freely granting bond pending appeal pose to public confidence in the judicial system."

Bush Campaign To Donate Illegal Donation (AP)

AP, September 16, 2006

Donations that a former coin dealer funneled to President Bush's re-election campaign will be given to charity, barring further directions from authorities, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee said Friday.

Tom Noe, 52, has admitted arranging a contribution scheme to fulfill his promise to generate $50,000 for a Bush-Cheney fundraiser. He was sentenced Tuesday to two years and three months in prison on three charges, including exceeding federal campaign contribution limits.

Prosecutors said Noe gave $45,400 directly or indirectly to 24 friends and associates who made the donations in their names, allowing him to skirt the $2,000 limit on individual contributions.

Authorities said Bush's campaign committee was unaware of the alleged contribution scheme and unknowingly submitted a false campaign report to the Federal Election Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0064253

The campaign already has donated $6,000 it received from Noe and his wife, Bernadette, to charity, said Aaron McLear of the Republican National Committee, which represents the inactive Bush campaign.

"Barring any further directions from authorities, Bush-Cheney '04 will also voluntarily donate the $45,400 that was the subject of this investigation to charity," he said.

McLear said it had not been determined which charity would receive the money.

Noe still is charged with stealing at least $1 million from an ill-fated $50 million rare coin investment that he managed for the state workers' compensation fund. Investigations into the coin investment led to Gov. Bob Taft's no contest plea and conviction last year to charges that he failed to report gifts, such as golf outings.

Noe, who also was fined $136,200 Tuesday, will not have to serve his prison sentence for the Bush donations until after the conclusion of the coin investment case, which is set for trial next month. He has pleaded not guilty to 46 charges.

Chat Rooms Are Identity Thieves' Street Corners (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, September 16, 2006

NEW YORK (Dow Jones/AP) -- On a weekday afternoon in a chat room, hackers are busy exchanging credit-card numbers, cash, hacked servers, information and stolen identities.

A hacker called Pinokio logs on and posts six identities, known as ``fulls."

``Mesage (sic) for trade with me :)" he writes.

A ``full" contains enough information to take a thief on a multiyear identity theft ride, as it will include someone's Social Security number, home phone number, e-mail account and password, debit card PINs, credit-card numbers, and mother's maiden name. Hackers like Pinokio sell them in bulk for $1 to $5 a pop in an international ring of credit ``carders," as sophisticated as it is blatant.

Welcome to the world of identity theft, a market that costs the U.S. economy $56.6 billion last year, according to a study by Javelin Strategy & Research using methodology developed by the Federal Trade Commission.

The problem's so prevalent that financial advisers guiding America's affluent through investment decisions now want training on how to deal with the crime. Indeed, Charles Schwab Corp. is holding a session at its upcoming Impact 2006 conference in November on how to teach clients about the problem. Vanguard Group Inc. added a ``Security Center" section to its Web site to teach consumers about identity theft and other issues.

That's all the more significant given that the rich seem most at risk. While 4 percent of Americans fell victim to identity theft in 2005, 6.38 percent of households earning more than $150,000 reported fraud, the Javelin survey found.

``Ten years ago it was a bunch of frustrated teenagers who had something to prove," said Supervisory Special Agent Thomas Grasso Jr. of the FBI's cyber division. ``Now, it's all about the money."

There are several reasons hackers like Pinokio post these identities: to show he has good data and there's more to be had, to raise his status in the underground or to muddy the waters of any potential investigation by getting others to use a card he's already used.

``The other 240 hackers can get it right now and hammer this credit card in the next 10 minutes, and there is no way for a law enforcement officer to see who ordered first," said Dan Clements, chief executive of CardCops Inc., an Internet-security company based in Malibu, Calif.

Pinokio may have one more motive: bonding. The chat room's a community, said Clements. ``They're a brotherhood."

One of the stolen identities Pinokio posted belongs to Brandee Sissom. Her trouble began about a year ago, when she began receiving letters about credit-card accounts for which she had never applied. Credit reporting agency Equifax Inc. told her that people had been trying to open accounts in her name.

She recently noticed three charges for $25.90 from AOL on her credit card, canceled them and filed a complaint with AOL. The day her stolen data had been posted in the chat room, an anonymous caller told her that her Social Security number was compromised. But she still hasn't been able to change it.

``I have cancer, and I'm extremely tired all the time," Sissom said. ``And if you've ever been in a Social Security office; it's a long wait, and I don't have the time or energy to wait."

She put 90-day and year-long alerts on her credit. She said she has no idea how her information got online. ``I'm really careful with my credit information," Sissom said. ``I chop up everything."

The 363 hackers in the chat room are gathered together under the aegis of the room's administrators, the top dogs of this particular group. The chat room is hosted on Internet Relay Chat, more commonly known as IRC. At any given time there are thousands of chat rooms open, about 30 to 40 discussing credit-card information. This is one of the more popular ones. Anyone who knows the name of the room can log in.

According to the Secret Service, most carders are based in the former Soviet Union or Southeast Asia. Some, Clements, the CEO from CardCops, said, claim to make $10,000 to $20,000 a month.

``We haven't really seen any (other) illegal activity, (such as) drugs," said Scott Johnson, Secret Service Criminal Investigative Division's acting special agent-in-charge. ``They're too busy rolling on their piles of money."

The administrators are marked by an ``" symbol next to their name. They have what the FBI's Grasso called channel ops, meaning they can kick people out of the room and set passwords, as well as load programs onto the page, allowing the hackers to check the validity of stolen credit cards in real time.

An administrator will use a hacked merchant credit-card account, check the information and post it in the room. Typically, they don't actually charge the cards; instead they run authorization transactions, which don't cost the cardholder anything but confirm whether a given card is valid. The merchant takes a hit for the minimum transaction fee, usually about 10 cents, and the consumer is none the wiser.

Though there is no agency tasked with culling chats for consumer data, the FBI and Secret Service do occasionally monitor the rooms.

Eric Zahren, a spokesman for the Secret Service, said that he couldn't ``discuss or confirm" that the Secret Service monitors chat rooms, but did say that ``we've proved we can operate in the same environments" as the hackers.

The Secret Service, which was empowered by Congress to combat computer fraud, has 24 electronic crimes task forces across the country and 20 foreign offices working with local law enforcement on the issue. Their strategy is to go after top-tier carders, people who have millions of individuals' information at their disposal.

The Secret Service said it recently brought agents from Latvia and Lithuania to the United States for training on cyber crimes, and currently it is now running a training program in Thailand.

Cathy Milhoan, an FBI spokeswoman, said the agency doesn't have ``teams of people" monitoring these rooms ``24 hours." She said it monitors the rooms only when it has a ``legal reason for being there."

Since the FTC started tracking numbers in 2003, the total number of identity thefts annually has fallen 12 percent to 8.9 million from 10.1 million. But simultaneously the total cost of fraud has risen 6 percent to $56.6 billion from $53.2 billion, as the average amount of fraud per victim has risen 17.8 percent to $6,383. The most vulnerable age range is 25 to 34, with fraud affecting 5.4 percent of the U.S. population compared with 2.3 percent of people over the age of 65.

Jackson Mayor Is Indicted Over Crime-Fighting Tactics (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

ATLANTA, Sept. 15 — The mayor of Jackson, Miss., was indicted on six felony charges Friday after months of criticism and warnings that his unorthodox crime-fighting tactics might put him on the wrong side of the law.

Among the counts now faced by the mayor, Frank Melton, are burglary, malicious mischief, illegally carrying a gun and causing a minor to commit a felony. The most serious of the charges against him carry sentences of up to 25 years, said the local district attorney, Faye Peterson.

The mayor's supporters called the charges politically motivated and said he would not resign.

Some of the charges stem from a sheriff's investigation of the night of Aug. 26, when the home of Evans Welch, a man with a history of mental illness and petty crimes, was attacked by a sledgehammer-wielding group of young men without warning or permit.

Witnesses said Mr. Melton, who often patrols the city at night with the police and a group of teenage followers, had directed the demolition of the house, which he said was known as a place to buy illegal drugs. His two police bodyguards are also charged in connection with that event.

Dale Danks, Mr. Melton's lawyer, issued a statement acknowledging that damage had been done to "the drug house" and that "maybe better judgment could have been used."

"But," the statement said, "the charges that have been made against Mayor Melton are an extreme and excessive reaction."

Mr. Melton was also charged with carrying a gun on the campus of the Mississippi College School of Law, in a public park and in a church. The first is a felony; the two others are misdemeanors. All three of these cases had been referred to the local authorities by the state attorney general, Jim Hood, who had earlier written Mr. Melton a letter warning that he could not legally carry a gun in such places.

Mr. Melton, a former television executive, took office in July 2005, promising to lower the crime rate in Jackson, the state capital. He personally oversaw those efforts, drawing attention for going on nighttime raids, using the Police Department's only mobile command unit and wearing a police jacket and badge.

After The Clarion-Ledger, Jackson's daily newspaper, reported that he made a habit of traveling with guns, the federal Transportation Security Administration, the paper said, requested that he no longer carry guns aboard commercial airplanes, as he had under a waiver granted to law enforcement personnel.

In April, Mr. Melton used a police car to pull over four school buses on a highway so that, he said, he could talk to the children and hug them.

After a grand jury returned the indictments Friday, the mayor surrendered, posted a $50,000 bond and was released on condition that he refrain from using law enforcement vehicles, carrying firearms or supervising minors.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Blocks Strike At Northwest (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

A federal judge yesterday blocked a threatened strike by flight attendants at Northwest Airlines in a ruling that could strengthen the hand of struggling airlines that seek to reduce labor costs.

The flight attendants said they would appeal.

A prolonged labor disturbance could have forced Northwest into liquidation. Yesterday's decision, which affirms a temporary ruling last month, forces the airline's roughly 9,000 flight attendants to keep working at reduced wages and benefits, which the company says will save it $195 million a year.

Judge Victor Marrero of United States District Court in New York issued a preliminary injunction preventing flight attendants at Northwest from striking or taking other job actions. He also said in a written order that the bankruptcy judge overseeing Northwest's reorganization had erred in not issuing an injunction against a strike. In August, Judge Allan L. Gropper of Federal Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York had said he did not have the authority to block a strike.

In his ruling yesterday, Judge Marrero noted that Congress, in passing a host of labor laws that apply to airlines, has made it clear that keeping the nation's transportation system operating is vital. Northwest, which is based in Eagan, Minn., is the nation's fifth-largest carrier.

Northwest's other major work groups have either agreed to reduced pay-and-benefits packages or have had terms imposed on them. The carrier, in bankruptcy for nearly a year, is seeking to cut labor costs by $1.4 billion annually, sharply cut other operating expenses and raise capital. It hopes to emerge from bankruptcy early in 2007.

The judge's order "allows our customers to continue to book Northwest Airlines with confidence," said Douglas M. Steenland, president and chief executive.

Flight attendants were disappointed and said they planned to appeal.

"This fight isn't over," said Mollie Reiley, who heads the Northwest chapter of the Association of Flight Attendants. Flight attendants contend that Northwest does not need all the cuts it is seeking.

The case is a complicated one, involving three sets of labor laws and the federal bankruptcy statute. Judge Marrero said in his order that there was no direct precedent in the case. Under bankruptcy law, a company can gain release from an existing labor contract and impose new and reduced terms on workers, with court approval.

The threat of such an action has typically been enough to persuade workers to agree to a new contract at reduced pay. Earlier this year, the union leadership of the Northwest flight attendants twice agreed to new terms. But both times the rank and file rejected the proposed contracts.

So Northwest imposed pay and benefit cuts and longer hours on the flight attendants. At issue in this case is whether such new terms release the workers from the bargaining process and allow them to strike.

Judge Marrero, however, said in his order that imposing new terms is a temporary measure and that both sides remain bound to the mediated bargaining process.

If workers were allowed to strike when terms were imposed by a bankrupt carrier, the right of companies to impose new terms would be "a suicide weapon," he wrote. That would undermine the bankruptcy law, he added, and make it harder for companies to avoid liquidation.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Euclid Council Drafts Law To Propose New Districts (CLPD)

By Leila Atassi, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, September 16, 2006

Euclid- The city might redraw ward boundaries while also contesting a federal lawsuit that accuses the city's existing election system of keeping black candidates out of office.

Council President Ed Gudenas has drafted legislation that would give City Council the authority to propose new districts to ease a "statistical imbalance in population" in time for the 2007 election. The legislation is listed on the agenda for Monday's council meeting.

Hilary Taylor, the attorney representing the city in the Department of Justice lawsuit, said City Council might lack the authority to adopt a redistricting plan without voter approval.

Mayor Bill Cervenik said Friday his administration has been kept in the dark by council regarding redistricting.

"Not including the administration in discussion about this is very detrimental to what we're trying to do," Cervenik said. "But at least this measure shows that council is willing to look at adjusting borders."

The city has struggled to compromise with the Justice Department ever since a three-year investigation concluded that too many at-large council seats and districts that cover a large geographic area have diluted minority voting strength.

The city has never elected a black official, though more than 30 percent of its residents are black.

In June, Justice Department officials proposed that the city break four wards into eight smaller districts - each with a City Council member - and eliminate all at-large seats except for council president.

Currently, five of the nine council members, including the council president, are elected citywide.

Instead of accepting the proposal, Taylor recommended city officials demand evidence collected during the investigation before agreeing to redraw districts. Less than a month later, the Justice Department filed suit against the city.

Since then, court filings show that the city has continued to defend its current electoral system and demand a definitive explanation of the charges.

The city has challenged the Justice Department's claim that a diluted black vote - rather than a lack of black candidates or low voter turnout - is to blame for a dearth of black city officials.

Under the current system, black voters get a chance to vote for all four at-large seats and potentially harness their voting power for a candidate in each of the slots. The city argues that if districts are redrawn, as the Justice Department has proposed, the black vote could be confined to only two wards - creating six "super-majority" white wards in the rest of the city.

The city also contends that the Justice Department relied on inadequate census data that do not accurately reflect the demographics of the city.

In court records, the city provided results of a city-commissioned study of population changes since the 2000 census that found that more than 30 percent of Euclid's population is black and that at least one of the existing wards is predominantly black. Taylor argues this could naturally achieve the Justice Department's goals.

The Justice Department declined the city's request for more information about the charges and claimed that the demographic data the city provided is inadmissible evidence without expert testimony to back it up.

Taylor said the redistricting proposal would be an attempt to find middle ground with the Justice Department, rather than defend the city's current electoral system to the end.

"You can have a great case, but how much justice can you afford?" Taylor said. "We believe our system is defensible. But if we travel the whole path of litigation - I can't imagine how much it would cost this city."

Woman's Monkey Barred From Restaurants (SPRINGNL)

By Sony Hocklander, News-Leader

Springfield (MO) News-Leader, September 16, 2006

A Springfield woman filed a complaint with the federal government Friday after the Springfield-Greene County Health Department declined to reverse a decision barring her from taking her monkey into businesses that serve or handle food.

"I didn't feel I had any choice," said Debby Rose, holding her monkey during and after a meeting with Director of Health Kevin Gipson and Assistant Director of Health Ron Boyer.

Rose said her monkey, Richard, is a service animal that helps her cope with a debilitating anxiety disorder, which includes a racing heart, high blood pressure and panic attacks in certain situations -- particularly public activities. Richard helps relieve that and, according to the Americans With Disabilities Act, she said, he should be allowed into public food places.

Gipson maintained the health department's position that, according to its interpretation of ADA law, the monkey is a therapy animal or a pet -- not a service animal — and therefore not allowed in food establishments. According to health department research, "a service animal by definition has to perform a physical function for that person," Gipson said.

Gipson said he would reverse the decision if the federal government says Rose's monkey is a service animal. He encouraged Rose to file a complaint.

"What I need is something from the federal government, official, that tells me that that indeed is a service animal," he said. Even then, he added, there would be limitations on what the animal could do in the establishments, such as eating.

Shelby Butler said the ADA's definition for service animals has expanded. Butler, who attended the meeting to advocate for Rose, is an access specialist from Southwest Center for Independent Living, a not-for-profit organization that's federally mandated to assist people with disabilities. She also helped Rose file the complaint.

Butler said it wasn't the department's place to determine if Richard is a service animal. She also said that the ADA covers any disability that prevents a person from performing regular life functions.

Though the service he performs is a gray area, she said, "there have been instances where an emotional support animal has fallen under that category."

Rose said her disorder prevents her from going into crowded public places, such as grocery stores, ball games, restaurants and shops.

Without her monkey, she said in the meeting, "I can't function anymore. I can't go anywhere or do anything."

Butler scheduled Friday's meeting after the health department sent approximately 1,000 letters, dated Sept. 5 and naming Rose, to Greene County food establishments. It stated that businesses would violate a critical food code if they allow Rose to enter with her monkey.

Boyer said the letter resulted from five complaints the department received after Rose and her family dined recently at a buffet restaurant where Richard sat in a high chair and ate with the family.

He said there have been a dozen or more complaints about Rose over the past year, though he did not have documentation. Jim Fry, environmental health coordinator, later said there were 10 complaints.

Rose filed a Title II discrimination complaint under the ADA. In addition to the health department, it names Gipson and Boyer.

Butler said it could take several months to hear back from the Justice Department's civil rights division. They filed under Title II because it covers state and local governments, she said. A government decision might be based on the information gathered, Butler said, or it could go to federal court for a judge to decide.

Rose said she worries about how she'll cope without taking Richard into places like the grocery store: "I just don't think I could manage that again."

Islamic Group Puts Challenge To FBI Agents (COLDT)

By Janese Heavin, of the Tribune's staff

Columbia (MO) Daily Tribune, September 16, 2006

Meeting an effort to bridge IARA fallout.

A group of local Muslims aimed loaded questions at an FBI agent last night and fired point blank.

Does the FBI seek out Muslims as criminals? Is the government inventing new rules on a daily basis to entrap Muslim-Americans? What does the FBI think about Muslims in general?

Thorny questions, all of which were directed at FBI Supervisory Special Agent Richard Thornton as he addressed members of the Islamic Center of Central Missouri in Columbia.

Thornton and Agent Stewart McLaren visited the group in an effort to rebuild bridges between law enforcement and Muslims, bridges that might have crumbled when the FBI shut down the Islamic American Relief Agency in Columbia two years ago. Agents seized computers and belongings from the organization, searched the home of Director Mubarek Hamed and froze bank accounts with hundreds of thousands of dollars earmarked for charitable purposes.

U.S. Treasury officials contend the Columbia-based charity was the U.S. affiliate of a Sudanese charity, the Islamic African Relief Agency, which is accused of supporting al-Qaida and its predecessor, Maktab al-Khidamat.

"There is a lot of mistrust because our charities were closed with sealed evidence," said Corey Brand, president of the ICCM. "They suspected money was going to support terrorism. I certainly don't believe it was. I'm not aware of any charges being filed."

Thornton was careful not to discuss the charity closure in detail because it's still under investigation, but he told the group he thinks the act was justified.

"My belief as an FBI agent and representative of the United States is that it was legal and constitutional and fair, in the legal sense of fair," he said.

Other members asked whether they would be targeted if they donated money to the IARA, considered a "designated charity" since it has been shut down.

"I'm not aware of a situation where the U.S. government is looking at the average contributor to a designated charity as anything other than a victim," Thornton said. "With significant donors, there's a chance federal agents may want to talk to you about it."

Typically, significant donors stay in touch with executives of a charity to ensure the money is being used properly, he said. "If you're somebody who left or gave a significant contribution to a charity, there's a decent chance there has been that discussion."

Thornton would not specifically answer one of the most direct questions of the evening: Does he believe Muslims are the peace-loving people they say they are?

"That's a loaded question," he said. "I don't think I can take 700 people from any demographic and generalize."

Muslims reiterated last night that a few extremists do not represent their religious beliefs.

"You can find examples of extremism in every group and every culture," Brand said. "You can't take a few examples and condemn a whole culture or religion or race because of that."

Thornton expressed the same idea later in the evening, saying if he pulled together a similarly-sized group of doctors, farmers or any other subgroup in town, more than likely one person in the group would at some point in time have had or will have a run-in with the law.

It's a tricky tightrope, especially when certain subgroups have a history of terrorism.

But Thornton did assure the group that the FBI isn't "out to get" Muslims. After one man said he felt as though he "walks on eggshells" when it comes to the law, Thornton said the FBI has enough legitimate concerns to look into without having to find ways to get people.

But he didn't deny wire-tapping and other surveillance are used in Mid-Missouri.

"My job is to balance and protect the country while protecting individual liabilities. I have to protect everybody," Thornton said. "If there's a threat or possibility of a threat, I have to investigate that the best I can."

The federal government has internal checks and balances to ensure surveillance is done according to law, Thornton told the Tribune.

"I took an oath to defend and protect the Constitution of the United States," the 19-year FBI veteran said. "Part of that is to protect this country from terrorist attacks and to also protect individuals from being attacked" unfairly.

He assured the group that if any of them "ever come under scrutiny," the FBI would "do it fairly and constitutionally."

ANTITRUST:

'We Won't Pass The Bill' (FWST)

By David Wethe

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 16, 2006

DALLAS -- The latest attack on the Wright Amendment compromise, which stripped antitrust immunity from the proposed legislation this week, is a potential deal breaker, said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas.

"We won't pass the bill in the form it came out of the Judiciary Committee," Hutchison told reporters Friday after a lunchtime speech in Dallas.

"We're not going to open up a can of worms. We'd have to bring the bill down. We couldn't pass it," she said.

On Wednesday, the House Judiciary Committee agreed to cut language that gave the bill protection from claims that it violates federal antitrust laws.

"What we're trying to do of course with this bill is create a certainty about what the rules are going to be in this area," Hutchison said.

"We couldn't attract new airlines, which we want to do to add competition, if they knew that this interpretation would have to go through years of litigation to know what the rules are going to be."

The committee's action was a victory for the owner of the former Legend Airlines terminal, which is slated for condemnation by Dallas.

The owner, Love Terminal Partners, said talk of tearing it down killed an imminent deal to sell the vacant six-gate terminal for $100 million. Love Terminal has since sued the five local parties that struck a compromise on Wright -- American Airlines, Southwest Airlines, Fort Worth, Dallas and Dallas/Fort Worth Airport.

The deal calls for Dallas Love Field to shrink to 20 gates from 32, for through-ticketing to anywhere in the U.S. immediately and for lifting all Wright restrictions after eight years. Currently, the law limits flights from Dallas to Texas and eight nearby states.

The Love Terminal suit claims that the deal violates antitrust laws because it doesn't allow enough room for other airlines to compete at Love Field.

Several other airlines, as well as antitrust scholars, consumer groups and a neighborhood group near Love Field, have raised similar concerns.

The mayors of Dallas and Fort Worth and other key dealmakers from the airline and D/FW Airport have said the agreement has no antitrust violations.

Several versions of the Wright compromise bill are in Congress.

They must be reconciled and passed by the House and Senate before the end of the year, or the deal is dead, according to the local agreement.

Kevin Cox, D/FW's chief operating officer, stopped short of agreeing with Hutchison that the bill passed by the Judiciary Committee is a deal breaker.

"Obviously, if the senator is in charge of the Senate process and she feels that way, we will absolutely follow her," Cox said. "However, we're still hopeful that with her leadership and with the leadership of the House, we'll be able to find resolution on this."

The mayors could not be reached for comment Friday but said earlier this week that they didn't view the lack of antitrust immunity as a deal breaker. Dallas Mayor Laura Miller told the Star-Telegram on Wednesday that although she viewed it as a problem, there will be a way to work out the differences.

Hutchison has until Oct. 6 to work things out before lawmakers go home to campaign for the upcoming elections. They will return for a short, lame-duck session in November, but she said she's trying to get everything done now.

A bad bill is worse than no bill, Hutchison said. "But a good bill is the goal in September."

Hutchison: Wright Won't Pass Without Antitrust Exemption (DALLBIZ)

Dallas Business Journal, September 16, 2006

Without the antitrust exemption that was stripped from the Wright Amendment bill by the House Judiciary Committee earlier this week, the bill will have to be brought down, said the bill's author.

"We won't pass the bill that came out of the Judiciary Committee," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, told reporters Friday. "We'd have to bring it down. We couldn't pass it."

Hutchison said the absence of the antitrust immunity opens up the parties involved to legal battles.

"We're trying to stop the years of litigation that we think have caused so much pain in this district," Hutchison said.

Her comments came during a question-and-answer segment following a speech she gave at the North Texas Commission's 35th anniversary luncheon at the Hilton Anatole in Dallas Friday.

Hutchison introduced the bill in the House, which appeared to be on a fast track until antitrust concerns were raised.

The legislation, which is based on a local compromise between the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines, Southwest Airlines and the D/FW Airport board, calls for lifting Wright restrictions by 2014.

In return, the city of Dallas will use eminent domain to demolish a privately owned passenger terminal at Love Field, reducing the number of gates there to 20, down from 32. That has sparked anticompetition complaints, including a lawsuit filed by the owners of the gates.

Soon after the bill was introduced, an unsigned letter purportedly from the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, began circulating on Capitol Hill that raised antitrust concerns.

"What we've been trying to do with the bill is bring a certainty," Hutchison said.

Hutchison says the area won't be able to attract airlines if they aren't sure of the playing field.

Dallas-based Southwest Airlines (NYSE: LUV) spokeswoman says the airline also is supportive of the original bill, which included the antitrust provision. Without it, "it would be like throwing the agreement into the lion's den with no whip," she said. "That is not something that any of the parties would want to jump in to."

"It is my highest priority," she said of the bill. "I lose sleep every night."

Hutchison told reporters she hopes to have a solution this month. She says she is constantly trying to come up with the language that will push the bill through Congress.

Dynegy Eyes Deal For Power Plants (CCT)

By Rick Jurgens

The Contra Costa Times, September 16, 2006

Dynegy Corp., a financially troubled energy merchant affiliated with San Ramon-based Chevron Corp., plans to acquire a power plant portfolio from LS Power Group that includes about 15 percent of Northern California's electricity supply and an interest in a large Nevada coal project.

The proposed deal will cut Chevron's ownership interest in Dynegy from 20 percent to 12 percent but add to Chevron's stake in the coal industry, which is targeted by environmentalists concerned about rising atmospheric carbon dioxide levels that fuel global warming.

Dynegy will emerge from the deal with a 20,000-megawatt fleet of nonutility power plants that includes "a new strategic position in the California market," according to a news release. A megawatt is enough electricity for 750 houses.

"We support this transaction as an opportunity for them to grow the company," said Don Campbell, a Chevron spokesman.

Chevron, through Dynegy, would get a minority interest in 3,700 megawatts of generating capacity in Northern California, including big natural gas-fired plants in Morro Bay in San Luis Obispo County and Moss Landing in Monterey County, and a smaller oil-fueled plant in Oakland. LS Power acquired those properties in May as part of a $1.6 billion deal with Duke Energy Corp.

LS Power's growth plans mainly involve power plants that burn coal, a fuel that is abundant, relatively cheap but loathed by environmentalists. Coal-fired plants emit carbon dioxide at a much higher rate than natural gas-fired plants, while nuclear and hydroelectric plants emit virtually no greenhouse gases.

Chevron said in a recent corporate responsibility report that it shares "the concerns of governments and the public about climate change" and that it had slightly cut such emissions in 2005, to 61.7 million tons. Power from Chevron geothermal properties in Indonesia and the Philippines had helped reduce coal use there, Campbell said.

But burning of oil, gas and other products from Chevron produced 374 million tons of emissions in 2005, the report said. That included coal from Chevron's Pittsburg & Midway Coal Co. unit, which produced 14 million tons in 2005 and has reserves of 235 million tons in surface mines in New Mexico and Wyoming and an underground mine in Alabama.

Some in the power industry view legislated caps on carbon emissions as inevitable, and some companies are touting new technologies that cut emissions by gasifying coal and then burning it.

LS Power has instead opted to develop coal plants that burn pulverized coal, including a 665-megawatt "Plum Point facility in Arkansas (that is) the only coal-fired plant in the country currently under construction by (a nonutility) power producer." Darpan Kapadia, an LS Power spokesman, said that the company considered various design options and chose "the most efficient, commercially proven, clean coal technology."

LS Power has in the works an additional 4,000 megawatts of coal-fired capacity, including a 1,600-megawatt plant near the eastern Nevada town of Ely. Power from that plant and a nearby 200-megawatt wind project could help keep the lights on in Las Vegas, 250 miles away, said Eric Crawford, the project manager.

In the Dynegy deal, which requires approval from antitrust and energy regulators, LS Power will transfer its existing plants to Dynegy in exchange for a 40 percent stake in the company, $100 million and a $275 million promissory note. Dynegy will also get a 50 percent stake in LS Power's new plant development unit.

The deal comes four months after Dynegy paid off a $400 million loan from Chevron, whose interest in Dynegy extends back to 1996, when the oil giant contributed some natural gas operations to help create a Houston-based energy maker and trader that set out to emulate a better-known neighbor called Enron.

That path soon led to riches, especially in 2000 when natural gas and power prices skyrocketed and boosted the value of Chevron's ownership interest to $4.8 billion. But the price run-up sparked a financial crisis in California's newly deregulated electricity market, and triggered a fierce political backlash with Enron as the main target.

At first, Dynegy saw opportunity in the troubles of its larger and more notorious competitor. With the help of a $1.5 billion loan from Chevron, Dynegy moved in to rescue and take over Enron. But the deal soon soured, and Enron filed for bankruptcy. Dynegy soon became mired in its own financial troubles and accounting scandal, its chief executive resigned, and the value of Chevron's stake plummeted.

The deal announced Friday marks a new beginning for the power merchant, and signals that it no longer demands financial and management attention from Chevron.

EU Competition Commissioner Says Policy on Microsoft Differs Little From U.S. Approach

NEW YORK (AP) -- EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, involved in an investigation of Microsoft Corp., said Friday that the European policy toward the software company does not differ substantially from that of the U.S.

Kroes spoke Friday at the Council on Foreign Relations about fostering a global competition culture. She outlined three areas of policy development: combatting cartels, punishing those who engage in unilateral antitrust behavior and encouraging private damage suits that would serve the same purpose as regulation.

Of Microsoft, she said, "I'm not willing to say that there is a major difference in the way of thinking between the United States and ourselves."

The commission is investigating Microsoft over its Vista operating system. The investigation is the latest development in a case that dates to 2004, when it hit the software company with a record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine. Microsoft was fined another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July.

Microsoft has said its Office 2007 software will not include a way to save data in the popular Portable Document Format and that it dropped plans to include the format after Adobe Systems Inc. asked it to charge customers for the feature.

On Friday, Kroes said the commission was engaged in a debate over policies that would foster private damage lawsuits over regulation. That would bring the European legal environment closer to that of the U.S.

"You, in the U.S., have traveled much farther down this road than in Europe," she said, adding that she hoped the commission would conclude its policy debate on the issue early next year.

ENVIRONMENT:

Possible Source Of Bad Spinach Is Named As Outbreak Widens (NYT)

By Julia Preston And Monica Davey

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

SAN JUAN BAUTISTA, Calif., Sept. 15 — As the number of cases of a virulent strain of E. coli linked to fresh prepackaged spinach grew to at least 94 in 20 states on Friday, federal health authorities identified an organic produce company here in California as a possible source of some of the tainted spinach.

By late Friday, 14 of the sickened people had grown gravely ill, the federal authorities said, and one had died, a 77-year-old woman in Wisconsin. Health officials said they were unable to determine if the outbreak was likely to spread further.

The company, Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, announced a voluntary nationwide recall of its Earthbound brands of prepackaged spinach and salad mixes as well as prepackaged spinach it processes for numerous other companies, including Dole. Prepackaged spinach has been processed, washed and sanitized and placed in airtight bags or plastic trays.

In a statement, the company said it had stopped shipping spinach products, had removed spinach from all of its salads and was cooperating with state and federal authorities by allowing them access to company facilities and products.

Speaking to reporters at the company's operation here, a spokeswoman said there was no conclusive evidence that its spinach was contaminated.

"We're obviously very, very upset," said the spokeswoman, Samantha Cabaluna. "This is a tragedy for us."

DOJ_NMG_0064263

Dr. David Acheson of the Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition at the Food and Drug Administration said at a news conference that the F.D.A. did not have definitive evidence that Natural Selection Foods was to blame for the outbreak of illness. But people who have been sickened apparently ate its spinach, Dr. Acheson said.

"I want to emphasize that the investigation is ongoing," he said. "It is possible that the recall and information will extend beyond Natural Selection Foods and involve other brands and other companies at a later date."

At the company's headquarters here, set beside rows of vegetables, Ms. Cabaluna told reporters late Friday that company officials were distressed by the situation, and said that investigators had not reached conclusions about a possible tie to the outbreak.

Ms. Cabaluna said the company thought the recall was "the right thing to do." She added, "We are doing this voluntarily because we just want to be safe."

As grocers nationwide removed bags of fresh spinach from their shelves and restaurants took it off menus, health authorities said they were working to determine how the spinach might have come to carry the deadly bacteria. E. coli, which can live in cows' intestines without making the animals sick, is more commonly considered a risk for people who eat undercooked hamburger.

Health and agriculture investigators say the bacteria may have emerged at any number of points in the production process, from the field to the supermarket, making it more difficult to pinpoint the source.

In Wisconsin, which has reported the largest number of cases, Gov. James E. Doyle issued a plea on Friday for residents to call their doctors if they experience bloody diarrhea or other symptoms that might indicate E. coli and to throw out spinach still in their refrigerators.

"Simply washing it is not enough to protect you," Mr. Doyle said in a news conference in Milwaukee.

In addition to the woman who died, whom local health authorities described as a resident of Manitowoc County, 29 people in nine counties across Wisconsin have been sickened by E. coli, Mr. Doyle said.

Federal authorities reported one fewer case in Wisconsin, and state authorities here could not explain the discrepancy late Friday.

Ten of the cases in Wisconsin were confirmed since Thursday night, when the F.D.A. first announced the outbreak, and state health officials said they were still investigating at least four more suspected cases late Friday.

At least two federal lawsuits — one in Wisconsin and one in Oregon — have already been filed in connection with the outbreak. Both suits named the Dole Food Company as defendants. Officials at Dole did not respond to a reporter's telephone message.

In a suit filed Friday in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, Paul and Anna Zientek said their two children had become violently ill and developed a condition that could lead to kidney failure after eating baby spinach in late August; one child remains hospitalized, the suit says.

In a telephone interview, Gwyn Wellborn, 27, of Salem, Ore., described how she ate baby spinach four days in a row at her office, then fell ill with unbearable abdominal pain and bloody diarrhea within days. At one point in her hospitalization, she said, the doctors told her they thought there was nothing more they could do, that she might die.

"It became very real," Ms. Wellborn said, "and very scary."

Milwaukee public health officials created a hot line for nervous residents and reported a "robust" number of calls with questions and worries. At grocery stores here, bins for raw spinach sat empty and produce managers said they had few inquiries about the product. Most people, it seemed, had heard about the outbreak by Friday morning and had no intention of buying spinach.

Bette Massaro, who was shopping in the produce aisle at Grasch Foods in Brookfield, Wis., where a clerk had moved some 100 bags of spinach to the back of the store early Friday, said she had already thrown away her bag of spinach at home. Ms. Massaro said did not intend to buy another right away, even when the immediate outbreak was over.

This is not the first time leafy greens have been deemed a problem in E. coli outbreaks. As recently as August, the Food and Drug Administration announced the development of the Lettuce Safety Initiative, "as a response to the recurring outbreaks" of

E. coli O157:H7, a strain associated with fresh and cut lettuce. Federal and state officials are in the middle of a review of lettuce farming and processing in the Salinas Valley of California, where Natural Selection Foods and other growers are located.

According to the F.D.A., there have been 19 outbreaks of the specific E. coli bacteria now under scrutiny since 1995, and 8 of the incidents were traced to leafy produce.

In Salinas, growers in the immense spinach fields were dismayed by the broad scope of the federal warnings not to eat any fresh bagged spinach. More acres of spinach are produced in California than in any other state; last year, American farmers produced 53,700 acres of spinach, 75 percent of it in California.

Robert Eli Perkins, the executive director of the Monterey County Farm Bureau, said the growers were staying out of the limelight and waiting for a decisive determination of the source of the contamination. They were worried, Mr. Perkins said, that the broad recommendation issued on Thursday against consuming any bagged spinach would confuse consumers and might leave a long-lasting taint on fresh spinach.

For now, though, Dr. Acheson said Friday night, consumers should avoid all prepackaged spinach and mixed salad products, and throw out any products that have already been bought. Rewashing spinach and salad mixes at home may only worsen the problem by spreading the contamination, he said. And if a restaurant fails to specify the source of spinach in its items, diners should avoid ordering raw spinach, he said.

In addition to the Wisconsin cases, federal authorities broke down the E. coli cases by states this way: Utah, 11; Ohio and New York, 7 each; Michigan, 6; Oregon and New Mexico, 5; Indiana, 4; Idaho, Pennsylvania and Kentucky, 3 each; Maine and Connecticut, 2 each; and California, Minnesota, Nevada, Tennessee, Virginia, Washington and Wyoming, one each.

Calif. Farm Firm Linked To Tainted Spinach (WP)

By Michael S. Rosenwald And Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Federal health officials last night linked a deadly E. coli outbreak in bagged spinach products to a California farm company that sells organic produce in 74 percent of the country's grocery stores.

Natural Selection Foods, widely known for its Earthbound Farm brand, yesterday recalled all its fresh spinach products, along with packaged salads.

The company also sells products under the Trader Joe's and Dole brands, among dozens of others.

Many of the people who have become ill reported eating Natural Selection products, but the Food and Drug Administration has not yet found the bacterium in the company's products. The outbreak has sickened nearly 100 people in 20 states, including one potential case in Virginia.

FDA officials warned consumers not to eat packaged spinach, and last night it extended the warning to packaged salad products that contain spinach, as well as spinach at restaurant salad bars. The strain of Escherichia coli that is making people sick is particularly virulent. The bacteria can cause severe vomiting and diarrhea, and some people can develop kidney failure.

The warnings came on a day when grocery stores and restaurant chains scrambled to pull bagged spinach off their shelves and menus. Wal-Mart Stores Inc. removed its bagged spinach from stores around the country. So did Giant Food, Food Lion and Safeway. Cosi, a popular lunch chain, took baby spinach out of its hand-tossed salad. The Ruby Tuesday restaurant chain decided last night to remove all spinach from its salad bars and entree salads.

At Whole Foods Market, which cleared its stock Thursday after initial FDA warnings, signs were posted explaining to customers why bagged spinach was not on shelves.

"We pulled all our spinach in the store, not only the bagged stuff but any of the fresh stuff and any products that had fresh spinach in them," said Sarah Kenney, director of marketing for the company's mid-Atlantic region. The stores communicated with each other via e-mail. "We get questions like: 'What about the spinach in this dip?' The response is: 'Just pull it.' "

Spinach is a nearly $300 million-a-year industry and has been growing with the popularity of packaged salads. While sales of canned spinach have fallen 14 percent, to $34 million, from 2002 to 2005, sales of packaged spinach have risen. Sales rose nearly 36 percent from 2002 to 2005, to $158 million, according to AC Nielsen.

"I love spinach," said Ophelia Miranda, a District resident, who couldn't find it yesterday at a Whole Foods Market. "I'll stay away from it for a while."

Health officials made the link to Natural Selection Foods by interviewing patients, asking them what they had eaten in the week before they became ill, and then looking in the answers for a common thread. Once spinach was implicated, epidemiologists queried the people about where they shopped and what brands they had bought. That led to the California company.

A spokeswoman for Earthbound Farm released a statement saying the company was assisting federal health authorities in their investigation, including providing full access to its facilities and offering products for testing.

"We will do whatever is necessary to help protect the health and safety of the public," the statement said.

David Acheson, an FDA food safety official, emphasized last night that no E. coli bacteria has been isolated from any of Natural Selection's products and that recalls could extend beyond Natural Selection Foods. Samples of spinach that several patients still had in their refrigerators are being shipped to FDA labs for testing.

Food safety experts have been recently tracking an increase in the number of food-borne illnesses in fresh produce. Outbreaks in produce have been more frequent than beef and poultry in recent years, according to federal health statistics analyzed by the Center for Science in the Public Interest. From 1998 to 2004, there were 492 outbreaks of food-borne illnesses attributed to produce, including 86 in 2004. In the same period there were 324 outbreaks traced to beef, 402 to poultry and 626 to seafood.

Caroline Smith DeWaal, food safety director for the Center for Science in the Public Interest, said it was not clear what caused the increase in produce problems. "What is clear is that the numbers show they are not going down," she said.

James Gorny, senior vice president for food safety and technology at the United Fresh Produce Association, attributed the increase to several factors, including increased consumption of produce, better detection methods and advances in epidemiology. He said the public is also more aware of problems that could arise from tainted produce.

"We never thought to look at fruits and vegetables before, and now we are," he said.

Gorny said the industry has improved its communication with regulatory agencies and recently issued guidelines for handling melons, tomatoes, lettuce and leafy greens.

"These documents don't just sit on a table," he said. "We really try to get them out to industry."

Tom Stenzel, president and chief executive of the United Fresh Produce Association, said it is working closely with the FDA to determine the source of the current outbreak. "We've got to make sure consumers retain their confidence in the safety of these products," he said yesterday during a news conference at the National Press Club in Washington.

The outbreak prompted questions about how packaged spinach is produced. Gorny said it is sent to a processing facility after harvesting, where it is cooled and triple-washed in chlorinated water, "probably a more vigorous wash cycle than you can ever do in your home." The spinach is then dried, packaged and refrigerated before being shipped to distributors.

Raw, bulk spinach is harvested and packaged but not washed before it is sent to distributors, Gorny said. Stenzel cautioned that produce tainted with E. coli cannot be decontaminated simply by washing. "You can certainly reduce risk by washing the product, but you cannot eliminate the risk," he said.

The only way to eliminate the risk is to cook the product to at least 160 degrees, but health officials advised against that, saying preparing contaminated food could spread the bacteria.

BP Safety Under Fresh US Attack (FT)

By Sheila Mcnulty In Houston

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

BP mistakenly told state regulators in a 2003 application for an emissions permit that it had installed the updated equipment which investigators said would have prevented last year's fatal explosion at its Texas City refinery, the Financial Times has learned.

In the application, a copy of which has been seen by the FT, BP said: "Relief valves are routed to a flare; therefore, 100 per cent control credit is applied." A flare is a closed tank in which liquid emissions are received and the vapour burned off. But BP only applied to replace the outdated blowdown stack on the refinery's ISOM unit with a flare after the refinery exploded, killing 15 and injuring an estimated 500.

A blowdown stack is a tank with an open stack, used to dispose of emergency releases. An ISOM unit is used to boost the octane rating of gasoline.

"The fatal explosion would not have occurred if the ISOM unit had a properly sized and designed flare system," said Daniel Horowitz of the US Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, an independent federal agency that investigates industrial chemical accidents.

In BP's own assessment of the blast at its biggest refinery, it said the use of a flare system, instead of a blowdown stack – which the industry has been phasing out for years – would have reduced the accident's severity. BP said on Friday: "We follow the rules."

BP is under grand jury investigation for possible criminal charges in Texas. The FT has learnt that both the US Attorney's Office and the federal Environmental Protection Agency, conducting separate investigations of BP, have learned of the existence of the emissions permit document during their probes.

BP also is under grand jury investigation in Alaska for severe corrosion that forced it to shut half of Prudhoe Bay. Hearings are also being held in Congress over how BP let its field deteriorate to such an extent.

A year-long oil leak in the Gulf of Mexico, uncovered by the FT last month, and a spill in California announced this week, have bolstered claims that BP's US safety culture needs improving.

The BP document is part of BP's application to the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality for a revised Flexible Permit relating to emissions from the Texan plant. It is likely to surface in state court in the first civil cases arising from the blast to go to trial. BP received the permit in July 2005, four months after the explosion.

That trial is to begin on Monday, with the start of jury selection. There are roughly 550 outstanding death, injury and damage cases against BP, which has settled about 650 cases.

Ruling To Halt Forest Fee Will Be Appealed (AZDS)

By Tony Davis, Arizona Daily Star

Arizona Daily Star, September 16, 2006

$5 requirement for Mt. Lemmon, canyons at stake

The federal government has given notice that it will appeal a magistrate's ruling that could lead to elimination of $5 daily user fees in popular recreation areas, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix.

People now pay the user fees to hike or picnic on Mount Lemmon, in Sabino and Madera canyons, and in other sites in Arizona and around the West.

U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton's notice, filed Thursday, said the government will appeal U.S. Magistrate Charles Pyle's Sept. 5 ruling dismissing two $30 tickets the Forest Service issued to Tucsonan Chris Wallace.

Wallace was cited twice in September 2005 on Mount Lemmon for parking her car to hike in the Marshall Gulch area and near the General Hitchcock Campground without paying the fee.

Pyle's ruling said the Forest Service lacks authority to impose such a fee for trail use.

The user fee system requires anyone who drives up Mount Lemmon to pay $5 per day or $20 for an annual pass, if they park at hiking trails or picnic areas or anywhere else within a prescribed area on the mountain. That area includes all national forest along the Mount Lemmon Highway.

They do not have to pay if they drive up and down the mountain without stopping, or stop at campgrounds that have separate fees charged by concessionaires. They also don't pay if they stop at private cabins, Summerhaven businesses, scenic overlooks or vista points.

The appeal will be pursued in U.S. District Court. The Justice Department has 30 days from Thursday to file a legal brief on the case.

On Friday, a Forest Service official corrected a statement he made Wednesday that Congress has cut back its appropriations for Forest Service recreational programs by 50 percent to 75 percent over the past decade.

DOJ_NMG_0064267

Actually, the amount appropriated for recreation nationally has increased by 22 percent over that period, said Larry Raley, the Santa Catalina Ranger District's district ranger. He declined to comment on budget issues for the Santa Catalina district.

Fresno Judge To Rule On Air Suit (FRESNOB)

By John Ellis, The Fresno Bee

Fresno Bee, September 16, 2006

Decision about vehicle emissions could have national implications.

State officials on Friday asked a federal judge to throw out a lawsuit by the automobile industry challenging new state emissions standards that would be the toughest in the nation.

After hearing more than two hours of arguments, U.S. District Court Judge Anthony W. Ishii said he would issue his ruling later.

If he rules against the state, the closely watched case is likely to go to trial in January — and its outcome would have national implications.

Already, 10 states have adopted California's new emissions standards, and nine states in the Pacific Northwest and northeast, as well as New York City, have filed briefs on the state's behalf in the case.

The new state regulations, scheduled to take effect with the 2009 model year, would set tailpipe emission standards for greenhouse gases, which many scientists believe are contributing to global warming.

The regulations are expected to cut exhaust emissions in cars and light trucks by 25% and in larger trucks and sport utility vehicles by 18%. The operation of vehicle engines creates greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide.

"This is an incredibly important issue," Deputy Attorney General Marc Melnick told Ishii.

The rules were approved two years ago by the state Air Resources Board and stemmed from legislation signed in 2002 by then-Gov. Gray Davis.

In December 2004, more than a dozen San Joaquin Valley auto dealers — including Central Valley Chrysler-Jeep of Modesto, Kitahara Pontiac GMC Buick of Fresno, Madera Ford Mercury and Merle Stone Chevrolet of Tulare — joined DaimlerChrysler Corp., General Motors, the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers and others in filing suit to block the new rules.

At issue is whether California has the right under the federal Clean Air Act to regulate greenhouse gases through tailpipe emissions.

Under the Clean Air Act, California is the only state allowed to set emissions rules stricter than national standards, but it must first obtain a waiver from the federal Environmental Protection Agency. That has not yet happened. Other states, in turn, can opt for California's standards.

Washington, D.C., attorney Andrew Clubok, who represents the plaintiffs, told Ishii California's new rules are fuel-economy standards, which can only be set by the federal government.

He said the state's efforts to regulate greenhouse gases on its own violate antitrust laws, the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, foreign policy laws and other federal statutes.

"California thinks it's better to lead by example, even if it interferes with the position of the federal government," Clubok said.

He also said the federal Energy Policy and Conservation Act gives the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration — not individual states — the exclusive ability to set gas mileage regulations.

Clubok told Ishii the regulations would lead to a loss of jobs and the elimination of certain types of vehicles from the states that adopt the new standard. He said it would increase highway fatalities and pollution.

He also said the Valley would be hit especially hard because heavy-duty trucks needed in agriculture and related industries no longer would be available or would be much more expensive.

Automakers say the rules will increase vehicle prices by at least $3,000 as soon as they take effect. The air board estimates the increase at no more than $1,000 by 2016, spokesman Jerry Martin said. That added cost would be more than offset by savings in other areas.

By contrast, Clubok said, the only stated benefit from California is a reduction in global warming, but even that claim, he said, would be disproved during a trial.

Melnick, who called Clubok's statements a "parade of horribles" meant to frighten the public, said that if the regulations eventually are adopted, the automotive industry can take legal action in state court.

David Doniger, a Washington, D.C.-based attorney for the National Resources Defense Council — which has joined the state in defending the regulations — added that the automotive industry's arguments should be made to the EPA when the state seeks the waiver to implement the new regulations.

"This should be handled by the EPA in Washington, not in a courthouse in Fresno," he said. The reporter can be reached at jellis@fresnobee.comor (559) 441-6320.

Environmental Group Sues Federal Government To Halt Sales Of Toy Jewelry Containing Lead (FINDLAW/AP)

By Terence Chea, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Environmentalists sued the federal government Thursday to stop the sale of toy jewelry made with lead, citing dangers it can pose to brain development in children.

The San Francisco-based Sierra Club wants the Environmental Protection Agency to find ways to stop the sale or production of toy necklaces, bracelets and rings containing lead.

"I don't think parents realize that these pieces of jewelry have the potential to be harmful," said Jessica Frohman, head of a Sierra Club committee on toxic substances. Children can be exposed to dangerous levels of lead if they suck on or swallow the jewelry, she said.

The attorneys general in California and Illinois sent letters to the EPA supporting the Sierra Club complaint.

The EPA would not comment directly on the lawsuit, which was filed in federal court in San Francisco. But spokesman Mark Merchant said the agency has a "comprehensive set of regulations" to protect children from lead. It does not, however, have specific regulations for toy jewelry containing lead, he said.

Inexpensive toy jewelry made with lead or painted with lead paint is sold across the United States in vending machines and in stores that sell mainly to immigrant communities.

A 4-year-old Minnesota boy died of lead poisoning in February after swallowing a heart-shaped charm from a bracelet distributed by Reebok International. In March, the company recalled 300,000 of the silver-colored, Chinese-made bracelets found to be 90 percent lead.

Earlier this year, more than 70 major U.S. retailers, including Target, Kmart, Sears and Toys "R" Us, agreed to stop selling children's jewelry containing lead in California after an advocacy group, the Center for Environmental Health, and the state attorney general sued in 2004.

EPA Plans To Close Labs, Drop Scientists And Reduce Oversight (MCT)

By David Goldstein

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Environmental Protection Agency intends to close labs, cut its cadre of upper-level scientists and reduce regulatory oversight, according to an internal agency document.

In a memo dated June 8, a top agency official outlined "a set of proposed disinvestments, innovations, efficiencies and consolidations" for the upcoming 2008 fiscal budget.

"The decisions we make will be critical, difficult and will have long-term consequences," EPA Chief Financial Officer Lyons Gray wrote.

He said the EPA wanted to limit duplication and find "opportunities for consolidation and streamlining." EPA assistant administrators, regional administrators, the general counsel and inspector general received the memo.

Gray called for creating "Centers of Excellence" within the agency that would manage "contracts, grants and human resource work."

Asked about the memo, the agency said in a statement, "The EPA is committed to being good stewards of our nation's environment and good stewards of our nation's tax dollars."

It said the agency hoped "to accelerate the pace of environmental protection by promoting environmental results and accountability, innovation and using the best available science."

Jeff Ruch, the executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, a watchdog group that obtained the memo, said that rather than consolidating to improve the agency, the EPA was "chopping up the furniture to meet external budget targets."

The EPA's budget has been dropping steadily since it reached a record $8.13 billion in fiscal 2003. The Bush administration's proposed fiscal 2007 budget was nearly $1 billion lower, but Congress hasn't yet approved a final version. The fiscal 2008 budget plan is due in February. Gray said the financial outlook was "very challenging."

In his memo, he asked for plans to close at least 20 percent of the EPA's 16 research laboratories by 2011 - a minimum 10 percent cut by 2009 and another 10 percent by 2011.

He asked agency officials to suggest upper-level staff cuts, which would include scientists, analysts and managers. His memo hinted that more reductions could be necessary later.

Staff cuts could worsen what some experts have said is already a deteriorating situation, particularly with a significant number of EPA employees due to retire over the next decade.

M. Granger Morgan, the head of the Engineering and Policy Department at Carnegie Mellon University and the chairman of the EPA Science Advisory Board, told Congress in March, "The agency is in danger of losing core scientific expertise in both conventional and emerging environmental issues."

Morgan testified that research and development spending at the agency had fallen more than 16 percent since 2004.

A report in August from the EPA inspector general found that various studies have concluded that the agency doesn't always have reliable data to support its conclusions and "does not always use reliable science to support its rules and regulations."

Gray's memo also calls on the agency to work with state and tribal groups to look for ways to reduce regulatory oversight.

"The state and tribal grants have been reduced 25 percent since the administration started," said Heather Taylor, the deputy legislative director of the National Resources Defense Council, an environmental advocacy group. "First we take away the money to do their jobs, now we take away the oversight."

Fairfax Issues Pandemic Flu Response Plan (WP)

By Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Nearly 700 Deaths Possible in Outbreak

A severe outbreak of bird flu would infect nearly a third of Fairfax County's population, killing almost 700 people and sending thousands to local hospitals, according to a new report.

The 112-page primer on how the Washington area's largest local government would respond to a pandemic that many researchers think is inevitable depicts a grim scene of sick or at-risk people in widespread isolation or quarantine, at home or in hospital beds.

As much as 40 percent of the county's workforce would be out of commission. And hospitals, nursing homes and other makeshift medical centers would have to set up temporary morgues and stockpile body bags to handle the deaths.

"Life as you see it today will not be the same," Fairfax health director Gloria Addo-Ayensu said yesterday. "We will all have to make sacrifices."

Fairfax, which has posted its response plan on the county Web site, is the region's first local government to issue a comprehensive report on pandemic flu preparations, said Addo-Ayensu and other emergency management officials.

Although the Bush administration has released a federal plan and committed tens of millions of dollars to anticipate a crisis, the details of how to respond are left to state and local governments.

DOJ_NMG_0064270

Public health experts fear that avian influenza, which is spreading worldwide in poultry and has infected more than 230 people, could mutate into a virulent, pandemic strain that could spread widely from person to person, killing millions around the world.

There is no bird flu vaccine, and public health officials predict a shortage of antiviral drugs.

Fairfax, like most local governments, has planned emergency exercises; held meetings with doctors, businesses, school and religious leaders; and prepared public service announcements and publications to give residents information about a possible pandemic.

Now the county is giving its government officials, infectious disease specialists, emergency planners and first responders explicit instructions on what to do if people get sick.

"We have to look at the scenarios that are the worst-case," said C. Douglas Bass, the county's emergency management director, "and look at how we would deal with them."

Bass said the county took the unusual step of putting the response plan on its Web site "to assure the public that we are being vigilant, that we've gone through this process, and to provide a forum if they have questions."

It's largely a communications plan that dispassionately lays out military-style procedures that would be set in motion at the first sign of a pandemic. The goal is to minimize the transmission of a highly contagious virus while keeping the county government of 11,000 employees running, albeit with truncated services.

Taking its cue from federal officials, the county would track individual infections through reporting by local doctors and hospitals. Sites would be set up across the county to distribute a potential vaccine or medicine, and sick people could be forced into quarantine.

The county would communicate a series of sobering messages: A pandemic has been declared somewhere in the world, and Fairfax may soon experience illnesses and deaths. A pandemic could last as long as 18 months. And residents should practice good hygiene -- washing their hands and covering their mouths when they cough -- to prevent the spread of germs.

Many county employees would work from home, and hundreds could be diverted from their jobs in libraries, parks and other "nonessential" agencies to help with the emergency response. Critical personnel would include police and fire rescue workers and those in utilities and wastewater treatment. Heads of agencies are supposed to designate replacements who could fill in if they get sick.

And as a pandemic approached, thousands of other people would be ordered to stay home, steering clear of trains, buses, malls and other places where they would come into close contact with others.

The response could get particularly challenging in a county of more than 1 million people, thousands of whom do not speak English. As many as 51,000 of those infected would be low-income residents without regular access to medical care, the response plan says.

"Trying to do mass vaccinations, for example, would be a huge challenge," county spokeswoman Merni Fitzgerald said. "We are so big that we can't just say, 'Everybody show up at once place.' "

A flu outbreak could last six to eight weeks, with two waves over 18 months, the report says.

As more people get sick, waves of panic could spread, with increased calls to police. "Civil disturbances and breakdowns in public order may occur," the plan says. Crime could jump as police officers might be diverted from traditional duties.

And security problems could be rampant as people might fight for access to limited vaccines and medication. Health-care workers, the elderly and those with chronic illnesses would get first priority.

Interior's Internal Messes (NYT)

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

We knew that bad things would happen when President Bush filled many of his important environmental posts with right-wing activists and industry lobbyists who had spent their careers criticizing the laws they were now being told to uphold and representing industries they were now being told to regulate. Just how bad became clear this week in the course of some pointed testimony from the Interior Department's inspector general, who accused top officials at his agency of fostering a culture of "managerial irresponsibility" that tolerated conflicts of interest, cronyism and other lapses.

At a House subcommittee hearing, the official, Earl Devaney, said that "short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior." The committee had summoned Mr. Devaney to give his views on some flawed drilling leases the department signed in the late 1990's — before the Bush administration came to office — that could allow big oil companies to escape billions of dollars in royalties on oil and gas produced in the Gulf of Mexico. The leases appear to have been the result of bureaucratic bungling, not favoritism, but Mr. Devaney suggested that Interior had since gone to some lengths to cover up its mistakes.

On the broader subject of departmental ethics, Mr. Devaney expressed particular frustration at what he described as the kid-gloves treatment of J. Steven Griles, a former industry lobbyist who was deputy secretary during Mr. Bush's first term, before returning to the lobbying game. Regarded by many environmentalists as the Svengali behind Gale Norton, Mr. Bush's secretary of the interior until earlier this year, Mr. Griles brought a pro-industry bias to nearly every big decision made during the Norton regime. He was an architect of the administration's relentless search for oil and gas in fragile areas of the Rocky Mountain West. He was also involved in an agreement between Ms. Norton and the state of Utah that opened millions of acres of potential wilderness to commercial exploitation, and was instrumental in rolling back environmental regulations governing the mining industry.

Beginning in 2002, Mr. Devaney conducted an 18-month investigation into a whistleblower's complaints that Mr. Griles had behaved improperly by meeting with former business partners and with industries that stood to benefit from departmental decisions. The office of government ethics eventually ruled that Mr. Griles had not violated any laws. But Mr. Devaney has made clear his belief that Mr. Griles, who was allowed by Ms. Norton to stay on the job after simply confessing to bad judgment, should have been severely reprimanded, if only to send a much-needed message to the department that even the appearance of impropriety cannot be tolerated.

That message still needs sending, and it is up to Dirk Kempthorne, Ms. Norton's successor, to do it. Mr. Kempthorne has promised to investigate the foul-ups and cover-ups regarding the oil contracts. But he should broaden that inquiry to encompass the ethical shortcomings of an agency whose reputation for probity and fairness is as low as it has been since the dark days of Ronald Reagan.

Mexican Agents Complete DEA Course (SAEN)

By Gary Martin, Express-News Washington Bureau

San Antonio Express-News, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON – Mexican law enforcement agents completed a Drug Enforcement Administration program as part of a joint U.S.-Mexico effort to combat methamphetamine production in border states, officials said Friday.

The announcement that 55 Mexican agents and prosecutors completed the DEA course in Quantico, Va., comes one day after the State Department issued a travel alert for Americans in Mexico.

Training Mexican police to dismantle methamphetamine labs and prosecute offenders is "a big step forward in our fight against meth," said Karen Tandy, the DEA administrator.

Tandy called the program "a historic effort to jointly combat meth production and trafficking that is devastating both nations."

About 80 percent of the methamphetamine consumed in the United States is manufactured in Mexican labs by criminal organizations based in both countries, according to the DEA.

A war among drug cartels over control of narcotics trafficking and distribution routes is blamed for rising lawlessness along the U.S.-Mexico border.

That war is blamed for the death of a Monterrey policeman and the killing of a state police administrator in Tamaulipas earlier this month.

The State Department issued a warning to Americans traveling to Mexico to exercise extreme caution as execution-style killings of U.S. and Mexican citizens in border states have been reported.

DOJ_NMG_0064272

That warning includes a particular alert for Americans traveling in the border cities of Nuevo Laredo and Matamoros.

Tony Garza, the U.S. ambassador to Mexico, said in a statement that crimes in those cities are putting a strain on travel, tourism and business.

He pledged to work with Mexican counterparts to "restore order and successfully take on those undermining our society."

The manufacturing and trafficking of methamphetamine has become a growing problem in Mexico, the result of a crackdown in the United States where recent laws restrict the sale and access to pseudoephedrine, the main ingredient for the drug.

In May, Tandy and U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales met with Daniel Cabeza De Vaca, the Mexican attorney general, to address the methamphetamine problem in both countries.

U.S. and Mexican officials vowed to crack down on producers of the drug, and work together to combat trafficking. They unveiled the joint training program for Mexican police, modeled after a similar DEA program that has trained 300 Mexican agents.

Officials hope the new team of trained Mexican agents can target the largest methamphetamine trafficking gangs in Sinaloa, Michoacan, Jalisco, Sonora and Baja California.

In the United States, the DEA is focusing on traffickers and organizations transporting and distributing methamphetamine produced in Mexico and smuggled through American border states.

The DEA also is attacking money-laundering operations of the gangs and criminal organizations operating on both sides of the border. gmartin@express-news.net

Gun Collector To Remain In Jail, Magistrate Rules (SEATT)

By Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporter

Seattle Times, September 16, 2006

A Bellevue gun collector once questioned about the slaying of a federal prosecutor will remain in custody pending trial on a charge that he illegally possessed a machine gun.

U.S. Magistrate Monica Benton ruled Friday that Albert Kwok-Leung Kwan posed a flight risk and a potential threat to the community and to federal agents who would monitor him if he was freed.

At a hearing before the judge's decision, Kwan's attorneys acknowledged that he repeatedly invoked his Fifth Amendment guarantee against self-incrimination during appearances before a grand jury investigating the slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Wales in October 2001.

Kwan was arrested and held as a material witness for 23 days last year as FBI agents and federal prosecutors attempted to discern the whereabouts of two handgun barrels Kwan allegedly owned. The bullets that killed Wales were fired through the same, rare type of barrel, the FBI has said.

Kwan is not a suspect in the killing.

He was indicted last week for owning an unlicensed M-14 assault rifle the government says was capable of firing as a machine gun.

Kwan has hundreds of firearms — many of them licensed machine guns — in his home. Benton was worried about the safety of federal agents who would supervise Kwan if he was released.

Kwan's attorneys argued to have him placed in a federal halfway house while his gun collection was moved. His lawyer Joseph Conte said the collection amounted to nearly 3,000 pounds of guns.

Benton cited instances in which Kwan had been evasive or confrontational with agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, which has revoked his federal firearms license. Kwan, the magistrate said, appeared guilty of "not insubstantial" violations of ATF regulations.

"And this is a firearm offense," Benton said. "I have to look at his conduct in light of that."

IRS Orders All Saints To Yield Documents On '04 Political Races (LAT)

By Louis Sahagun

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Antiwar remarks at All Saints in Pasadena were made two days before the 2004 election. The church is ordered to hand over records.

Stepping up its probe of allegedly improper campaigning by churches, the Internal Revenue Service on Friday ordered a liberal Pasadena parish to turn over all the documents and e-mails it produced during the 2004 election year with references to political candidates.

All Saints Episcopal Church and its rector, the Rev. Ed Bacon, have until Sept. 29 to present the sermons, newsletters and electronic communications.

The IRS investigation was triggered by an antiwar sermon delivered by its former rector, the Rev. George F. Regas, at the church two days before the 2004 presidential election. The summons even requests utility bills to establish costs associated with hosting Regas' speech. Bacon was ordered to testify before IRS officials Oct. 11.

The tax code bars nonprofits, including churches, from endorsing or campaigning against candidates in an election.

Facing the possible loss of his church's tax-exempt status, Bacon said he plans to inform his roughly 3,500 active congregants about the investigation during Sunday's services. Then he plans to seek their advice on whether to comply.

"There is a lot at stake here," Bacon said in an interview. "If the IRS prevails, it will have a chilling effect on the practice of religion in America."

The congregants will have two choices: consent to the IRS request, or decline, which could result in the matter being referred to the Department of Justice and, possibly, U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, All Saints' lead attorney Marcus Owens said.

"The congregation's decision will be clear on Sunday or a few days after that," Owens said. "My guess is they will be unlikely to respond demurely and acquiesce in the government's request at this stage. The issues are too close to the quick of their fundamental religious beliefs."

Members of All Saints have a long history of social activism. The sermon that attracted the IRS' attention was delivered by Regas, who was well-known for opposing the Vietnam War, championing female clergy and supporting gays and lesbians in the church.

The medieval-looking church, just east of City Hall, seems to embody staid, moneyed Old Pasadena, but the liberal outlook goes back decades. During World War II, its rector spoke out against the internment of Japanese Americans. Regas headed the church for 28 years before retiring in 1995.

Exactly how the congregants will make their feelings known on the IRS issue is yet to be decided.

"It may come via e-mail, or as a yea or nay on Sunday, or some other means," said Keith Holeman, a spokesman for the church.

IRS spokesman Frank Fotinatos declined to comment on the matter saying, "We can't confirm or deny any ongoing investigation."

Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank), who unsuccessfully tried to launch a Government Accountability Office investigation into the IRS' probes of churches nationwide last year, called the summons "a very disturbing escalation" of the agency's scrutiny of All Saints.

"I don't want religious organizations to become arms of campaigns," he said. "But they should be able to talk about issues of war and peace without fear of losing tax-exempt status. If they can't, they'll have little to say from the pulpit."

The view was echoed by the Rev. Bob Edgar, an ordained elder in the United Methodist Church and general secretary of the National Council of Churches USA. "I'm outraged," he said. "Preachers ought to have the liberty to speak truth to power."

"There is a lot more to be done about this, and it may include some actions of nonviolent civil disobedience," Edgar said. "Since 9/11, the IRS, like the FBI, has been moving back to the 1950s and 1960s when a great deal of such activity was propagated against church leaders like Martin Luther King."

In July, the IRS warned 15,000 tax-exempt groups across the nation, including churches and nonprofit organizations, to stay neutral on politics.

At the time, IRS officials said the agency also began expediting investigations into charges of improper campaigning under a new enforcement program, the Political Activity Compliance Initiative. Under it, the IRS will no longer wait for an annual tax return to be filed or for the tax year to end before investigating allegations of wrongful campaigning.

Since 2004, the IRS has investigated more than 200 organizations nationwide.

Federal law prohibits the IRS from releasing the names of those under investigation, but the agency in July said it had 100 cases pending — 40 of them churches.

Among them is the agency's case against the NAACP, which drew the IRS' attention in July 2004, after the organization's chairman, Julian Bond, criticized the Bush administration's policies on civil rights.

All Saints came under IRS investigation shortly after Regas delivered a guest sermon that depicted Jesus in a mock debate with then-presidential candidates George W. Bush and John F. Kerry.

The sermon, which did not endorse or oppose any of the candidates, addressed the moral and religious implications of various social issues facing the nation at the time.

Regas' suggestion that Jesus would have told Bush his preemptive war strategy in Iraq "has led to disaster" prompted a letter from the agency in June 2005 stating that "a reasonable belief exists that you may not be a tax-exempt church."

After nearly a year without communication with the agency, Bacon said he was "quite surprised" Friday when an IRS agent handed him the summons at his church.

In addition to seeking electronic communications, the summons requests "a copy of all oral communications identifying candidates for public office delivered at All Saints Church or at events sponsored by All Saints Church between Jan. 1, 2004, and Nov. 2, 2004."

The summons also asks for various financial records. "Please provide an accounting of all expenditures associated with delivery of the sermon, including allocations of overhead." All Saints officials take that to mean such things as the pay of church staff.

Bacon said the IRS' renewed investigation raises concerns that it may reflect an attempt to quash the church's discussions of "fundamental religious issues with policy implications before the midterm elections, and in a way that intrudes into core religious practices."

"Despite the drain on our finances and the time we will spend defending this attack on the freedoms of religion and speech, All Saints Church will continue without interruption or fear what has distinguished its mission for 125 years," Bacon said.

Senate Confirms Minnesotan As Peace Corps Director (MINNST)

By Brady Aaverill

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 16, 2006

A Minnesotan has been confirmed as the 17th director of the Peace Corps. "I'm elated. I'm honored to be able to serve in this way," Ron Tschetter said after the Senate confirmed him late Wednesday.

WASHINGTON - A Minnesotan has been confirmed as the 17th director of the Peace Corps. "I'm elated. I'm honored to be able to serve in this way," Ron Tschetter said after the Senate confirmed him late Wednesday. He said he expected to start the job at the end of the month.

"Here you have a guy who understands the system and who is committed to making sure the Peace Corps is more effective today than it was when it was started under John Kennedy," said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., chairman of the subcommittee that has oversight of the Peace Corps.

Coleman said that while safety and security will have to be the foremost priority for Tschetter, he also hopes that Tschetter will diversify the volunteer base by recruiting baby boomers. The new director has said both will be priorities.

President Bush nominated Tschetter, 64, in July to manage the Peace Corps, which he has had ties with since he was a health volunteer with his wife, Nancy, in India from 1966 to 1968. He was also a chairman of the National Peace Corps Association.

Tschetter was raised on a farm outside Huron, S.D. He received a bachelor's degree at Bethel College, and he was president of the investment firm Dain Rauscher for 10 years before he retired in 2001. He became president of the financial services firm D.A. Davidson & Co. in 2004.

Appeals Court Split Opposed By Nevada Bar (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

CARSON CITY, Nev. — The State Bar of Nevada reaffirmed its opposition to a bill by Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) to split up the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, a frequent source of anti-Bush-administration rulings.

In a letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee, Rew Goodenow, State Bar of Nevada president, said the group's governing board opposes Ensign's bill "given the tremendous financial strain splitting the 9th Circuit Court would cause and thereby taking away from the direct administration of justice."

Besides that, Goodenow — who is active in state GOP circles — said the governing board believes there is "a lack of evidence supporting a quantifiable need for the split" of the nation's largest federal appeals court.

The conservative Ensign, who had eight co-sponsors for his measure, has pressed for its approval by saying the San Francisco-based court is overloaded.

Opponents allege political motives by Republicans annoyed by the court's rulings, including a 2002 opinion that declared the Pledge of Allegiance unconstitutional when recited in public schools. The Bush administration had maintained the pledge is not an unconstitutional endorsement of religion.

The 9th Circuit covers nine states and has 28 judgeships.

Snow Laughs (WASHEX)

By Jeff DuFour And Patrick Gavin

Wash Exam, September 16, 2006

Must be the beautiful blue eyes ...

Covering the White House is not an easy beat. The hours are late, the travel can be brutal and the tug-of-war between the White House spin machine and journalists can wear down even the toughest reporter.

But White House spokesman Tony Snow, who has been on the job four months, might very well be out to change all of that and to put the “fun” back in “fundamentally, a frustrating job.”

Yeas & Nays reviewed the press briefing and press gaggle transcripts from Snow’s first four months on the job and compared them to those of Snow’s predecessor, Scott McClellan, during his first four months.

Under Snow, there were more than 330 percent more instances of laughter — as defined by the transcriber’s insertion of “(Laughter)” in the transcript — than under McClellan.

Have reporters fallen for the former Fox News commentator’s woo and charm? And — gasp! — could Snow actually be making the notoriously curmudgeonly task of covering the White House fun?

“It’s not that Tony’s necessarily a laugh riot,” says Ron Hutcheson, who covers the White House for McClatchy newspapers. “But he engages, and it’s a lot more fun to be in the room with somebody who’s engaging reporters.” Hutcheson says that McClellan, on the other hand, “was just cautious, cautious to a fault. He would retreat to the talking points and it was almost as if he didn’t listen to the question.”

Snow says that his humor is not intentional. “It’s just doing what I do, the way I do it,” he says. “For me, the job is a blast. I love the job and I think that’s part of it. And I enjoy the people out there. It’s not like I feel as if I’m among strangers. You’ve just got to be yourself when you’re doing a briefing.”

But is there any danger in being a bit too humorous?

"Well, I do like to have fun, but at the same time you don't want to be doing stand-up as the spokesperson of the president and the leader of the free world," he says.

Obama: A little off the top, Tom

The Senate has its own Oscar and Felix in the freshman class.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., the Democrats' Next Big Thing, and Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., the conservative hard-liner, have made an unlikely bipartisan pair this year.

The two celebrated their most recent success before reporters Thursday — a database bill that would shed light on government contracts and grants.

Amid the elation, the two even caught up on grooming tips.

"What did I tell you about your hair?" the buzz-cut Obama asked the shaggy-haired Coburn.

"4:30 today, it's coming off," said Coburn, running his hands through his gray mane. "I should save some for you in case you end up getting thin."

The collegiality may be welcome for Coburn, who alienated many members over his rigid views on spending when he served in the House from 1994 to 2000. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., alluded to Coburn's tumultuous history in the lower body Thursday when he said, "if you were surprised at how quickly we moved a bill with Sen. Coburn's name on it, imagine how surprised he was."

Raj and Rudy: Right?

Many of you know Raj Bhakta from his appearance on the second season of Manhattan mogul Donald Trump's TV show, "The Apprentice." But Bhakta is hoping that you'll associate him with a different oversized New York personality: Rudy Giuliani.

Bhakta, who is running as a Republican in an effort to unseat Democratic Rep. Allyson Schwartz in Pennsylvania's 13th Congressional District, is touting a recent Northeast Times article by reporter Tom Waring titled "Raj a rising Giuliani type?"

"I share much in common with the outlook of Mayor Giuliani," Bhakta told Yeas & Nays. "I think it's a very relevant comparison. "The basis is that, in both cases, we're people of action. Giuliani has taken action in cleaning up New York City when it needed action, and Philadelphia needs representatives who are going to take similar action."

Of course, Bhakta, who trails Schwartz in the polls, stands to benefit from a potential Rudy-Raj partnership.

Shuttle Astronauts Complete Final Spacewalk At Station (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — A pair of astronauts completed the third and final spacewalk of their mission outside the International Space Station on Friday by freeing up a new heat-dispensing radiator and upgrading communications gear.

The two, Joseph R. Tanner, a former Navy pilot, and Cmdr. Heidemarie M. Stefanyshyn-Piper of the Navy, spent 6 hours 41 minutes in space completing assorted tasks to get the station ready for further expansion as building of the research outpost resumed in earnest.

Their main task was removing packing restraints and readying deployment of a radiator that was part of the new solar power array set unfurled on Thursday. Shortly afterward, mission control sent commands to unfold the 1,600-pound radiator, and its seven panels expanded to form a 44-foot-long, 12-foot-wide winglike structure.

The radiator is to disperse heat and control temperatures of the electronics inside the solar array module once it starts supplying power to the station in December.

The astronauts also adjusted a communications antenna and swapped out defective parts, retrieved a suitcase-size experiment that exposed various materials to space to see how they fared, cleared the path of a mobile workstation that traverses the station, and rearranged footholds and handgrips for future spacewalkers working outside the station.

Mr. Tanner and Commander Stefanyshyn-Piper conducted their first spacewalk on Tuesday, connecting the 17.5-ton truss structure that the space shuttle Atlantis attached to the station a day earlier. A spacewalk the next day by Cmdr. Daniel C. Burbank of the Coast Guard and Steven G. MacLean of the Canadian Space Agency continued installation of the $372 million addition and freed a big rotary joint that will allow the station's solar panels to track the sun.

An overloaded circuit breaker delayed the final spacewalk of the shuttle's 11-day mission by 45 minutes because it knocked out a depressurization pump in the airlock where the astronauts were preparing for their excursion. The problem was caused by heaters cycling on at the same time as the pump and was corrected easily, said John McCullough, the lead station flight director.

With completion of the spacewalks, Mr. McCullough said, the busy mission was winding down. This is the first station construction mission since the 2003 Columbia disaster, which resulted in a nearly three-year grounding of the shuttle fleet.

"We're all tired on this team, but happy," Mr. McCullough said at a news briefing from the Johnson Space Center in Houston.

On Saturday, the six Atlantis astronauts are to get a half-day off before packing up and preparing for the shuttle's departure on Sunday. The shuttle is scheduled to land at the Kennedy Space Center in Florida on Wednesday.

Shuttle Crew Finishes Project (WP)

By Marc Kaufman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Energy System Is Installed at Station

HOUSTON, Sept. 15 -- After a final six-hour spacewalk Friday, the crew of the space shuttle Atlantis finished building out the expanded solar energy system on the international space station.

The mission, completed by spacewalkers Joe Tanner and Heidemarie Stefanyshyn-Piper, was essential to any future construction at the station, which is half built and well behind schedule. NASA officials were delighted by the work done by the Atlantis team, the first construction at the space station since the 2003 Columbia disaster.

"We have to say what a wonderful job you both did today, especially you, Joe," Mission Control said as the astronauts returned to the station. "It was a legendary performance."

The extra credit went to Tanner because it was his seventh, and apparently last, spacewalk. He appeared reluctant to leave space at the end of the walk and spent some time looking out before entering the air lock.

The shuttle will leave the space station Sunday and prepare for a Wednesday landing. Before returning to Earth, however, the shuttle will circle the station and take the first full set of photos in several years. With the station's large new set of solar panels appearing as golden wings, NASA is expecting dramatic images.

Much of the work done Friday, and in the previous two Atlantis spacewalks, involved bolts and connectors that the astronauts had to open and close while wearing their bulky space gloves. Several bolts got stuck again, but none flew off into space, as two did in the other spacewalks. Fast-moving debris can harm spacecrafts, but NASA officials said they were certain that the missing bolts were far from the station.

NASA hopes to send 14 more shuttle missions to the station by 2010, at which point the agency hopes construction will be complete and the shuttles will be retired. Although Russian spacecraft travel regularly to the station, only the shuttles are large enough to carry some of the massive components needed to complete the station and its several research laboratories.

Congress Ducks (WP)

By Editorial

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

We know that you know that there is an entitlement problem. But the message hasn't reached Capitol Hill.

THERE'S NO great mystery about how to address Medicare's financial crisis. Either you contain the rate at which the program's costs rise, or you raise more money to pay for it. The federal office that runs the health program for seniors recently announced progress of each sort. Unfortunately, Congress may undo both.

The first announcement was that spending on doctors is rising more slowly than in the past. But the announcement assumed that Congress will follow through on its promise to cut Medicare payments to doctors by 5 percent next year. Congress made that promise after two consecutive years of failing to follow through on similar ones. Lawmakers show every sign of reneging again, and they may even award doctors an increase -- in which case part of the apparent progress in protecting Medicare's finances by containing medical inflation will turn out to be illusory.

The second announcement was that the richest 4 percent or so of retirees will face steep increases in Medicare premiums. Until now, all patients have paid a premium equal to 25 percent of the value of the benefits that the average retiree receives. In the future, the most affluent will pay more, though they will still be paying less in premiums than they take out in benefits. This modest reform, which won't affect the premiums 96 percent of retirees pay, is expected to raise an extra $20 billion for Medicare over the next decade. That's a fraction of the program's long-term funding shortfall, but it's still worth having.

That's not the way some Democrats see it, however. Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.) is pushing a bill that would repeal the higher premiums, arguing that rich retirees should not be hit with increases because they have already contributed generously to Medicare via higher taxes. This is like arguing that the tax code is in danger of becoming too progressive -- a strange position for a Democrat. Ms. Lowey also worries that premium hikes may be extended to a broader swath of retirees, perhaps even to those with incomes of $30,000 or $40,000. That might raise harder questions. But we are not there yet, and it's worth remembering that retirees with that sort of income still are among the richest third of Medicare beneficiaries.

The entitlement programs are not going to be fixed without some hard decisions. If Democrats oppose modest changes that hit only the rich, how will they find the courage to support far-reaching reforms?

Consumer Prices Up 0.2 Percent In August (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, September 16, 2006

Inflation slowed last month as Americans finally got a break at the gas pump, lifting consumers' spirits and easing fears the country could stumble into recession.

The Labor Department reported Friday that consumer prices rose just 0.2 percent in August, half the gain in July. With oil prices falling in September, economists predicted more good news ahead on inflation.

That should bolster consumer spending and make a recession much less likely.

The recent drop in gasoline — which had surged above $3 per gallon in early August and is now down to $2.62 nationwide — is helping to lift consumer confidence.

The RBC Cash Index, from the Ipsos international polling firm, showed confidence soared to a seven-month high of 93.7 in early September after a sharp fall in August. A separate consumer survey by the University of Michigan also showed confidence rising.

Analysts said the readings offered hope for a rebound in consumer spending, which slowed dramatically in the spring.

"The decline in energy prices is just the right boost at the right time," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com. "This should ensure that spending remains sturdy enough to keep the expansion intact."

Wall Street liked the inflation report. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 33.38 points to close at 11,560.77, just 162.21 points shy of its all-time closing high set in January 2000.

Consumers account for two-thirds of total economic activity. They have been under pressure from soaring energy prices, rising interest rates and a weakening housing market.

The spending slowdown in the spring cut overall economic growth to a 2.9 percent pace, down from a sizzling 5.6 percent rate in the first three months of the year. Zandi predicted that economic growth will average about 2.5 percent for the last half of this year.

With inflationary pressures easing, analysts said Federal Reserve policymakers are likely to keep interest rates unchanged — at their next meeting, Wednesday, and for the rest of 2006. The belief is that the Fed's 17 increases over the past two years have slowed economic growth enough to restrain inflation.

"Healthy growth and diminishing inflation — it's a soft landing in progress," said Bernard Baumohl, chief economist at the Economic Outlook Group, another private forecasting firm.

Not all the economic news on Friday was positive. The Fed reported that output at factories, mines and utilities dropped by 0.1 percent in August, the first setback in seven months.

Several factors contributed, including a drop in utility production that reflected the end of a summer heat wave and a fall in oil production related to the troubles with the Prudhoe Bay pipeline in Alaska.

While manufacturing production was flat in August, analysts looked for gains in coming months, reflecting in part a rebound in consumer demand.

The slowdown in inflation did not help workers' average weekly earnings, which dropped by 0.5 percent in August, after adjustment for inflation, when compared with July.

President Bush said Friday he expected the economy's performance would persuade voters to keep Republicans in control of the House and Senate in the November congressional elections.

"I don't believe the Democrats are going to take over because our record on the economy is strong," Bush said, asserting his tax cuts had helped the country withstand a recession, terrorist attacks and last year's hurricanes.

"I certainly hope this election is based upon economic performance," Bush said during a Rose Garden news conference.

The Labor Department report on the Consumer Price Index showed that core inflation, which excludes the volatile energy and food sectors, rose a moderate 0.2 percent in August, the same as the increase in overall inflation.

After hitting a record closing high above $77 per barrel in mid-July, crude oil prices have fallen by nearly 20 percent, helping to moderate prices for gasoline and other energy products.

For August, the 0.3 percent rise in overall energy costs reflected a tiny 0.2 percent increase in gasoline prices. Food prices were up 0.3 percent.

Outside of food and energy, clothing prices, which had fallen sharply in July, rebounded by 0.9 percent in August, reflecting higher prices for the fall and winter clothing lines.

Airline fares, which had been rising sharply because of fuel costs, fell by 1.9 percent, the biggest drop since last December.

Price Index Moderated In August (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

DOJ_NMG_0064280

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

What a difference a few weeks make.

A month ago the economy seemed to be in dire straits — wedged in by the inflationary pressures of soaring energy prices and rising labor costs while threatened by the prospect that the weak housing market would decimate consumer spending.

But yesterday, the government reported that consumer prices rose only 0.2 percent in August, pushing annual inflation to 3.8 percent, the lowest since April. Meanwhile, retail sales rose by a respectable rate of 0.2 percent in August. And in September, consumers' confidence about the future increased sharply.

The changes largely reflected declining gasoline prices, which not only dragged down inflation but also left consumers with more money.

The data suggests pricing pressures may have peaked. To many economists, this means that the Federal Reserve will probably maintain its benchmark interest rate at 5.25 percent at the meeting of its rate-setting committee next week.

"The economy appears to be leveling off," said Jack Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank in Chicago. "My sense is that we will dodge the bullet regarding inflation."

There are potential pitfalls on the horizon. A steeper decline in housing prices could slam the brakes on consumer spending and curtail economic growth.

But, so far, while the pace of consumer spending has slowed, it is by no means plummeting.

"Supply and demand are more balanced now," said Steven Wieting, an economist at Citigroup.

For months, the economy has been poised between competing forces pulling in different directions.

The economy has slackened, slowed by higher interest rates and a weakening housing market. Yet despite slower growth, energy prices continued to push inflation higher. Wages, which have inched up consistently over the last year, have threatened to put additional pressure on prices.

Indeed, the index of core prices, the gauge most closely watched by the Fed, which excludes the unstable prices of food and energy to provide an indication of underlying inflation, rose 2.8 percent in August compared with the year before, the fastest annual pace since November 2001.

The economic tug of war left the Fed and its chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, in a tight spot. Having increased interest rates by 0.25 percent at each of 17 consecutive meetings since June 2004, the Fed decided last month against tightening monetary policy more.

But with core price inflation still way above Mr. Bernanke's stated "comfort zone" of 1 to 2 percent, many economists said they were worried that the Fed had stopped too soon.

If the 1 to 2 percent range "is a credible forecast, the Fed has to do something about it," said Allan H. Meltzer, a professor of political economy and public policy at Carnegie Mellon University. "We are certainly not moving towards 1 to 2 percent inflation."

Jeffrey M. Lacker, governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Virginia, took the unusual step of dissenting, voting against the decision to stop increasing rates at the Fed meeting last month.

The more benign inflation figures in August appear to support the Fed's stance. Mr. Wieting said energy prices in the price index should also fall steeply in September. That is because the August data referred to prices midmonth and thus missed most of the recent fall in the price of gas, which declined by 30 cents a gallon, to $2.67, from Aug. 21 to Sept. 11.

Falling gasoline prices are also affecting inflation expectations. According to the University of Michigan's preliminary reading of consumer sentiment, reported yesterday, expectations of inflation one year ahead declined to 3.1 percent from 3.8 percent a month ago.

Core prices are not likely to follow energy prices down immediately. But they have been moderating. August was the second consecutive month in which core prices rose 0.2 percent, following three months of 0.3 percent inflation. And some prices that have perked up recently will probably abate. For instance, rising clothes prices, which also bolstered core inflation, are mostly a result of the arrival of more expensive fall fashions.

Rents have also played a big role pushing up prices. The National Association of Realtors expects apartment rents in urban complexes to rise 4.8 percent this year, up from 2.9 percent in 2005. The shelter component in the Consumer Price Index, which makes up more than 40 percent of the core, rose 0.2 percent in August, pushed mostly by higher rents.

Some economists argue, however, that rents should moderate eventually, because many condos that were built during the housing boom are now sitting unsold and will probably be converted into rental units.

And the moderating viewpoint is consistent with other data. Industrial production declined by 0.1 percent in August, according to another government report. Slowing output should ease inflation pressures.

"One of the components of inflation has been commodity prices across the board, from energy to metals," said Thomas J. Duesterberg, president and chief executive of the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI. "We are starting to see some moderation in these prices. That's consistent with the moderation of industrial demand."

The economic outlook could yet become bleaker. People who bought their homes using adjustable-rate mortgages to keep their monthly payments low are starting to see higher mortgage bills. Some are falling behind on their payments.

And many economists suspect that home prices are still likely to fall more steeply. This could decimate residential construction. And it could impair American consumers' ability to borrow and, therefore, to spend.

"There's a storm building there," said Dean Baker, co-director of the Center for Economic Policy Research in Washington.

But if so, it is further away on the horizon.

U.S. Economy: Price Gains Slow, Backing Bernanke View (Update3) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 16, 2006

By Joe Richter

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Prices paid by U.S. consumers rose in August at half the pace of the previous month, supporting Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's view that inflation will moderate.

The consumer price index rose 0.2 percent following July's 0.4 percent increase, the Labor Department said today in Washington. Excluding food and energy costs, so-called core prices climbed 0.2 percent for a second month. A report from the University of Michigan showed Americans were more optimistic about the outlook for inflation and the economy as gasoline prices dropped.

Stocks advanced as traders speculated the Fed, whose policy makers meet next week, won't resume lifting interest rates after 17 consecutive increases through June. The central bank, which has been criticized for being complacent about inflation, is forecasting price pressures will ease over the next two years.

``Inflation is starting to turn," said Scott Anderson, senior economist at Wells Fargo & Co. in Minneapolis. ``The core may remain stubbornly high for the rest of the year, so while inflation may have peaked, we're going to stay at elevated levels and the Fed will have to keep its eye on the ball."

Consumer prices rose 3.8 percent during the 12 months ended in August compared with 4.1 percent in the period ended in July. Core prices rose 2.8 percent from a year earlier, the biggest 12-month jump since November 2001.

`Good News'

The numbers were ``not as favorable as some would like, but they showed the CPI numbers down, and that's good news," Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig told an audience of bankers in Copper Mountain, Colorado. ``How we balance those will be, I think, an important part of the discussion that goes forward."

Separate figures from the Fed showed industrial production unexpectedly dropped 0.1 percent in August, compared with a gain of 0.4 percent the previous month. The proportion of industrial capacity in use declined to 82.4 percent from 82.7 percent the month before.

``I'm not quite ruling out one more rate increase in either the October or the December meeting" of Fed officials, said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group in Pittsburgh. ``We're close to the end, if not at the end."

Bernanke and Fed policy makers may be reducing borrowing costs by next summer, said Hoffman.

People surveyed by the University of Michigan this month said they expect an inflation rate of 3.1 percent in one year, compared with 3.8 percent in the August survey. The school's index of consumer confidence advanced to 84.4, from 82 in August.

`Fits and Starts'

``Consumer sentiment has improved mainly as a result of lower gas prices," said Chris Rupkey, senior financial economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi UFJ Ltd. in New York. ``The recovery in sentiment should lead to a gradual increase in the pace of economic growth, though it's going to come in fits and starts."

The gain in the August consumer price index matched the median of 80 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey. Estimates ranged from no change to 0.5 percent. Core CPI was also projected to increase 0.2 percent.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note was unchanged at 4.79 percent as of 5:02 p.m. in New York.

The consumer price index is the government's broadest gauge of costs for goods and services. Almost 60 percent of the CPI covers prices consumers pay for services, ranging from medical visits to airline fares and movie tickets.

So Far This Year

So far this year, consumer prices are rising at a 4.6 percent rate, compared with 3.9 percent in the first eight months of 2005. Core prices are rising at a 3 percent rate, after a 2 percent pace during the same period last year.

Energy prices rose 0.3 percent in August after jumping 2.9 percent a month earlier. Gasoline prices rose 0.2 percent after rising 5.3 percent in July.

Food prices, which account for about a fifth of the CPI, rose 0.4 percent in August after rising 0.2 percent the month before.

Housing costs, which include some energy costs and account for one-third of the index, rose 0.2 percent after rising 0.3 percent. A category designed to track rental prices rose 0.3 percent after rising 0.4 percent. Airfares fell 1.9 percent last month, the biggest drop since December.

Accommodation Costs

Rising rents, which account for almost 40 percent of the core CPI, have been contributing to inflation as less affordable home prices make renting more attractive.

The cost of medical care rose 0.4 percent, following a 0.2 percent increase in July.

Today's report puts the three-month annual rate of consumer price increases at 3.6 percent.

Retail gasoline prices fell to an average of $2.85 a gallon by the end of August, from $2.95 for all of July, according to U.S. Department of Energy figures. Gasoline fell to an average of $2.62 a gallon in the week ended Sept. 11. Crude oil prices declined and concerns over gasoline supplies eased with the end of the U.S. summer driving season.

Signs of a cooling economy that may help stem inflation pressures kept the Fed from raising rates last month for the first time in two years. The Fed's next policy-setting meeting is set for Sept. 20, and economists surveyed by Bloomberg News expect central bankers to leave the overnight lending rate at 5.25 percent.

Growth Forecast

The economy will expand at an annual rate of 2.6 percent in the final three months of 2006, down from an average of 4.3 percent in the first half, according to the median forecast of 81 economists surveyed Sept. 1 through Sept. 7.

Cathy Minehan, president of the Fed's Boston district bank, told a National Association for Business Economics meeting in Boston this week that her bank ``sees inflation subsiding slowly, assuming no further geopolitical or other shocks to oil prices."

Still, Minehan said the Fed will stay ``quite vigilant" against inflation, and economists said there is reason for concern that inflation pressures may persist.

Coca-Cola Co. said this month it's raising prices on Minute Maid Premium and Simply Orange juices for the third time in a year because of higher costs for oranges and orange concentrate. Prices will increase 3 percent to 6 percent in October, Coca-Cola said today in a statement. Before 2006, the Atlanta-based company hadn't raised orange juice prices in about five years.

Some economists said rising wages also pose an inflation risk after labor costs rose during the first half by the most in six years. During August, real average weekly earnings fell 0.5 percent after being little changed in July, a separate report from the Labor Department showed today.

Measure Favored by Fed

The Commerce Department said in an Aug. 30 report that the government's personal consumption expenditures index excluding food and energy, an inflation measure favored by Fed policy makers, rose at a 2.8 percent annual rate in the second quarter after a 2.1 percent rise the previous quarter.

The figure is above the comfort zone of policy makers who have specified a numeric inflation goal, including Bernanke.

DOJ_NMG_0064283

San Francisco Fed Bank President Janet Yellen last week defended the central bank's pause, and said inflation may recede ``faster than many forecasters expect."

Tame Consumer-Price Report Points To End Of Rate Increases (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

A tame reading on consumer prices lifted financial markets Friday amid hopes that waning inflation would allow the Federal Reserve to end its long march toward higher interest rates. The benign inflation figure, though, was largely the result of a small and anomalous statistical adjustment.

Easing fuel prices helped slow the increase in the Labor Department's consumer-price index to 0.2% in August from July, compared with 0.4% in July from June. The index, which measures inflation at the retail level, stood 3.8% above its year-earlier level, down from 4.1% in July. Core prices excluding food and energy, a measure watched closely by investors and the Fed, also rose 0.2% in August. Core prices were 2.8% higher than a year earlier, up from 2.7% in July.

ECONOMISTS REACT

The August CPI report is unlikely to get the Fed revved up when policy makers meet next week. Read a handful of economists' reactions1.

The core-inflation figure cheered financial markets, because it suggested that a string of higher readings earlier this year may have come to an end. Before rounding, though, the core price index rose 0.242%, not far off a 0.3% rise that would have been more likely to stoke inflation worries.

The main factor holding the core down: A seasonal adjustment that shaved one-tenth of a percentage point off the August increase in owners' equivalent rent, a proxy for the cost of housing that makes up almost a third of the index.

"We just squeaked by," said David Glocke, a bond portfolio manager at Vanguard Group in Valley Forge, Pa.

Patrick Jackman, an economist at the Labor Department, said the adjustment was an anomaly that had little to do with the underlying trend in rents, which have played the leading role in pushing up core inflation over the last several months. "While that had a dramatic impact on the actual number, as far as trends are concerned I certainly wouldn't make a big deal out of it," he said.

Nonetheless, investors concluded that the consumer-price report would calm Fed officials' inflation concerns and make them slightly less likely to raise interest rates from the current 5.25% at their next policy-making meeting Wednesday. Stock and bond prices rose immediately after the report, while futures markets lowered the probability of a quarter-point rate increase next week to 11% from 16%.

"The Federal Reserve is in pause mode right now," said Mr. Glocke. "I don't think there was anything that came out in the inflation report that would cause them to shift from that perspective." Last month, the Fed interrupted a string of 17 straight interest-rate increases in the hopes that a decelerating economy, together with stable energy prices, would relieve inflationary pressures.

Separate reports on industrial production and consumer sentiment Friday offered signs of a slowing economy and improving inflation expectations. The Fed reported that industrial production declined 0.1% in August as cooler weather precipitated a 0.8% decline in utility output. In a University of Michigan poll, consumers' estimate of long-term inflation fell to 2.9% in September from 3.2% in August -- a display of faith in the Fed's ability to keep prices under control. That confidence has been reflected in the market for inflation-protected Treasury bonds, where the implied 10-year inflation rate stood at 2.40% yesterday, down from about 2.60% at the end of July.

Still, many economists see reason to believe year-on-year core inflation could exceed 3% by the end of the year, testing the patience of consumers and investors alike. "It's really going to depend on whether or not the bond market has the intestinal fortitude to see core inflation going up while the Fed stays on the sidelines," said Steve East, an economist at investment bank Friedman Billings Ramsey. "It takes some degree of faith that the inflation numbers are going to peak and then come down."

The persistent rise in rents presents the main reason for concern. Over the past six months, tenants' rent and owners' equivalent rent have risen at annualized rates of 4.4% and 5%, respectively, well above other elements of the core index.

That trend is likely to stay in the system for a while: The high cost of buying a home is still sending people into the rental market, pushing down vacancy rates and giving landlords ample power to keep raising rents. Tom Toomey, chief executive of Denver-based United Dominion Realty Trust, which owns about 75,000 apartments across the country, says he has seen robust rental demand that has allowed him to raise some rents by more than 10% from last year's level.

"It's very unusual to see this much strength across the country in so many markets," he says.

U.S. Stocks Rally As Inflation Slows; S&P 500 Nears 5-Year High (BLOOM)

By Nick Baker

Bloomberg, September 16, 2006

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks rallied on signs of slowing inflation, pushing the Standard & Poor's 500 Index within half a percent of a five-year high and completing the market's best week in a month.

Microsoft Corp., the world's biggest software maker, jumped to its highest level since April after an analyst said its Vista operating system might go on sale earlier than forecast. United Technologies Corp., maker of Pratt & Whitney jet-engines and Carrier air conditioners, led the Dow Jones Industrial Average higher after increasing its stock buyback to $2 billion.

Consumer prices rose in August by half the pace of the previous month, a government report said, reducing the chances the Federal Reserve will resume raising interest rates. The gains put the Dow average within 163 points of a record close set in January 2000.

``Inflation appears to be decelerating," said Alan Gayle, who helps manage $70 billion as senior investment strategist at Trusco Capital Management in Richmond, Virginia. ``Some of the risks that have been in the market are gradually clearing away. We view this as encouraging."

The S&P 500 added 3.59, or 0.3 percent, to 1319.87. On May 5, the index reached 1325.76, the highest since February 2001. Losses in auto shares kept the market from advancing further as Ford Motor Co. delayed its North American profit goal by a year.

The Dow average climbed 33.38, or 0.3 percent, to 11,560.77. It set a record of 11,722.98 on Jan. 14, 2000. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 6.86, or 0.3 percent, to 2235.59. Volume surged because of the quarterly expiration of futures and options, known as quadruple witching.

Weekly Gains

Stocks climbed this week as oil prices tumbled and investors became more convinced the Fed is in no hurry to increase the benchmark rate.

The S&P 500 added 1.6 percent and the Dow average advanced 1.5 percent from Sept. 8, while the Nasdaq climbed 3.2 percent. For the S&P 500 and Nasdaq, it marked the biggest gain since the week ended Aug. 18.

Prices paid by U.S. consumers rose 0.2 percent in August following July's 0.4 percent increase, the Labor Department said. Excluding food and energy costs, so-called core prices rose 0.2 percent after a 0.2 percent gain the previous month. Both readings matched the median forecast of economists surveyed by Bloomberg News.

Consumer confidence rose more than expected this month. The University of Michigan said its index of sentiment increased to 84.4 from 82. Economists expected a reading of 84.

`Good News'

Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig said in a speech that today's inflation numbers are ``good news" and the Fed's past rate increases are ``still playing out" in the economy.

``If inflation is no longer a concern, the outlook for the consumer is bright," said Philip Tasho, who helps manage $450 million as chief investment officer at Tamro Capital Partners LLC. ``The markets may rally further if we see some positive signs that consumer sentiment is changing."

Policy makers last month kept the benchmark rate unchanged at 5.25 percent after raising it 17 times over two years to contain inflation. The Fed announces its next decision on rates on Sept. 20.

Microsoft jumped 52 cents, or 2 percent, to $26.85 for the third-biggest advance in the Dow. The shares may reach $33 in the next 12 months, up from a prior forecast of $30, Goldman, Sachs & Co. analyst Rick Sherlund wrote in a note. Microsoft's Windows Vista operating system may go on sale earlier than previously expected, he said.

United Technologies

United Technologies added $1.61, or 2.6 percent, to $64.61 for the best performance in the Dow average. The company had previously said it would buy as much as $1.5 billion in stock this year. ``The business environment remains very good around the world," said Chief Executive Officer George David.

Adobe Systems Inc., the world's No. 1 maker of graphic- design software, rose $3.35 to $37. The stock's 10 percent jump was the largest in the S&P 500. Profit this quarter will be as much as 34 cents a share on sales of up to $685 million. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect, on average, 32 cents in profit and revenue of $668.8 million.

About seven stocks rose for every five that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 2.19 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, the most since June 30.

The surge in volume reflected trading tied to the expiration of stock-index futures, single-stock futures, index options and options on individual stocks.

Homebuilders

Homebuilders jumped as investors bet the Fed won't push interest rates higher and cool the economy further. A gauge of builders in S&P indexes added 2.4 percent, bringing its weekly advance to 10 percent, the most since October 2003.

Pulte Homes Inc., the No. 1 U.S. homebuilder by stock-market value, added 70 cents to $31.97. D.R. Horton Inc., No. 2 in the U.S., gained 35 cents to $24.34.

Ford Motor Co. slid $1.07, or 12 percent, to $8.02 for the biggest plunge since December 2002. The No. 2 U.S. automaker, responding to a $1.44 billion first-half loss, accelerated job cuts and plant closings and projected that its North American auto business would remain unprofitable until at least 2009. Trading in Ford totaled 190.5 million shares, the most ever.

DaimlerChrysler AG tumbled $3.54 to $49.36. The world's fifth-largest carmaker cut its full-year profit forecast, citing a loss at Chrysler in the third quarter.

General Motors Corp., the No. 1 automaker, retreated $1.30, or 3.9 percent, to $31.66. It had the top decline in the Dow average.

Dynegy, Exelon

Dynegy Inc. added 31 cents to $6.07. The energy company agreed to buy LS Power Group's generating plants for $2.3 billion to create the third-largest independent U.S. electricity producer.

Exelon Corp. jumped $1.44 to $59.21. The company abandoned its $17.8 billion purchase of New Jersey's Public Service Enterprise Group because of an impasse with state regulators over the plan to create the largest U.S. utility company. Public Service fell $4.15 to $62.

Starbucks Corp. rose 82 cents to $33.85. The world's largest coffee-shop chain agreed to buy 40 stores from Diedrich Coffee Inc. for $13.5 million to expand in California and Oregon.

Adobe Systems Inc. (ADBE US) D.R. Horton Inc. (DHI US) DaimlerChrysler AG (DCX US) Dynegy Inc. (DYN US) Exelon Corp. (EXC US) Ford Motor Co. (F US) General Motors Corp. (GM US) Microsoft Corp. (MSFT US) Pulte Homes Inc. (PHM US) Starbucks Corp. (SBUX US) United Technologies Corp. (UTX US)

Inflation Data Bode Well For Economy (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

With the recent slide in energy prices, experts are forecasting moderate growth.

DOJ_NMG_0064286

A report Friday showing tame consumer inflation, coming amid falling energy prices, raised hopes that the economy may be entering a "soft landing" of moderate growth without recession.

If that happens, it could be because of consumers like Ellen MacArthur.

She and her husband, David, cut back on running errands in their suburban South Florida community when gasoline prices shot up earlier this year. But as pump prices dropped in recent weeks, MacArthur started running weekend errands again, even stopping for lunch along the way. And she notices she's not alone.

"There are much more people out there now," MacArthur, 44, said. "During the week, even at night, you pass by restaurants and there was a time they would seem kind of empty. And they're full now."

Economists say the recent drop in oil prices has the potential to boost consumer spending, giving the economy a lift and at least partly offsetting the negative effect of a weakening housing market.

Energy prices rose just 0.3% in August, down sharply from a 2.9% boost in July, the Labor Department reported Friday as part of an overall report that showed the consumer price index rising 0.2% in August versus 0.4% in July. The subdued overall inflation was helped by slower price rises for energy, transportation, recreation and housing.

The core consumer price index, which excludes volatile energy and food prices, rose 0.2%, the same increase as in July but down from 0.3% increases in the previous four months.

Overall consumer prices rose 3.8% in the 12 months ended in August, down from 4.1% for the July period. Core prices rose 2.8% in the last 12 months, compared with 2.7% for the 12 months ended July.

The average retail price of regular gasoline fell from $3.04 a gallon Aug. 7 to $2.62 a gallon Sept. 11 and is expected to average $2.55 a gallon by January, according to a report Tuesday by the Energy Information Administration. Natural gas prices are lower this year compared with last year and are expected to remain lower this winter.

Analysts say the possibility that inflation may be peaking suggests that the Federal Reserve's campaign to raise interest rates could be succeeding. The Fed paused last month after raising rates 17 consecutive times in two years. Fed watchers predict that the central bank will hold off on raising rates at its meeting Wednesday.

"All of these numbers seem to be falling right in with the Fed's tightening path," said Michael Englund, principal director of Action Economics in Boulder, Colo.

Consumer sentiment has been buoyed by falling pump prices, said T.J. Marta, a strategist with RBC Capital Markets in New York. RBC said Friday that its index of consumer confidence rose to 93.7 this week from 74.8 in August. The University of Michigan said Friday that its index of consumer sentiment rose by 2.9% in September, the first increase in two months. It included a 13.4% monthly gain in consumers' expectations of future economic activity.

"Falling gas prices have a profound effect on consumer psychology," said University of Maryland economist Peter Morici. "Everyone knows how important oil is and it's the one statistic that is continually before their eyes. Men don't buy clothes once a week and not everyone buys food once a week. But it's a communal thing: Almost everyone buys gas."

Kevin Sugarman, 27, commutes in his pickup truck 98 miles a day from San Jose to his job at a public relations firm in Alameda, Calif. With lower gasoline prices, he started taking his second car — a Toyota sports utility vehicle — out for weekend spins to the beach, ballparks and Bay Area restaurants.

"It doesn't seem that huge, but when you're driving that much it matters," he said of the price change.

As consumer spending increases, Morici predicts that economic growth will pick up in coming months from an annualized rate of 2.9% in the second quarter to 3.1% for the rest of this year and 3.4% next year. "We're accomplishing a soft landing. Today's inflation numbers are really great news and we're going to continue to see good numbers in September and October," Morici said.

Marta, the RBC strategist, was less optimistic. Given the weak housing market, particularly in regional markets such as California, it's "a close call." He predicts annualized growth of 2.3% for the rest of the year and 2.5% to 2.7% next year.

"I think the consumer has benefited from the lower oil prices during the past few weeks, but we're near the bottom of the range for gas and oil" prices, Marta said.

Also, wage growth appears to be mixed, making it uncertain how much it will boost consumers' spirits. Inflation-adjusted hourly earnings fell in August and were flat over the last 12 months, but average weekly earnings, adjusted for inflation, were up 0.3% in August, the Labor Department said Friday.

Businesses, once reeling from higher fuel prices, are also finally reaping some savings. But another report Friday showing that industrial output fell unexpectedly by 0.1% last month, the first decline since January, suggested businesses are still cautious.

Stevens Manufacturing Co. in Milford, Conn., expects to save on delivery of its aircraft parts as well as on heating fuel costs as the fall chill begins.

Company President Stephen Fogler, 46, lives on the shore of nearby Long Island Sound and has noticed that as gas prices fell, more boaters showed up at the marina and at local stores.

As "people spend less putting gas into their cars, they spend more at the mall," he said.

Morristown Drivers' Service, a trucking company based in Morristown, Tenn., employs 173 drivers and plans to invest fuel savings back into the business, said Jerry Malone, vice president of safety and personnel.

But the decline in gas prices could also stretch trucking companies if retail orders pick up in anticipation of increased holiday spending, said Bob Costello, chief economist for the American Trucking Assns. The next few months are a busy freight season, and the long-haul, heavy-duty truck industry alone faces a national shortage of 20,000 drivers, Costello said.

"The key for us is how much they think consumers are going to spend," he said.

Economist Englund said falling gas prices could jump start major purchases, especially autos, because new car prices fell 0.1% in August. Prices remained 1% higher than a year earlier.

Last year, David and Ellen MacArthur traded in their Ford SUV for a smaller Hyundai Santa Fe that gets about 11 more miles to a gallon.

Since gas prices started to fall this month, David MacArthur has noticed signs at local car dealerships advertising $5,000 to $10,000 markdowns on SUVs. He expects his neighbors in Port St. Lucie, Fla., to start buying soon.

"I think people are still waiting to see if gas will go down a lot," he said. "We've got hope."

Lower Oil Prices Drive Fall In US Inflation (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott In New York

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Inflation fell for the second month in a row in August, reducing pressure on the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates when it meets next week.

The consumer price index, a closely watched indicator of inflation, rose 0.2 per cent last month, in line with economists' predictions, after rising 0.4 per cent in July. On a year-on-year basis, CPI inflation is running at 3.8 per cent, down from 4.1 per cent in July.

The Fed has argued that a series of interest rate rises combined with slowing levels of economic growth have done enough to curb inflation, and consequently decided upon a pause in rate increases in August. Analysts said the slowing of inflation implied in the latest CPI report suggests the Fed is likely to keep rates on hold.

"This CPI data helps support the notion that the Fed will not need to raise rates further, and that inflation should decline further in coming months," said Rob Carnell, an analyst at ING Bank.

However, core inflation, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, is still rising - in August it nudged higher to reach 2.8 per cent year-on-year from 2.7 per cent in July. This remains above Fed chairman Ben Bernanke's preferred range of 1 to 2 per cent.

August and September have seen oil prices fall to their lowest levels since March, after reaching an all-time high in July. In August energy prices rose by just 0.3 per cent following a 2.9 jump the month before.

As such, some analysts saw the data as masking underlying inflation in the economy, and suggested that, in the longer term rates may start creeping up again.

"Core CPI ... is consistent with continued underlying inflation pressures and inflation running above a desirable pace for policymakers," said Alan Ruskin, international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

"This is not the kind of number that gets the Fed out the woods, it is just low enough to allow them to continue to play for time in assessing longer-term growth trends, notably in the housing market."

Air fares fell by 1.9 per cent for the second month in a row, helping to keep core inflation down.

Adding to inflationary pressure, rents rose faster than inflation, with owners' equivalent rent up 0.3 per cent, although the increase was smaller than in recent months and overall housing costs rose more slowly than in July. Prices of apparel rose by 1 per cent after falling in July.

US stocks opened sharply higher on the data, and benchmark 10-year Treasuries also rose, sending yields lower.

Wall St.'s Inconspicuous Rally Continues (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

It has been a stock market rally that dare not speak its own name.

With little fanfare — and with very few days of sharp upswings — stocks have been on one of their best runs so far this year. The Standard & Poor's 500 stock index is up 3.4 percent since July 31, to 1,319.87, just 6 points short of its five-year high in early May, and the Dow Jones industrial average is up 3.4 percent, to 11,560.77, 163 points from its record. Even the Nasdaq composite index, which was down for most of the summer, has turned up 7 percent since the end of July, to 2,235.59, and is now positive for the year. Yesterday, the Dow added 33.38 points, the S.&P. 500 was up 3.59 points and the Nasdaq gained 6.86 points.

Stocks have been buoyed by a significant decline in energy prices and a growing belief that the Federal Reserve will not raise interest rates again this year — an argument that won over more believers yesterday after a report on August consumer prices showed that inflation slowed. Crude oil futures are down 15 percent since July and national average retail gasoline prices have dropped to $2.73 a gallon, from a high of $3.10 at the start of August.

"Economic activity has been holding up pretty well and inflation pressures have eased," said Jeffrey N. Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Advisors.

Technology, retailing and consumer companies, which largely lagged the broader market in the first seven months of the year, have posted the biggest gains in the last seven weeks.

As rallies go, it has been very muted: Over the last seven weeks, the S.&P. climbed more than 1 percent or more and the Dow added more than 100 points on just two days.

The measured rise reflects a recognition by investors that the economy has slowed from the first quarter, when it roared at a 5.6 percent annual pace, but has not fallen into a slumber, said Alan Skrainka, chief market strategist for Edward Jones, a brokerage firm based in St. Louis.

Other analysts, however, caution that the concerns that sent the markets tumbling in May and June — rising inflation and interest rate increases by the Fed — have not completely dissipated. Inflation, while it has eased, is still running higher than the 2 percent annual level that policy makers are comfortable with.

Oil and gasoline prices could move higher again if another hurricane threatens oil production in the Gulf of Mexico, if tensions between Iran and the West reach another fevered pitch, or if the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries decides it has to support prices by cutting output. The economy could also sustain further damage if home sales and prices keep falling.

"If you believe that the housing market will slow down but not collapse and retail growth will still be in positive territory, then one ends up naturally thinking equities will do reasonably well," said Marc D. Stern, chief investment officer for Bessemer Trust, based in New York. But "if you are more skeptical of that, then I don't think the market looks very good right now."

A reason to be more hopeful, is that even amid the current rally, many investors remain bearish, said Bruce Bittles, chief investment strategist for Robert W. Baird & Company. He noted that demand for put options, a financial instrument used to protect against a drop in the price of stocks, had risen since the start of August. Surveys of market sentiment also indicate that many investors have as much as a third of their portfolios in cash, a high percentage.

When sentiment is this downbeat, stocks often move higher, Mr. Bittles and other analysts note. Conversely, when investors are very optimistic and have a large allocation of their portfolios in stocks, it signals that markets may be poised for a fall. "It's an oversimplification," Mr. Bittles acknowledged, "but it works."

Take Trusco Capital Management, a money management firm based in Atlanta. The firm has had a neutral view toward American stocks, because it believes that risks of higher inflation could prompt the Federal Reserve to raise its benchmark short-term rate, now at 5.25 percent, in the coming months, said Alan M. Gayle, the senior investment strategist and director of asset allocation. But he finds the recent data "encouraging."

Bond investors are indicating that they believe the Fed has inflation under control. Yields on the 10-year Treasury note, which move in the opposite direction from the price, have fallen to 4.79 percent from 4.98 percent at the end of July. When investors are worried about inflation, they demand higher returns for holding bonds.

As for oil prices, the size of the decline has surprised analysts. Crude oil futures touched a high of $77.03 a barrel in mid-July and closed yesterday at $63.24 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Gold prices, which have closely followed the rise in energy prices and are seen as a safe haven from inflation, have dropped 9 percent, to $577.50 an ounce, since July.

"It was well documented that there was plenty that could go wrong to push prices even higher" this summer, said Thomas Bentz, an oil broker at BNP Paribas in New York. But "we made it through the gasoline season without any major disruptions.''

"The hurricane season — I am afraid to say it fizzled out — but we certainly didn't see the number of hurricanes that were forecast."

The hurricane season ends in November, but with the exception of Ernesto, which hit southern Florida in August, it has not produced a significant storm, at least thus far. Another important factor is the flow of speculative money into and out of energy. Data on long and short interest from the Commodity and Futures Trading Commission shows that non-industry investors in oil futures turned bearish on crude oil futures at the start of August, just about when prices started dropping.

Oil Prices Up Despite Cut In OPEC Output (AP-Y)

Oil prices edged higher Friday but finished lower for the week after OPEC lowered its oil-demand forecast for the rest of the year.

Oil prices lost more than 4 percent for the week, and analysts said there has been a definite shift in energy-market psychology, as traders focus on the relatively comfortable balance between supply and demand as opposed to hypothetical supply threats.

However, Fimat USA analyst John Kilduff said in a research note that geopolitical uncertainty, which helped push prices to an all-time high of $78.40 in July, could eventually re-ignite energy markets.

"In the end, our bias still has to remain with the upside," said Kilduff. "It is only for the moment that psychology has shifted more to an economic track, and even there, we don't see the global economy breaking down, only a softening at the margins."

The Federal Reserve said Friday that the nation's industrial output unexpectedly fell by 0.1 percent in August, reflecting weakness in manufacturing and declines in mining and utility production. Analysts had been looking for a small increase.

Some worldwide economic softening was acknowledged on Friday by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, which said fourth-quarter demand for its oil would be 320,000 barrels a day lower than previously forecast, or 28.86 million barrels per day.

In 2007, OPEC expects demand for its crude to average 28.1 million barrels per day, or 800,000 barrels per day less than the 2006 average, in part because non-OPEC supplies are rising. As a result, some analysts believe the Vienna-based cartel, which is pumping close to 30 million barrels a day, may end up cutting its output by 1.5 million barrels a day or more.

"It looks for 2007 that OPEC revenues are going to be under pressure, from both price and volume," said Citigroup analyst Tim Evans.

After falling as low as $62.03 a barrel, light sweet crude for October settled at $63.33, a gain of 11 cents on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Still, oil prices remain about 20 percent below the July peak.

"It's been going straight down. We can't be surprised by a rally," said Man Financial broker Andrew Lebow.

Retail gasoline prices, now averaging $2.55 a gallon nationwide, have fallen about 15 percent in the past month and analysts say further declines are likely.

Nymex natural gas futures, which plunged 10 percent Thursday to a two-year low after government data revealed surging inventories, rebounded slightly. October natural gas rose 9 cents to settle at $4.982 per 1,000 cubic feet.

In other Nymex trading, gasoline futures rose by 2.28 cents to settle at $1.575 a gallon, while heating oil futures fell less than a penny to settle at $1.7023 a gallon.

Ford Cuts 10,000 Salaried Jobs, Delays Profit Target (Update10) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 16, 2006

By Bill Koenig and John Lippert

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Ford Motor Co., increasingly desperate to stem billion-dollar losses, accelerated job cuts and plant closings and projected that its North American auto business would remain unprofitable until at least 2009.

The second-largest U.S. automaker said it will shed an additional 10,000 salaried jobs, finish cutting 30,000 North American factory jobs by 2008, four years sooner than planned, and offer buyouts to all hourly workers. Ford suspended its quarterly dividend for the first time since 1982. The shares posted their biggest drop in almost four years in their highest trading volume ever.

The new cuts speed up steps announced by then-Chief Executive Officer William Clay Ford Jr. in January to ``retake the American roadway." They come on the heels of a surprise $1.44 billion first-half loss. Two weeks ago, Ford hired former Boeing Co. executive Alan Mulally, 61, to replace Bill Ford, architect of a previous failed restructuring in 2002.

``The market has changed so much and this company has lost so much market share that it needs radical surgery," said John Casesa, managing director with Casesa Strategic Advisors in New York. ``And that's what this announcement is: radical surgery."

Shares of Ford fell $1.07 to $8.02 at 4:03 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, nearly wiping out gains for the year. The 189 million shares traded was more than twice the previous peak set on April 26, according to Bloomberg data. Merrill Lynch changed its recommendation on Ford shares to ``sell" from ``neutral."

The 10,000 salaried job cuts come in addition to 4,000 posts eliminated before March 31. The combined totals mean Ford is slashing almost 40 percent of its salaried workforce -- from car designers to financial analysts to secretaries -- in North America.

Mulally's Review

The company will delay steps such as selling brands or other assets until Mulally has a chance to study such proposals, four people familiar with the strategy said last week. Executive Vice President Mark Schulz, who heads Ford's international operations, said today that Ford's money-losing Jaguar luxury car unit won't be sold.

Ford's worldwide workforce shriveled 16 percent from 2002 through the end of last year. Its share price was $58.69 at the start of 1999, when Bill Ford became chairman, and has since declined 86 percent.

After Ford's announcement today, rival DaimlerChrysler AG cut its full-year profit forecast because of a projected 1.2 billion euro loss ($1.5 billion) at its U.S. Chrysler unit in the third quarter.

Losing Market Share

Ford, of Dearborn, Michigan, has lost U.S. market share every year since 1995 and today said the slide will continue. The company declared that its turnaround would be led by products, just as it did in 2002. More than 70 percent of Ford, Lincoln and Mercury vehicles will be new or ``significantly upgraded" before 2009, Ford said.

DOJ_NMG_0064291

Ford's 7.45 percent note due in 2031 fell 1.5 cents to 76.75 cents on the dollar, yielding 10 percent, according to Trace, the NASD's bond-price reporting service. The debt closed at 80.5 cents, its highest level in 2006, on Sept. 12.

The company is battling falling sales of F-Series pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles, the main sources of its auto profits. After losses in seven of the past eight quarters at the North American automotive unit, Ford is cutting second-half production by 16 percent.

The automaker today dropped a pledge made in January to earn a profit on its North American automotive operations in 2008. Instead, in recognition of the impact of its first-half losses, the company projects a profit in the region in 2009.

Internal forecasts say Ford's global automotive losses may double to more than $8 billion in 2006, four people familiar with the figures said this month.

New Products

To help convince investors that its lineup of future products is sufficient to boost market share, Ford will introduce a redesigned version of the Super Duty commercial pickup in the first quarter of 2007, plus an ``all-new" F-150 pickup and new compact cars and sub-compacts in coming years.

``This plan is meant to turn our company around," Executive Vice President Mark Fields, chief of the North American auto unit, said in an interview. ``I think we have a very realistic plan with conservative assumptions."

As its closes plants, Ford said it will maintain one shift at its St. Thomas, Ontario, plant to build the Lincoln Town Car.

Ford said its North American manufacturing capacity will be cut to 3.6 million cars and trucks by the end of 2008, a 26 percent decline from last year.

Deteriorating Fast

Management has ``concluded that Ford is deteriorating much faster than they had initially assumed, and that's wholesome" said Eugene Jennings, a business professor emeritus at Michigan State University.

``The question now is whether they have the right management team to overcome the inertia that set in when Bill Ford was chief executive."

Ford managers today said the company can fix North American operations without resorting to broader steps.

Bill Ford, in response to a question, said going private is ``not in our plans." He also said the company's sales ranking in the U.S. ``doesn't matter" if the company's auto operations return to profitability.

Toyota Motor Corp.'s sales in the U.S. exceeded Ford's for the first time in July. Ford regained the No. 2 slot behind General Motors Corp. in August.

Chief Financial Officer Don Leclair said Ford management didn't decide until a board meeting yesterday that it would postpone the 2008 target of returning North American auto operations to profitability. Fields said that meeting the 2008 goal would have reduced investment in new cars and trucks.

Ford Credit

Leclair also said the company wasn't looking to sell a stake in Ford Motor Credit Co., which makes loans to buyers of Ford-produced cars and trucks.

``We have thought long and hard on this," Leclair said. ``We concluded the credit company is an integral part of the motor company."

GM, also battling losses, earlier this year agreed to sell a 51 percent stake in General Motors Acceptance Corp. The automaker made the sale to raise cash and to improve credit ratings for GMAC, which are below investment grade.

The decision on Ford Credit was the ``single most disappointing aspect" of today's announcement for bondholders, Pete Hastings, fixed-income analyst with Morgan Keegan Inc. in Memphis, Tennessee, said in an email. He said he expects the price of Ford bonds to fall.

Visteon Deadline

The company said the plants it took back from auto-parts maker Visteon Corp. last year will be sold or closed by the end of 2008. Ford originally took back 23 factories and offices from its former subsidiary. Two were made permanent parts of Ford's North American operations and the rest were to be sold or closed.

This is the first time Ford has publicly set a target for disposing of those operations.

Ford said it will complete cutting as many as 30,000 manufacturing jobs by the end of 2008, moved up from the original 2012 target. The automaker estimated it will reduce its operating costs by about $5 billion a year by 2008.

Ford also has completed new work-rule agreements at 30 of its 42 North American plants. Such agreements affect the way Ford deploys factory workers. The automaker projects the new agreements will save $600 million annually.

More Plants Named

The company identified two more plants to be closed: a metal-stamping plant in Maumee, Ohio, and an engine plant in Essex, Ontario. That brings the total number of plants identified to nine.

Also, a Norfolk, Virginia, plant that makes the F-150 truck, originally set to close in 2008, will close one year earlier. That plant and a St. Paul, Minnesota, plant, scheduled to close in 2008, will be reduced to one shift from two.

The company's Dearborn Truck plant in Michigan will be expanded in 2007 to three shifts for F-150 production.

Ford said today that its U.S. market share will continue to fall, a sign that it has given up on Bill Ford's January goal of stemming the decline this year. Ford's U.S. brands -- Ford, Lincoln and Mercury -- captured 16.8 percent of the market this year through August. That figure will decline to ``the low-16 percent range'' by the end of this year and 14 to 15 percent ``going forward,'' a Ford statement said.

Discontinued Vehicles

The company said further declines are occurring because of vehicles it's discontinuing. Ford ceased production of the Monterey minivan, will stop making Taurus sedans later this year and the Freestar minivan in 2007.

Ford will concentrate on selling cars and trucks to individual buyers, where profits are higher.

Ford is using ``realistic business assumptions'' in making the market-share forecast, spokesman Oscar Suris said in an interview. He declined to say when the U.S. brands will reach the 14 to 15 percent level.

Ford was supposed to generate $7 billion in pretax profits this year under the restructuring plan announced in January 2002. The company withdrew the target last year because of North American losses.

January's ``Way Forward'' strategy called for completing the 30,000 factory-job cuts and plant closings by 2012. Until today, only half of the plants had been identified, and North American results have worsened.

Buyouts

Today's announcement came a day after Ford and the United Auto Workers union said more than 75,000 UAW members will receive buyout or early retirement offers.

One of the new buyout offers is for as much as $140,000 for employees aged 55 and over with at least 10 years of experience who agree to forgo health-care benefits, according to the union. Another of the eight options is a $35,000 payout to leave the company and maintain health benefits.

Ford has had ``targeted'' buyouts for union workers at specific U.S. plants, compared with the all-union-employees approach at Detroit-based General Motors Corp. About one in three GM workers, or 34,000 people, accepted the buyout, and GM said it would finish shedding the jobs two years ahead of schedule.

The UAW agreed to the buyouts and early retirements to avoid involuntary layoffs as Ford reduces the size of its workforce, said Bob King, director of the UAW's Ford department, in a statement distributed to union officials in Detroit.

Workers can apply for buyouts between Oct. 16 and Nov. 27, the UAW said. Workers at an Atlanta plant that closes later this year can apply from Sept. 19 through Oct. 2. Most employees who accept buyouts will depart between Jan. 1 and Sept. 1 of 2007 .

No Dividend

Before eliminating the dividend today, Ford in July had cut its quarterly payout from 10 cents to five cents a share, its lowest since omitting payments in 1982 and 1983.

The perceived risk of owning Ford bonds rose 8.6 percent today, according to traders who bet on the creditworthiness of companies in the credit-default swap market. The annual cost of a five-year default swap based on Ford's bonds rose to $695,000, up from $640,000 yesterday, according to data compiled by Credit Suisse Group.

An increase in price indicates deterioration in the perception of credit quality; a decline suggests improvement.

Ford disappointed investors by failing to follow GM's lead in specifying which plants will close and when, and in not putting assets like Ford Motor Credit up for sale to pay for the UAW buyouts, said Sean McAlinden, an analyst at the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, Michigan.

``GM is moving along at 70 miles per hour, and Ford is now up to 25," McAlinden said. ``We'll probably see another restructuring announcement from Ford by the end of the year."

New Ford Plan Fails To Ease Crisis (FT)

By Bernard Simon In Detroit And Ralph Atkins In Frankfurt

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

The crisis at Ford Motor deepened on Friday as its shares plunged following the release of a new restructuring plan that suspended the dividend and delayed its target for returning to profit in North America by a year.

Turmoil in the US auto market also hit DaimlerChrysler, the German-based carmaker, which warned that higher-than-expected losses at its Chrysler unit would slash about €1bn ($1.3bn) from forecast operating profits this year, sending its shares down 6 per cent.

Ford's latest version of its Way Forward plan – its third restructuring effort in five years – aims to shrink its North American workforce and speed up the launch of models.

But Ford stopped short of revealing plans to sell its Jaguar luxury division or its Ford Credit financing unit, and it acknowledged that its share of the US light vehicle market was likely to erode from 16 per cent to a range of 14-15 per cent. The company had a 25 per cent market share in the mid-1990s.

Ford shares closed 11.77 per cent lower in New York at $8.02 and the cost of buying protection against the risk of a future default by Ford duly rose in the credit derivatives market.

"Ford's plan lacks the scope in terms of asset sales and falls short of the critical level of strategic commitment to stabilising financials," said analysts at CreditSights in New York. "The market is not going to be happy with this plan."

The carmaker now aims to return North American operations to profitability by 2009, a year later than envisaged under January's Way Forward plan.

The latest cost-cutting measures include axing an additional 10,000 white-collar jobs and offering buy-outs to its entire US blue-collar workforce, as General Motors did earlier this year. The extra white-collar job cuts combined with 4,000 earlier this year will shrink the North American salaried workforce by about a third. Nine assembly and parts plants in the US and Canada will close by the end of 2008.

Bill Ford, executive chairman, said he was less concerned about the possibility of Toyota overtaking Ford in North America than the importance "for this plan to be based on what I consider to be conservative assumptions". He said his family, which owns about 4 per cent of the equity and controls 40 per cent of the votes, had no plans to take the carmaker private.

Alan Mulally, who took over as Ford's chief executive earlier this month, added that senior management was "not waiting for external factors to make it OK".

Ford Cuts 10,000 Jobs, Closes 2 Plants (AP-Y)

By Tom Krisher

AP, September 16, 2006

Ford took drastic steps on Friday to remold itself into a smaller, more competitive company, slashing thousands of jobs and shuttering two additional plants to cut costs and fend off a financial crisis.

The company announced it would cut 10,000 more white-collar positions in addition to offering buyout and early retirement packages to all of its 75,000 hourly employees. It also suspended its dividend.

Wall Street seemed unimpressed. Ford's shares slumped nearly 12 percent amid disappointment that the automaker didn't do more to address rising health and pension costs, falling market share and intense competition from Asian manufacturers whose models have enthralled buyers looking for gas-sipping cars and trucks.

The announcement came as Chrysler's parent said it would cut U.S. production through the end of 2006 and follows big cutbacks at General Motors earlier this year. The cuts can be traced to consumer demand shifting from trucks and sport utility vehicles to smaller, more fuel efficient cars and crossovers.

The blue-collar cuts at Ford, the second-biggest U.S. automaker, are another blow to organized labor, which has been losing members as the auto industry reshapes itself to battle lower-cost, nonunion rivals.

Ford Motor Co. said it would shutter a stamping plant in Maumee, Ohio, in 2008 and its Essex engine plant in Windsor, Ontario, in 2007.

It will also close an assembly plant in Norfolk, Va., in 2007, a year earlier than previously announced and will cut a shift in January. An assembly plant in St. Paul, Minn., which is scheduled to close in 2008, also will have a shift reduction in 2007.

The new cuts bring the total number of plant closures to 16, adding to the 14 plants announced in a previous restructuring plan. The company has identified nine plants to be closed through 2008, but Ford officials would not talk about which facilities would be shut down after that.

Ford said it would complete its cuts of about 30,000 hourly jobs by the end of the 2008, four years ahead of its previous target. The company said it had cut 4,000 salaried positions in the first quarter of this year.

The new cuts would reduce Ford's total North American work force by 29 percent, from the current level of about 130,000 to about 92,000 by the end of 2008. The salaried job cuts represent about a third of that work force.

Ford's method of slashing its labor force is similar to cuts made earlier this year by larger rival General Motors Corp. At GM, 34,410 hourly workers have accepted buyouts or early retirement offers, and the company cut 2,000 salaried workers.

Ford, GM and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler unit are struggling with the need to reduce their so-called "legacy costs" of big pay and benefits packages for workers and retirees.

DaimlerChrysler said Friday that its Chrysler division will make additional production cuts in the third and fourth quarters to reduce dealer inventories.

Ford said by 2008, its North American factory capacity will be 26 percent lower than to 2005 levels.

It said the plan would cut about $5 billion in operating costs, mainly by offering early retirement and buyout packages to all hourly workers and to white-collar employees. Ford plans to expand buyout and early retirement offers worth up to $140,000 to the company's U.S. hourly work force of more than 75,000 as part of the plan.

"The simple fact is that the business model that served us in North America for decades no longer works," Mark Fields, Ford's president of the Americas, said during a morning teleconference.

Also during the teleconference, Executive Chairman Bill Ford said there were no plans for the Ford family to buy back stock and take the company private.

Todd Wiech, a 46-year-old Ford worker in St. Paul, Minn., said it would be hard to leave the company where he's worked for 18 years, but he's weighing options that include a buyout, returning to school or transferring to another Ford plant.

"Myself — people that were hired in 1988 — it hits us pretty hard because we've got a lot of time invested with Ford and we're getting a little older to go out looking," said Wiech.

At a plant in Dearborn, carpenter Brent Orr, a 12-year veteran, said he probably would take a buyout offer.

"For me, I'm a skilled trade. So I can probably go out and get a job somewhere," Orr said. "It will probably be out of state. There isn't a lot of work right now in Michigan."

Ford said that by the end of 2008 it would close or sell all facilities that it took back as part of a bailout of Visteon Corp., a supplier that was spun off from the automaker.

The company also said it expects to achieve full-year profitability in its North American automotive operations no earlier than 2009. The company had previously pledged to make money in North America in 2008.

It also plans to suspend the quarterly dividend on its common and Class B stock in the fourth quarter of this year.

Some Wall Street analysts said the plan did not go far enough.

DOJ_NMG_0064295

"We had hoped Ford would close additional assembly plants and make remaining ones highly more flexible, announce the exit-sale of several brands" and take other steps, said Ron Tadross, analyst for Bank of America.

Merrill Lynch analyst John Murphy downgraded the company's stock from neutral to sell and said the plan focuses on buyouts and doesn't address other issues.

"It does not materially accelerate product introductions. It does not provide a solution for the troubled facilities assumed from Visteon. It does not cut capacity deeper. It's missing a lot," he said. Visteon is Ford's former parts unit.

But Morgan Stanley maintained its equal-weight rating.

"While we are pleased to see greater cost reduction and more acknowledgment of the reality/gravity of the situation, we remain concerned that current results are worse than we think," analyst Jonathan Steinmetz said in a note to investors.

Ford shares fell $1.07, or 11.8 percent, to close at $8.02 on the New York Stock Exchange. Its shares have traded in a 52-week range of $6.06 to $10.09.

The company lost $1.4 billion during the first half of this year.

In July, Ford pledged to accelerate its "Way Forward" restructuring plan, which when introduced in January called for up to 30,000 job cuts as well as closing 14 facilities by 2012.

The company indicated Friday that it is ready to accept a smaller slice of the market, focusing on profitable sales instead of volume. It said it expects its market share to slip to 14 percent to 15 percent, down from about 26 percent in the early 1990s.

Ford said it would get out of the minivan business. But it will add a new full-sized, seven-passenger crossover for sale in 2008, based on the Fairlane wagon concept. The Fairlane will be produced in Oakville, Ontario.

"The most important thing we do is to size our company and our capacity to the current demand and, on top of that, to continue to invest in the products and services — the cars and trucks — that the customers really, really want," Chief Executive Alan Mulally said. Mulally, who was named to the post last week, led a turnaround at the commercial jetmaking division of Boeing Co.

Ford also said it would roll out new or significantly upgraded cars and trucks in 70 percent of its Ford, Lincoln and Mercury brands, expanding in growing areas such as car-based crossovers. At the same time, Ford said it will try to maintain its lead in the truck segment by introducing a completely reworked F-150 that will go on sale in 2008.

Sharp Skid Ford And Chrysler Show Dark Outlook For U.S. Car Makers (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Mccracken, Stephen Power And Joseph B. White

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

Ford Will Drop Its Dividend, Cut More Salaried Jobs; Daimler Unit's Loss Grows A 'Black Friday' for Detroit

Bowing publicly to the powerful forces that are reshaping the American auto industry, Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group acknowledged that their strategies for outracing high gas prices, fickle consumer tastes and relentless global competition had hit the wall.

DaimlerChrysler, in a surprise announcement, said its Chrysler Group is on track to lose about $1.5 billion in the third quarter -- more than double prior forecasts. The company indicated it would slash production in the short term to cope with bloated inventories and take unspecified restructuring actions.

Ford, meanwhile, outlined plans to cut more jobs and speed up the pace of some cuts already planned. Over a three-year period that began this year, Ford now has plans to eliminate about 44,000 hourly and salaried jobs in North America, or some 40% of its work force. The newest element of the program is that Ford aims to cut about 14,000 salaried jobs, up from the previous goal of 4,000. Ford also said that in the fourth quarter it will stop paying its quarterly dividend.

Meanwhile, No. 1 auto maker General Motors Corp. has sharply improved its performance recently, following a $10.6 billion net loss in 2005, but at a high price. Its North American work force is less than half its size it a decade ago.

The twin Ford and Chrysler announcements, separated by just a few minutes Friday morning, added up to a Black Friday for Detroit. Taken together with GM's moves, the downsizings and management upheavals point to a new order in what remains one of the most important industries in the U.S. economy.

The concept of a U.S. Big Three -- GM, Ford and Chrysler -- is obsolete. Toyota Motor Corp. has pulled ahead of Chrysler by 200,000 vehicles in U.S. sales through August, and in July even outsold Ford.

Ford's financial outlook is particularly dire. It once promised to return its core North American auto business to profitability by 2008. Now it doesn't expect to do so before 2009.

Ford will burn through an astonishing $8.5 billion in cash this year. It began the year with $25.1 billion and will end the year with about $20 billion, a figure augmented by $3.4 billion Ford has taken out of a fund in which employers set aside money for retiree health-care costs.

Ford plans to give more guidance on its cash situation at its third-quarter conference call in October. Chief Financial Officer Don LeClair, a 30-year veteran, said this crisis is different than struggles in the early 1980s and early 1990s during national economic downturns. "This is something that not every auto company is going through. It's our issue," he said. "It's not something like 1980 where there is a severe recession.... It's more about us than it is the economy."

UAW Softens Attitude About Cuts In Detroit (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

The Ford Motor Co's latest round of cuts is another serious blow to organized labor, costing the United Auto Workers as many as 40,000 active members and millions of dollars in lost dues.

But after taking a highly aggressive approach for decades, the UAW is transforming into a less combative, more cooperative organization that may be willing to work closer with U.S. automakers than perhaps at any other time in its history, analysts say.

"I think the UAW has finally wakened up to the fact that the whole thing is likely to disappear if they don't start to cooperate a little bit," said John Wolkonowicz, an analyst with Global Insight, an automotive research and consulting firm. "In some ways they may be working together now."

Ford yesterday announced a new restructuring plan that includes cutting more than 10,000 additional salaried jobs, offering buyouts to all of its 75,000 U.S. hourly workers and shutting down two more plants than the 14 previously announced.

The plan, hammered out with cooperation from the union, was praised by UAW officials -- even though it would reduce Ford's North American work force by almost a third.

"Once again, our members are stepping up to make hard choices under difficult circumstances," UAW President Ron Gettelfinger said. "Now it's Ford Motor CO's responsibility to lead this company in a positive direction.

Under the terms of the agreement, no UAW member will be forced to take a buyout -- a concession demanded by the union.

"We remain deeply concerned about Ford's loss of market share, and committed to working together" with Ford, said UAW Vice President Bob King, who directs the union's Ford Department. "Even with all the problems in the auto industry, UAW members at Ford will continue to have a voice in their own destiny."

The UAW has lost 900,000 members since the 1970s, and the potential loss of another 40,000 jobs could cost the union millions of dollars in membership dues.

The union collected about $206 million in 2004, down from about $214 million the previous year, said Martin Payson, a lawyer with the Jackson Lewis law firm, which represents management in labor disputes.

The UAW has realized it must soften its approach in an increasingly competitive and nonunion industry, said Charlie Hughes, former head of North American operations for Land Rover and Mazda.

"There was probably a time in the history of labor where that was helpful, but in a day and age where you have so much competition ... then both labor and management have to pull together," Mr. Hughes said.

He added he expects contract negotiations with the UAW and Ford, General Motors and DaimlerChrysler, which expire next year, to go smoother than previous negotiations.

Much of the union's change in attitude can be attributed to Mr. Gettelfinger, many analysts say.

DOJ_NMG_0064297

"Ron Gettelfinger has brought a new enlightenment to the union -- he sees the handwriting on the wall," Mr. Wolkonowicz said. "His goal now maybe has shifted from getting as much as possible [from the automakers] to preserving as many jobs as possible."

Mr. Gettelfinger was re-elected as the union president when he ran unopposed in June.

The UAW has failed to attract membership at automotive plants established in the United States by Asian companies. And while their reluctance is due in part to an unwillingness to pay union dues, which can run $50 a week or more, it's not the only reason, analysts say.

"Workers want to be part of a winning team, and the more factions you have in the workplace, the more names and labels you put it, the more difficult it is to be a single team." Mr. Hughes said. "The [automakers] winning today have a lot of focus, and that focus has to run through the whole organization."

Some say the union's less-harsh stance may come too late to save it from irrelevance.

"You're going to see the UAW as an entity engaged in serious soul-searching as to what it wants to be and what's it's capable of being," Mr. Payson said. "It will be a Herculean effort to turn this around."

The UAW, which also represents some health care and government workers, will be forced to recruit more nonautomotive workers if it is to survive, Mr. Payson said.

"Three years from now, what we call the UAW is going to be something significantly different than it is today," he said.

Detroit Flails In Latest Effort To Reinvent Itself (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

DETROIT, Sept. 15 — Detroit is running low on optimism.

Despite insisting all this year that they had solutions to their financial struggles well in hand, both the Ford Motor Company and the Chrysler Group conceded Friday that the steps they had taken were not working and that more bad news was coming in one of the deepest auto industry crises in Detroit's history.

Ford, which has held second place behind G.M. for 70 years, admitted for the first time that it would inevitably be ceding that spot to Toyota because of slumping sales and its decision Friday to close more factories and cut thousands of additional jobs. It also said it did not expect to make a profit in North America until 2009.

At the same time, the Chrysler Group, also pummeled by the decline in sales of big sport utility vehicles and pickup trucks, said it would report a loss for this summer of $1.5 billion, more than double what it had originally anticipated.

Its parent, DaimlerChrysler, also signaled that it did not see how to build a subcompact car profitably in North America, forcing it to turn to China or another Asian carmaker to help build one overseas. [Page B4.]

For its part, G.M., which is cutting 30,000 jobs and closing nearly a dozen plants, is set to decide within a month whether it wanted to link with a Japanese and a French auto company, a prospect that has rattled union members as well as state officials where G.M. employees live and work.

With all of the auto companies here putting themselves on the chopping block, the upheaval shows that Detroit's basic business strategy — built on the assumption that what has long been thought of as the Big Three would make money simply by dominating the mass market with a full range of vehicles — is irrevocably broken, said James P. Womack, who has written extensively about the auto industry.

"All the old rules of the game are gone," said Mr. Womack, co-founder of the Lean Enterprise Institute. And, he said, the challenge is now to play by the new rules, as dictated by foreign competitors. "We're now in the reinvention phase," he added.

That includes more cuts that will continue at least through the end of the decade. Detroit companies will be focused on closing plants, eliminating blue- and white-collar jobs, and cutting more deeply into their operations to reduce costs. Moreover, the automakers remain liable for billions of dollars in health care costs, both for their active and retired workers.

At G.M., those costs add up to $5.2 billion a year, or the equivalent of $1,440 a car. But for all their efforts to lose excess weight, the biggest challenge facing Detroit's car companies is convincing skeptical American buyers that their vehicles, developed amid this chaos, are as attractive as those from their aggressive rivals. Thus far, they have been failing, reflected in their falling market share in recent years.

Adding to Detroit's woes, its Asian competitors are investing billions of dollars more in American factories and hiring thousands more American workers.

Within six years, it is likely that Asian auto companies, led by Toyota, will outsell their Detroit rivals in the United States, according to a forecast by Edmunds.com, a Web site that offers car-buying advice.

The industry has already gotten a look at the lineup of the future. This July, the best-selling companies were G.M., Toyota, Ford, Honda and Chrysler. And what seemed to be a temporary aberration is about to become the norm, said Jesse Toprak, a senior analyst at Edmunds. "It was a sneak peek of what's likely to happen going forward," Mr. Toprak said.

That was not what Ford's chairman, William Clay Ford Jr., was envisioning in January, when Ford unveiled the first phase of a restructuring plan that it calls the Way Forward.

Amid an announcement that it would cut 34,000 jobs and close 14 plants, Mr. Ford vowed that the 103-year-old company, founded by his great-grandfather, Henry Ford, would regain its supremacy in the American market.

"With it, we will retake the American road," Mr. Ford said at the time.

But Friday, Mr. Ford signaled that his company was allowing Toyota to pass it. At the end of the news release that announced new cuts, including the elimination of 10,000 more salaried jobs, Ford said it expected its share of the market to drop to 14 to 15 percent after this year, 10 points lower than Ford was at the beginning of the decade.

At that time, bets were placed across Detroit whether Ford could surpass G.M.; now, the safe bet is that Toyota will pass Ford to become No. 2 behind G.M., something Mr. Toprak expects to happen for good next year.

"Frankly, our ranking doesn't matter,'' Mr. Ford now says. "You've seen, over the years, chasing market share with sometimes disastrous results."

But given the unpredictability of gasoline prices, to have any kind of security in the American market, both Ford and Chrysler will have to reduce their dependence on sport utilities and pickups, which make up two-thirds of Ford's lineup and three-quarters of the vehicles sold by Chrysler. Both vow they will do that by selling more cars and crossover vehicles.

Those will take time to reach showrooms. Although both have new crossovers on the way, the small car that Ford promises to sell in the United States will not reach the market until 2009 — three years behind compacts introduced this year by Toyota, Honda, Nissan and G.M., which has just introduced a refreshed version of the Chevrolet Aveo, built for it by its South Korean partner, Daewoo.

True, the new Dodge Caliber, introduced this spring, is selling well for Chrysler. Yet both Chrysler and Ford have to hope that gasoline prices stay down from their peaks above $3 a gallon this summer, and that they can keep rebates and other deals to a minimum while they sort out their new status.

One unknown in their predicament is the role of the United Automobile Workers, the union that serves as both their partner and adversary. It has granted some concessions on health care coverage to G.M. and Ford, but said last week that it would not cut a deal with Chrysler, because it was not in such bad financial shape. (Chrysler's latest news could change the union's mind.)

Beyond that, the union has demonstrated that its priority right now is to take care of the members who will be losing their jobs.

On Thursday, Ford and the U.A.W. reached agreement on buyout packages worth up to $140,000 apiece for 75,000 Ford workers, similar to the deals that were offered to G.M.'s 113,000 hourly workers.

The deals, which have not yet been matched by Chrysler, are a clear signal from the union that workers would be well off to get out now before 2007 contract talks, when some of the protection that the U.A.W. has offered generations of workers may diminish.

Once it gets through its current round of job cuts, Ford is expected to have fewer workers at its American plants than Toyota — a prospect that was hard to imagine in 1986, when Toyota opened its first free-standing plant in the United States.

On Friday, that factory, in Georgetown, Ky., built the five-millionth Toyota Camry sedan. It has been the best-selling car in the United States for nearly a decade, a title once held by the Ford Taurus.

Mr. Womack, whose book "The Machine That Changed the World" studied Japanese automakers' American plants, calls the Georgetown factory, which now employs 7,000 workers, "the torpedo that came in when no one was looking."

Reeling from the continuing ripple effects of that explosion, Ford, Chrysler and G.M. need to figure out how to maintain their foothold in a market that they once had practically to themselves. They might take some counsel from the original Mr. Ford.

In his 1930 book, "Moving Forward," Henry Ford wrote that companies were often bedeviled by "the little things that are hard to see — the awkward little methods that have grown up and which no one notices."

Eliminating those tiny wasteful practices, he wrote, could make a big difference between success and failure.

Toyota, at least, was listening. While Ford Motor's "Way Forward'' clearly suggests it faces a struggle ahead, the tagline of Toyota's new advertising campaign is a much more positive "Moving Forward,'' a direct homage to the path that its Detroit rivals may have no choice but to follow.

Bush: Richards Helped Define Texas Politics (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON – President Bush reminisced Friday about the governor he ousted a dozen years ago, calling Democrat Ann Richards a tough opponent and saying he would miss her.

"Running against Ann Richards taught me a lot. She was a really, really good candidate. She was a hard worker. She had the capacity to be humorous and yet make a profound point," Mr. Bush said at a Rose Garden news conference. "She made a positive impact on the state of Texas. One thing's for certain -- she empowered a lot of people to want to participate in the political process that might not have felt that they were welcome in the process."

Mr. Bush is heading to the United Nations on Monday, the day the memorial service will be held in Austin. Former Commerce Secretary Don Evans will represent him at the service, at which Sen. Hillary Clinton, former housing secretary Henry Cisneros and former Dallas mayor Ron Kirk will speak.

As the president noted, "a lot of people loved Ann Richards."

"She really kind of helped define Texas politics in its best way," he said. "One of the things we have done in our history is we've had characters. People larger than life. People that could fill the stage, you know, when the spotlight was on 'em wouldn't shirk from the spotlight but would talk Texan and would explain our state, and she was really good at that."

Ann R., Alcoholic (NYT)

By Maura J. Casey

Former Gov. Ann Richards of Texas will be remembered for her wit, her one-liners and especially for the keynote speech at the 1988 Democratic Convention, which was, in retrospect, the high point in the party's dismal campaign for the presidency that year. To intrigued television viewers nationwide, Ms. Richards, with her big hair and big attitude, epitomized the kind of formidable woman that is a hallmark of the Lone Star State. People liked her down-home phrases. When she said, "We're gonna tell how the cow ate the cabbage," they believed her. She leavened a plain-spoken manner with wisecracks. Both helped elect her governor two years later.

But her political career eclipsed what Ms. Richards called "one of the great, great stories" of her life: her recovery from alcoholism and her nearly 26 years of sobriety. That triumph deserves to be more than a line in her obituary.

In so many ways, her decision to stop drinking and enter a rehabilitation program in 1980, after a painful intervention by family and friends, was necessary for her continued rise in public life. What made Ms. Richards different was her decision to be forthright about the fact that she was a recovering alcoholic. She didn't hide it. "I like to tell people that alcoholism is one of my strengths," she said. She was right. Alcoholics know that seeds of healthy recovery grow from the need to mend their own flaws to stay sober, one day at a time. Ms. Richards faced her imperfections fearlessly, and that enabled others to be fearless, too, if only for a little while.

She never stopped helping people. One well-known author said the first mail she received after enrolling in a rehabilitation program was an encouraging letter from Ms. Richards. A politician who left rehab and wondered how on earth he was going to avoid drinking when he got home well after midnight found Ms. Richards waiting for him when he arrived. As governor, she started treatment programs in Texas prisons. When she visited, she would tell the inmates the simple truth: "My name's Ann, and I'm an alcoholic." Her imperfection had become a source of inspiration for others.

Bush Popular With These Republicans (SFC)

By Rachel Gordon

San Francisco Chronicle, September 16, 2006

President Bush plans to travel to Stockton next month to raise money for Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Tracy, a close White House ally who is seeking an eighth term in Congress.

The president also plans to attend a fundraiser for Rep. John Doolittle, R-Rocklin, in El Dorado Hills near Sacramento during a trip similar to one taken by Vice President Dick Cheney to the Republican House districts before the June primary.

Pombo's campaign aides aren't saying how much they hope to pull in at the Oct. 3 fundraiser at the Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium. But, said campaign manager Carl Fogliani, "we're looking at raising a lot."

Fogliani called the president's planned visit a "great honor." Despite Bush's low showing in the polls, Pombo's joint appearance with Bush will be aimed at the party faithful in the 11th Congressional District, which includes portions of San Joaquin, Alameda, Contra Costa and Santa Clara counties.

Although Democrats have a chance to win the 15 Republican seats they need to gain control of the House, most nonpartisan experts believe Pombo is a strong favorite in his race against wind energy specialist Jerry McNerney, a Pleasanton Democrat who lost to Pombo two years ago.

McNerney campaign aides said they'll use the president's visit to remind voters of Pombo's ties to the administration and hope to tap into the national dissatisfaction with Bush and the Republican leadership in Washington.

"Welcome to California," McNerney campaign spokesman Rob Caughlan said of Bush's upcoming visit. He said that considering Pombo's proven fundraising prowess, the president's visit "means they must be running scared."

Bush To Visit State For Pombo, Doolittle (MERCN)

By Erica Werner

The San Jose Mercury News, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush will visit California next month to raise money for Republican Reps. Richard Pombo of Stockton and John Doolittle of Granite Bay, who are seeking re-election amid ethics questions.

Bush will attend a breakfast for Pombo Oct. 3 and a fundraising lunch at an El Dorado Hills country club for Doolittle the same day, the campaigns said separately Friday.

The Doolittle event, which his campaign hopes will raise as much as $500,000, will be Bush's first appearance on behalf of Doolittle. The congressman's friendships with former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and convicted GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff have provided fodder for Doolittle's Democratic opponent, Charlie Brown.

Doolittle accepted campaign cash from Abramoff and Abramoff clients, while interceding on their behalf. His wife also performed fundraising work for Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January in a conspiracy to corrupt public officials.

Unlike Doolittle, Pombo has donated to charity the campaign money he received directly from Abramoff. But he has been targeted by environmentalists over his chairmanship of the House Resources Committee, where he has shepherded legislation helpful to oil and gas interests that have donated generously to him.

The Pombo fundraiser will be held at Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium. Details about how much money his campaign expected it to generate were not available Friday.

Both incumbents represent Republican-leaning districts in Northern California.

The Bush visit follows a California trip by Vice President Dick Cheney, who was appearing at private receptions Friday for the Republican Governors Association in Los Angeles and for the Republican National Committee in Menlo Park.

Cheney was not meeting with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger during the visit, the governor's office said.

Campaigner In Chief (TRCP)

DOJ_NMG_0064301

By John Upton

Tracy Press, September 16, 2006

President Bush will continue making the rounds for Republican campaigners when he makes a trip to Stockton to stump for Rep. Richard Pombo.

President Bush will take a break from conducting his war against terror to visit Stockton on Oct. 3 to raise campaign cash for Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Tracy.

Pombo campaign consultant Wayne Johnson said it's normal for incumbent presidents and vice presidents to help candidates raise funds.

"It takes money to run campaigns," said Johnson, who said Bush would appear at a breakfast fundraiser.

The breakfast is expected to be at the Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium.

Local fundraisers by Vice President Dick Cheney, Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert and House Majority Leader John Boehner have helped Pombo raise more than $2.5 million this election cycle.

The money has helped Pombo fend off an expensive, frenzied attack by primary opponent Pete McCloskey, Democratic candidate Jerry McNerney and a range of activist groups, including MoveOn.org, Defenders of Wildlife and the Sierra Club, in the race for the 11th Congressional District.

Pombo has been targeted for his close ties to convicted felon and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and indicted former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, but David Karol, a political science professor at University of California, Berkeley, said McNerney doesn't have enough money or visibility to make the scandals stick.

"I don't think it really helps Pombo to be seen with the president. … I think what Bush can offer him at this point is help in fundraising," said Karol, who said Pombo remains the favorite in the race despite Bush's unpopularity across the country. A Sept. 7 Gallup poll found 39 percent of Americans approve of Bush's performance, while 56 percent disapprove.

Bush picked up 3 percent more votes in 2004 in the 11th District than his national average.

Sierra Club spokesman Eric Antebi said Bush counted on Pombo, as chairman of the House Resources Committee, to support or turn a blind eye to oil-industry friendly policies on oil drilling and air pollution.

"Pombo joined Bush in trying to allow oil companies to drill in special places like the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and protected the coastline while weakening the rules that protect our waterways from drilling pollution," Antebi said. "And like Bush, Pombo's campaigns have gotten a big boost from oil industry contributions."

Pombo previously said that he wants to create more American jobs and wean the United States from foreign energy supplies by increasing domestic production.

Pombo supports Bush's commitment to keeping U.S. forces in Iraq — which, according to various government reports, had no weapons of mass destruction or links to al-Qaida when it was invaded — saying that an early withdrawal would be a disaster. At least 2,676 U.S. soldiers, including five soldiers from Tracy, have died in the war. Iraq Body Count has documented more than 43,000 Iraqi deaths, but no such government statistics are available.

Defenders of Wildlife and MoveOn.org organizer Ed Yoon said he would greet Bush with a protest, but South San Joaquin County Republican President Frank Aquila said the president will be welcomed by much of the community.

"I'm sure they'll go ahead and bus the protestors in, but any time the president comes — whether Republican or Democrat — you've got to honor that position, and I think the fact that President Bush is going to be here is absolutely outstanding."

McNerney's camp seemed unfazed by Bush's upcoming visit.

"If I were Pombo, I'd probably be stoked that Bush is coming out, because even George Bush is more popular than the Congress," said McNerney spokesman Rob Coughlan.

The visit was announced at a difficult time for the Republican Party, which is facing a pre-election backlash over the federal government's handling of the war in Iraq, Hurricane Katrina and oil prices.

Despite Pombo's formidable campaign war chest, the National Republican Congressional Committee spent more than $55,000 helping Pombo this year.

Committee spokesman Jonathon Collegio said $38,475 was spent a little more than a week ago on a mailer that attacks McNerney's tax policies.

DOJ_NMG_0064302

"The (Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee) has targeted Richard Pombo, and the (National Republican Congressional Committee) wanted to level the playing field," Collegio said.

A spokeswoman for the Democratic committee said Bush's visit is a sign that Pombo is in trouble.

"National Republicans are spending money, and they're sending Bush in to raise money for Pombo because they know that his record of using his seat for personal enrichment makes him vulnerable and an unappealing choice for Californian voters," Kate Bedingfield said.

Bush To Visit Stockton (STREC)

By Hank Shaw

Stockton Record, September 16, 2006

SACRAMENTO - President Bush is coming to Stockton next month to help Tracy Rep. Richard Pombo raise money for his re-election bid.

Bush is scheduled to appear at a $250-a-plate breakfast event at the Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium on Oct. 3, according to the campaign.

Pombo is locked in a spirited campaign for the 11th District against Pleasanton wind energy consultant Jerry McNerney, who lost handily to Pombo in 2004.

McNerney has come back stronger this time, and many political observers give him an outside shot at unseating Pombo - if there is a Democratic wave this fall.

Most Republicans nationwide have been focusing on local issues in their re-election efforts, but bringing Bush into the district shifts the spotlight to national matters such as the war in Iraq; Pombo's hometown of Tracy has one of the highest death rates in the nation for soldiers serving overseas.

Bush's approval ratings are hovering around 40 percent nationally, according to several recent surveys. But in California, Bush's popularity is far lower: Nearly two-thirds of all Californians - including more than one-quarter of Republicans - disapprove of Bush, according to a late July Field Poll.

Bush last came to Stockton in 2002, ostensibly to help Bill Simon, the GOP candidate for governor that year. Vice President Dick Cheney hosted a Stockton fundraiser for Pombo earlier this year.

Pombo spokesman Carl Fogliani said the Bush visit will swell their campaign fund so they can blitz McNerney on radio, on television and in the mail throughout the last seven weeks of the election.

"He'll help the campaign raise the resources we need to finish this campaign," Fogliani said.

Pombo's 11th District includes both the Sacramento media market and the pricey Bay Area market, which can bankrupt all but the richest candidates should they choose to advertise heavily on TV.

Pombo already has mailed several fliers to district residents and has been spending more than $50,000 a week on a radio ad highlighting McNerney's decision to change 55 of his positions on a candidate issue questionnaire earlier this summer.

Adding to this is at least $161,000 in spending by the Republican National Campaign Committee on Pombo's behalf for polling and mailers.

As of June 30, Pombo has just under $1 million to spend and had raised more than $2.2 million overall. He has actively been collecting more cash since then, and the campaign hopes the Bush fundraiser will cap their effort.

No money goal for the event has yet been set, Fogliani said.

McNerney, whose campaign says it's raised nearly $1 million so far, is also beginning its own ad campaign on cable television. He is the best-funded challenger Pombo has faced, and his spokesman, Rob Caughlan, says Bush's arrival shows Pombo is concerned.

"I think he's scared," Caughlan said. "He's certainly not taking Jerry McNerney for granted.

"We've been saying all along this is a national race, and there's nothing that'll say 'national race' better than having George W. Bush come into Stockton."

Pombo has voted with Bush's positions 86 percent of the time since 2001, according to information compiled by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0064303

That might please residents of Ripon, Lodi, Escalon and Manteca, which all voted for Bush twice. But Tracy and Stockton - much of which is in the neighboring 18th District - voted for Al Gore in 2000 and John Kerry in 2004.

In the East Bay portion of the district, neither the Alameda County part nor Morgan Hill voted for Bush, although the Contra Costa section did, narrowly.

University of California, Berkeley, political scientist Bruce Cain said bringing Bush to the district could prove risky, although it's in character for the pugnacious Pombo.

"I don't see Pombo apologizing for his conservatism or his support of the president," Cain said. "What he wants to do is strengthen his Republican numbers. He doesn't need a lot of Democrats to vote for him."

Allan Hoffenblum, one of California's premier political odds-makers, says Pombo has little to lose by bringing in Bush.

"Bush is visiting the red part of California, not the blue part," said Hoffenblum, referring to Republican red and Democrat blue. "And if they hate Bush that much there, they're not going to vote for Pombo anyway. Besides, he needs the money."

Election Prospects Looking Up, Some Republicans Say (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - With the fall election campaign taking shape, many Republicans this week believe for the first time in months that they've turned a corner and could limit feared midterm losses enough to retain control of Congress.

The reasons for their guarded optimism include a new poll showing that voters again give an edge to the Republicans on national security, another showing concerns about the seeming lack of a clear Democratic alternative agenda, an impressive get-out-the-vote effort in a Rhode Island Republican primary, and relief over dropping gasoline prices.

To be sure, all Republicans interviewed stressed that they still face a sour country and tough election - the Iraq war being the main reason - and they still fear losing seats in both the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Democrats dismiss the notion of a Republican rebound.

"These guys must be living in a circular room if they think they've turned a corner," said Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "At the end of the day, the situation in Iraq remains the same, the economy remains the same, and the things coming out of Congress remain the same. To say they're in better shape going into the heart of the general election campaign doesn't pass the smell test."

Nevertheless, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman on Friday all but echoed one internal White House prediction that his party will lose only two to three Senate seats and eight to 12 House seats. That would still leave Republicans in control of Congress. Democrats need to gain 15 House seats and six Senate seats to capture both chambers.

Mehlman and other Republican operatives argued that they "won" the first full week after Labor Day, the date when more voters historically start tuning in to politics and candidates and parties ramp up their campaigns, particularly with advertising.

"We're in a pretty good trend right now, although we're still in a tough environment," Mehlman said at a breakfast with reporters.

"There's clearly a turnaround happening," added a Republican Senate aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity on his boss's orders. "We've got a lot of work to do. But there's a chance now to stave off the kind of disaster that was being predicted."

Several credit President Bush's concerted effort in recent speeches to connect the unpopular Iraq war to the more broadly supported war against terrorism and to paint the Democrats as weak on defense.

One poll this week suggested that the White House campaign succeeded in at least one area. The ABC-Washington Post survey showed that voters trust Republicans over Democrats to handle terrorism by a margin of 48 percent to 41 percent, a sharp turnaround from the month before, when they trusted Democrats by 46 percent to 39 percent.

Another poll, conducted for NBC News and The Wall Street Journal, showed that 42 percent of voters are more concerned that Democrats lack "specific programs," while 37 percent are more concerned that Republicans have offered "no changes" to the status quo. That suggests that the Republican hope to turn the election from a referendum on their rule to a choice between them and the Democrats may be working.

"Paid advertising is picking up," said Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, which helps Republicans in House races. "Voters now are paying less attention to outside noise and focusing more on differences between the candidates."

Republicans also enter the fall with a decided cash advantage to buy more advertising and get-out-the-vote operations. This week, the Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks money in politics, reported that collectively, all Republican political committees had a cash-on-hand edge over their Democratic counterparts of $121 million to $91 million.

Republicans also were buoyed by the party's get-out-the-vote work in Rhode Island on Tuesday, where it helped produce a record turnout and a primary victory for incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee. That turnout effort echoed a successful drive in a special election in California over the summer, signs that the party's much-lauded ability to mobilize its voters is still effective even in a tough year.

And gasoline prices are dropping, easing one of the many drags on the party in power. The ranks of voters who rate gasoline prices as the top issue dropped from 15 percent last month to 5 percent, according to the ABC poll.

"Having gas prices moderate is an important component of having people recognize that the economy is in a lot better shape than they think it is," said Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster.

But he cautioned that it's not enough to turn around Republican fortunes.

"We have had a good week. But that good week needs to be sustained in order for it to have a fundamentally different effect on the election. ... It's hard to say things are really looking up until we see significant improvement on Iraq, or more people see the economy as positive."

The ABC-Washington Post poll of 863 registered voters was conducted by telephone Sept. 5-7 and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

The NBC-Wall Street Journal poll of 1,009 registered voters was conducted by telephone Sept. 8-11 and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

Piñata Strategy (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, September 16, 2006

Behold the Republican playbook: Frightening voters and demonizing Dem leader Nancy Pelosi.

The Republican message for this fall's election season turns Franklin Roosevelt's famous statement on its head: fear is good, or at least it's a strategy. They want the electorate to be afraid, very afraid—of the terrorists, of course, but also of an elegantly dressed woman from San Francisco.

Democratic operatives have been warning Rep. Nancy Pelosi for months that she needs to prepare for what Karl Rove and the GOP have in store: an all out, coast-to-coast assault.

As the Democratic leader in line to be speaker if her party wins control of the House, Republicans see Pelosi as the piñata of politics in 2006.

Six years into the Bush presidency, GOP operatives in essence are conceding the obvious: voters are angry about Iraq, the economy, immigration and incompetence.

Republicans worry about voters such as Eric Albino, a 29-year-old construction worker I met in New York the other day at the site of Ground Zero. He had been a Bush supporter, but turned against him because of the war in Iraq. "He's doing what he can to the best of his ability," Albino said sympathetically, "but he should have left Saddam alone." We are less safe as a result, he said.

Rather than spend a lot of time and money defending their record to voters such as Albino, the Rovepublicans will try to scare him into sticking with them—or at least staying away from the polls altogether. The way to do that, they have decided, is to scare him silly about what the Democrats would do with control of Congress.

They want to use Pelosi to give their vision of nightmare a face and name and history.

It's a page from an old GOP playbook. In 1984, the Democrats held their convention in San Francisco; Republicans renominated Ronald Reagan in Dallas. It was the dawn of the Red State-Blue State, cultural/political divide we see today. Democrats made history, nominating the first woman—Geraldine Ferraro—for vice president. "Independent" GOP groups swarmed into San Francisco, and onto the airwaves, to denounce the Democrats for their liberal stands on abortion, gay rights, taxes and so on. Reagan won 49 states.

The epithet "San Francisco Democrat" had power then, and for years thereafter. Does it still?

We're about to find out. The product of a middle-class family, reared in Baltimore as the daughter of the city's mayor, Pelosi by background is no flower child. But she does represent a capital of Blue State America. She has a liberal voting record and she is perhaps the most influential congressional critic of the Iraq war.

Pelosi's friend and ally, Rep. John Murtha, got all the ink, but it was Pelosi who gave him his platform in the caucus. Pelosi is personally wealthy; her husband, Paul Pelosi, is a successful Bay Area businessman.

The GOP has "tested" her image in focus groups and polls. She has become a favorite villain of conservative talk radio, which sometimes dwell on her attire and looks. Female Democratic strategists I know fret about this, even as they are outraged at what they see as the sexism of it. They admire her sense of style, but they do worry that she looks too sophisticated, too Nob Hill. "She dresses too 'rich'," one said to me. No one would accuse Denny Hastert of that.

As for her stand on the issues, it is incontrovertibly true that she represents one of the most liberal congressional districts in the country. "That's who she is," said a top Democratic operative. "The problem with refuting that attack is that it's true."

Other insiders worry about gay-rights: the notion that the Democrats are too responsive to gay demands for equal treatment. That was GOP's underlying message 22 years ago, when the term "San Francisco Democrat" first gained currency. It will be subtext—or the overt text—in the campaign this fall.

"They are going to try to turn Pelosi into the Newt Gingrich of our day," said Mark Penn, a leading Democratic pollster. "But I don't think it's going to work. First, she's not that well known. Second, it could work the other way. People want accountability. They want George Bush held to account. Pelosi isn't running for president, she's running for a Congress that will take on the president."

Will voters in, say, eastern Pennsylvania (where there are four House seats up for grabs) care about who Rep. Nancy Pelosi is in November, and what she might say and do as speaker? It seems unlikely, but it's only mid-September.

Mfume Concedes Election To Cardin (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

Kweisi Mfume yesterday officially conceded Maryland's Democratic primary for the U.S. Senate, but it was not clear whether he planned to campaign for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin in the general election contest against Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee.

"Ben and I gave this race our best," said Mr. Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and a former congressman. "However, there can only be one nominee from our party, and he is it.

"He is a great public servant and I have absolutely no doubt that he is going to make a terrific United States senator. He has my full support," Mr. Mfume said.

Mr. Cardin spoke with Mr. Mfume on the phone minutes before a Democratic rally in Annapolis, an Mfume spokesman said.

"This was a very positive, hard campaign," Mr. Cardin said after the rally. "Kweisi and I continue our friendship. ... I'm proud to have his support."

Mr. Cardin said that he expects Mr. Mfume to campaign with him.

"I am confident that we will be together during the campaign," Mr. Cardin said.

According to the Maryland State Board of Elections, Mr. Cardin received 247,617 votes, or 43.8 percent, and Mr. Mfume 228,721, or 40.4 percent, in Tuesday's primary. Eighteen Democrats were seeking the nomination to replace retiring Democratic Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes.

About 25 precincts in Baltimore had not had their votes counted as of yesterday, and 26,000 absentee ballots, along with an unknown number of provisional ballots, also had not yet been counted.

Mr. Mfume, who waited until after 2 a.m. Wednesday to end his primary party without then conceding, said that he had spoken with elections officials yesterday morning and decided to concede.

"We have looked at every set of remaining numbers. It is clear that while the gap may narrow, the vote totals will fall short of what will be needed to win," Mr. Mfume said.

In an unrelated matter, the Cardin campaign fired a female campaign staffer yesterday after discovering a Web log she had been writing about the campaign.

Titled "Road Diaries of the Persuasionatrix," the blog talked about taking a picture of Cardin staffers eating Oreos with the caption "devouring the competition."

"Oreo" can be used as a derogatory term for blacks who "act or think white." Mr. Steele is the first black to win a statewide office in Maryland.

A Cardin spokesman said that the staffer was fired as soon as the blog was discovered.

"We became aware of this blog today," said Oren Shur, Mr. Cardin's spokesman. "We utterly condemn the sentiments expressed in it. It is not an accurate reflection of Ben Cardin or his campaign. The junior staffer responsible for the contents of this blog is no longer employed by the campaign."

Mr. Shur did not confirm the name of the blogger.

A Kean On The Ballot? What Else Is New? (NYT)

By David W. Chen

TRENTON, Sept. 15 — One of Thomas H. Kean Jr.'s earliest political memories is watching his father, Gov. Thomas H. Kean Sr., deliver the keynote address at the Republican National Convention in 1988, when George H. W. Bush was nominated for president.

Now, Mr. Bush is one of many of the former governor's powerful friends helping support the younger Mr. Kean's bid to unseat Senator Robert Menendez, as patrimony has helped propel a relatively inexperienced state legislator into one of the tightest races in the country. Some Democrats here even complain that Republicans are trying to confuse voters into thinking that the popular former governor and chairman of the 9/11 Commission is running, not his 38-year-old son.

After all, Keans have been on the ballot here almost as long as there have been ballots.

"When my dad ran for Congress — and he had been the Assembly speaker — the headline said, 'Kean's son to run for Congress,' " said Mr. Kean, now a state senator. "When my grandfather ran for Congress in 1938, there was a headline that said, 'Kean's son to run for Congress.' When my great-grandfather ran for Senate, I think there was a headline that said, 'Kean's brother to run for Senate,' because his older brother had served in the United States Senate.

"So I personally set very high standards for my own experience in public office, and I think the public has set very high standards for me."

As they did with the current President Bush in 2000, Democrats say Mr. Kean, in his first run for statewide office, lacks the résumé for Washington. But suddenly the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, and several other election handicappers, have moved New Jersey — which last elected a Republican senator in 1972 — into the toss-up column, complicating Democrats' plans to keep a supposedly safe Senate seat.

Despite Mr. Menendez's three-to-one fund-raising edge, Mr. Kean has capitalized on sky-high name recognition to pass the incumbent in several recent public opinion polls by as much as 5 percentage points. Party leaders are increasingly focused on the race: Karl Rove, the White House political guru, is scheduled to sponsor a fund-raising lunch for Mr. Kean on Monday at 21 Club in Manhattan, and Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, is sponsoring a breakfast on his behalf on Wednesday in Washington.

It does not hurt, of course, that former Governor Kean, who enhanced his stature with his leadership of the 9/11 Commission, has been in the news promoting a book and played a part in last week's controversy over ABC's miniseries on the subject. The younger Mr. Kean has also leaned on his father's allies for financial support and strategy. And not every candidate's father has a political action committee — Governor Kean's Fund for All Americans has contributed $10,000 to the effort. (The senior Mr. Kean and other Keans have donated $26,500.)

"I do think what we are seeing in the polls is a familiarity quotient," said Ingrid W. Reed, a political scientist at Rutgers University. "Even if people know it's not Tom Kean Sr., the name resonates, and people say, 'How bad can he be?' "

Mr. Kean says he is not bothered by people who equate his career with political entitlement, or wonder whether he can escape the shadow of his father — or his father's father's father. And while he shares many moderate Republican values with the former governor, he is hardly a political clone, demonstrating a more conservative bent on immigration and gay rights.

"The umbilical cord was cut a while ago," Mr. Kean said in a recent interview at his home in Westfield.

Being the child of a prominent politician brings the blessings of name recognition and nostalgic good will, and the burden — especially for those who share the same first and last names — of the inevitable comparisons and the invariable complaints that the child had too easy a glide path.

Some namesake sons, like Al Gore and Richard Daley, have equaled or exceeded their fathers' records. Some have fallen short, like Adlai E. Stevenson III and Hubert H. Humphrey III. And some have been so unabashed in trumpeting their father's names that you might think the two were running mates.

The elder Mr. Kean, in a recent interview at his office in Far Hills, acknowledged that the pressure could be daunting — and said he had steered all three of his children away from politics.

"It's very difficult when your father is prominent in the same field that you're about to go into," he said. "Frankly, there are a lot of children from political families who have had a lot of problems in their lives." Asked if his son had ever wished that he had a different name, perhaps to lower expectations, he smiled and said, "He's never said that to me, but I suspect there were times."

When it comes to political dynasties, the Keans are to New Jersey what the Kennedys are to Massachusetts, or even what the Livingstons, the Keans' distant relatives, once were to New York.

As he grew up at the family homestead in Livingston, the younger Mr. Kean said he was most impressed with the reception that his father received in the community.

"Whether it be in the movie theater, the diner or the local Friendly's, people would come up and say, 'This is an important issue,' or people would thank him for something he did," Mr. Kean recalled. "That impressed upon me that you could do something good."

At Dartmouth College — which Mr. Kean chose over his father's alma mater, Princeton, to avoid implications that he was admitted because of his connections — his roommates said they found out his father was the governor of New Jersey several months into the school year, when the governor showed up on campus escorted by state troopers.

"He looks to his dad more as a mentor than as a classic father figure, if you will," said Peter Van Alstine, a roommate at Dartmouth who remains one of Mr. Kean's closest friends. "It wasn't the typical American, 'Go fishing, hang out daily, arms-around-the-shoulder' type deal. It was definitely more infrequent and more of a mentor relationship."

Mr. Kean's first job out of college, in 1990, was at the Environmental Protection Agency in Washington — a political appointment his father arranged. Then, after the first President Bush lost in 1992, Mr. Kean worked for former Representative Bob Franks, a moderate Republican and family friend.

At the Fletcher School at Tufts University, where Mr. Kean studied the politics and economics of Central Asia, his academic adviser, Andrew C. Hess, said that he learned of the student's lineage from a secretary.

A classmate, Geneve Mantri, said: "It didn't seem to be a weight on him. Having come from the U.K., where there's an awful lot of name-dropping, where your sense of identity is very much tied to your parents or grandparents, it was nice to meet somebody who had that background but wasn't self-conscious about it, either in a good way or a bad way."

Mr. Kean was studying for a doctorate before being sidetracked by politics — just as his father had been sidetracked from a Ph.D. decades earlier. He decisively lost his first electoral effort, a Republican Congressional primary in 2000, despite his father's help. "It was probably good for him," said David Yaccino, a former roommate and Psi Upsilon Fraternity brother at Dartmouth. "He realized that the Kean name was not going to get him elected."

But it sure helps.

DOJ_NMG_0064308

At last week's fund-raiser in Bridgewater, former President Bush observed that it was an old mutual friend of Governor Kean's and his, Nicholas F. Brady, the former Treasury secretary, who extended the invitation.

The former governor was surrounded at the event by enough alumni of his administration that one old hand joked they could "convene a cabinet meeting."

"A lot of those folks are not involved in year-to-year election efforts," said Roger A. Bodman, a former transportation commissioner and one of many who have dusted off their Rolodexes from the 1980's to dial for dollars. "It's their affection for the Kean family that's their motivation here, rather than supporting another Republican."

The elder Mr. Kean is coy about how involved he plans to be in the campaign. He says that he has gone to strategy sessions — when his son asks — and a few fund-raisers, also when his son asks. And every couple of days, he said, the phone rings.

"He'll call me and say, 'Dad, what do you think about this, what do you think about that?' " the elder Mr. Kean said. "What I want him to understand is, no matter what I say, he's going to make the ultimate judgment — he's the candidate."

Newsweek, September 16, 2006

New Jersey's Senate contenders, incumbent Bob Menendez and challenger Tom Kean Jr., square off on ethics, war in Iraq and party loyalty. WEB EXCLUSIVE

On the surface, New Jersey seems like an easy Senate seat for the Democrats to hold on to. The incumbent, Democrat Bob Menendez, who was appointed in January when Sen. Jon Corzine became the state's governor, is a seven-term former congressman. The state has been a solid hue of blue in the last four presidential elections and disapproval of President Bush is high. But polls show a dead heat between Menendez and his challenger, Republican Tom Kean Jr., a state senator whose name is political gold—his father was formerly the popular governor of New Jersey and his grandfather was a congressman.

It's shaping up to be quite a fight. Kean's camp has been trying to paint Menendez as the product of a broken New Jersey political system, rocked by scandal over the last decade. At the same time, Kean is trying to cut an independent path for himself—away from the GOP. He's been sharply critical of mistakes in Iraq and several of the president's positions. Menendez, however, says Kean is simply pandering in an election year and points to the fact that Laura Bush, former president George H.W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney have all stumped for Kean. He also proudly notes his own badge of courage: Menendez voted against the Iraq war resolution while in the House of Representatives.

David Gerlach recently spoke with both Menendez and Kean as part of NEWSWEEK'S ongoing Face Off series profiling the midterm's hottest races. Excerpts:

Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez

NEWSWEEK: Why do you think polls are showing a dead heat in your Senate race?

Bob Menendez: The reality is that while people say I am an incumbent, I have been in office a grand total of eight months. And running against someone [who], not because of his own making, but because of his father's making, has a name that is well recognized. Those are parts of the challenge. We have just started our advertising.

Are you concerned that some voters may, if they hear your opponent say he is also in favor of stem-cell research or having Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld resign, have a hard time differentiating between the two of you?

People will see through those as 60-day conversions to a position that Tom Kean Jr. doesn't really believe in. After taking $1.2 million in funds that have been raised by Mrs. Bush, Vice President Cheney and President Bush, it is very hard to walk away from the Bush agenda. For example, even knowing that there were no weapons of mass destruction, Tom Kean Jr. has continually said he supports the war in Iraq and would have voted for it. Even as the New Jersey legislature voted to raise the minimum wage, he voted against it—the same position as President Bush and Republicans in Congress.

Why did you vote against the Iraq war resolution?

I did my due diligence. I sat on the International Relations Committee. It became very clear to me there was no evidence of weapons of mass destruction, no imminent threat to the United States. In my mind, our engagement in Afghanistan, which I supported, was the right engagement, and we needed to finish doing the job there. [Iraq] was a war of choice and not of necessity.

You have called for a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq to country nearby. Where would be a plausible location to move U.S. troops?

Our plan is multifaceted. It is a transition and withdrawal. It is to put part of the force over the horizon. I would listen to the generals to where in fact we would put those troops. It is about having a summit that brings together regional players who have a great interest in the stability of Iraq, as well as the Europeans and NATO. Right now, that is not happening. We are going it alone. It also is ensuring we have some troops whose whole focus is dedicated to any terrorist activity that may exist in Iraq, but not in the midst of being peacekeepers in a civil war. For that, we strengthen the Iraqi troops over the course of this transition over the next year.

What are you hoping to see come out of Congress regarding ethics reform legislation?

[Democrats] believe the Republican corruption of Jack Abramoff and Duke Cunningham and the K Street Project are unworthy of the American people. That is why I stood with [Sens.] Harry Reid and Barack Obama to offer some of the highest ethical standards and legislation to meet those standards. The Republicans rejected it. Hopefully we can get back to it once [Democrats] get a majority [in the Senate].

How do you respond to charges that you rented space in New Jersey to the North Hudson Community Action Corporation while you were lobbying for them to receive federal grants, and that in 2003 you sponsored legislation to ban media mergers, because it would affect stock you owned in Spanish Broadcasting System Inc.?

This campaign started with Tom Kean Jr. trying to "Swift Boat" my history as a reformer and [he] failed miserably. The bottom line is New Jerseyans will see through the Kean campaign on trying to play the politics of personal destruction.

But you did recently state that you regretted renting property to that charitable organization.

Even though the [House] Ethics Committee gave me approval. Even though it was absolutely an arms-length transaction. The bottom line is it is a diversion from the campaign. At the end of the day, Tom Kean will have to answer for why he took $10,000 in casino contributions, which legislators in New Jersey are barred from [doing and] send it to his federal account and ultimately switch his vote on the ban of smoking in casinos.

But it is legal to take contributions from a casino for a federal campaign.

While it may be legal ... it didn't stop the fact he still has to cast votes on the regulation of that industry.

You have noted that you helped restore federal funding to Amtrak. Why do you think it has been difficult to fund and improve the infrastructure of the passenger-rail network?

The Bush administration has kept Amtrak on life support. You can't do the maintenance and infrastructure investment. Amtrak post-September 11 is not only important for the economy of the region, it's important for tourism. It's also about having multiple modes of transportation so that, God forbid, [if] there is an attack, there is a way to make intercity connections. Intercity rail service in any part of the world is never fully self-sufficient on its own.

As a Cuban-American, what are your thoughts regarding the recent health problems of Fidel Castro?

Our hope, America's hope, is freedom and democracy for the Cuban people. If the potential transition to his brother [Raul Castro] on a more permanent basis becomes the reality, than we will see the beginning of change. Raul doesn't have a relationship with the people as Fidel does. He doesn't have the respect of the military. For the U.S., it is important to be poised to send a clear message to the people that we support them and respect the sovereignty of the country and [will] help them in their transition to democracy.

When you entered the Senate earlier this year, you said you had been dreaming about becoming a senator since you were 19.

As someone who grew up poor in a tenement and being the first in my family to go to college, for my ability to go from those beginnings to being one of 100 senators in a country of 300 million people, it is the story of the promise of America fulfilled.

Republican State Sen. Thomas Kean Jr.

NEWSWEEK: You have been critical of the Bush administration, notably its handling of the war in Iraq. Have you heard from the White House or the National Republican Senatorial Committee?

Tom Kean Jr.: What I am focusing on are issues that are important to citizens of New Jersey. I agree [with the president on] the tax cuts and a number of the antiterrorism initiatives. [There are] areas where I disagree: stem-cell research, which I support, or cutting spending, or immigration reform. And the conduct of the war in Iraq and the mistakes that have been made there. It is my responsibility to make people aware of that.

Some Republicans equate critiquing the war with emboldening terrorists.

One of reasons I called for Secretary [of Defense] Rumsfeld's dismissal is that I disagree with that assessment.

When did you come to the conclusion that he should resign?

It has been building for months. I have been following the war and the horrendous mistakes that have been made. When the secretary gave a speech ... to the American Legion, when he essentially compared people who had critiques of the war on terror to "appeasers," I thought the secretary of Defense was stepping into the political realm ... He had stepped too far and we needed a new set of eyes and ears at the head of the Pentagon to focus on the future of Iraq. As well as the future in North Korea, Iran and the future of [terrorism].

Did you think he should resign in the wake of scandals at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq?

Clearly, the buck always stops with the secretary of Defense in that regard. I thought if we had new generals in charge there would be a change in emphasis, a change in policy. And when we had new generals in charge, the same language and direction was coming out of the secretary of Defense. The world has changed so dramatically in the last six years. I do not support an immediate withdrawal of our troops. My concern is it would lead to a humanitarian crisis. [There's a] potential for a terrorist haven to be created.

You have stated that Iraq had nothing to do with 9/11, but you have also said you would have voted for the war had you been in Congress at the time and that President Bush wasn't disingenuous in the lead-up to the war.

I don't think he was. He had the same info that President Clinton had. The vast majority of Republicans and Democrats alike at that juncture thought there was a strong national-security component to that authorization.

Why do you think your opponent voted against that authorization when he was in the House of Representatives?

He has traditionally been on the fringe of his own party. The case [for war] was clearly made with people who had far better information than he did.

Do you have any concerns about alienating your conservative base with some of your stances?

The people realize they can no longer afford the status quo. Bob Menendez is the status quo. He voted for the largest tax increase in U.S. history and the largest tax increase in New Jersey. He has voted to give amnesty to illegal workers. He sat on the conference committee [that] stripped out risk-based funding on homeland security ... He failed the people of New Jersey. It's not because Republicans were in charge. It's more frequently a geographic fight. He had a seat at the table.

In one of your recent television ads, you call yourself an independent reformer. But the commercial does not mention you are Republican. Was that omission intended?

People want an individual who will go down to D.C. and stand up for them. Not someone who will be beholden to the party bosses, whoever they may be.

You have been talking a lot about ethics reform in Washington during your campaign. Why do you think the GOP-controlled Congress has not been able to tackle that issue?

It has been equally difficult for ethics reform to get through the [New Jersey] state legislature. I was thrown out of the state assembly because I was fighting for "pay-to-play reform." ["Pay to play" refers to the practice of rewarding lucrative government contracts to large campaign contributors.]

What did you learn from that as you try to get a GOP-controlled Congress to deal with the problem?

What we have seen is [that] Congress can't police itself. I would hope we would be able to create an independent entity that is nonpartisan in its makeup and that would be able to focus on those issues. This is a big part of this campaign. Bob Menendez sent millions of dollars to a nonprofit organization [from] which he received $350,000 in rent payments. He worked on their behalf. House ethics rules clearly state that an individual should not profit from their public service.

Some ethics questions have been lobbed at your camp regarding campaign contributions that you received from employees or board members of companies where your father serves on the board of directors.

Everything we did was legal. My father has never reached into corporations to ask for contributions on my behalf.

Are you ever concerned about public fatigue with a Kean political dynasty?

My father set a very high standard for public service. His father did [in Congress]. It is important to be proud of your ancestors. But more important that they be proud of you.

2 Candidates Question Vote In Pr. George's (WP)

By Ovetta Wiggins, Eric Rich And Hamil R. Harris

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Congressional candidate Donna Edwards announced plans yesterday to file a lawsuit over apparent voting irregularities in Tuesday's primary election in Prince George's County, while defeated county executive challenger Rushern L. Baker III demanded an independent investigation of the process.

The separate announcements signaled that Tuesday's voting, a flawed process by many accounts, may not conclude the close primary contests for a seat in Congress and the county executive's office. The election itself was "horrendous," the Prince George's elections administrator said yesterday. And the victorious Democratic county executive candidate, incumbent Jack B. Johnson, said it warranted investigation.

"The integrity of the election is at stake," said Edwards, who ran against Rep. Albert R. Wynn in the 4th District Democratic primary and is waiting for the race to be decided when provisional ballots are counted next week in Montgomery and Prince George's counties.

Jonathan S. Shurberg, a lawyer working with Edwards, said they will ask a judge to take possession of voting machine memory cards in two, possibly three, precincts in Chillum. The request will be made either in Prince George's Circuit Court in Upper Marlboro or U.S. District Court in Greenbelt over the next several days.

Edwards said her legal complaint will focus on the security of voting machines that contained voting cards and were not delivered to the county Board of Elections until late Wednesday. "When we read reports about how easy it is to hack into these machines, there has to be concern," Edwards said.

Wynn lashed out at her over the decision to sue, accusing her of "trying to throw out votes in certain jurisdictions."

Chuck Perry, a lawyer who advised Baker's campaign, said at a news conference yesterday that there is "ample evidence" to warrant an investigation.

Widespread problems occurred throughout the county, Perry said: Numerous polling places did not open as required at 7 a.m. Computers misidentified the party affiliation of voters. And voting machines failed to electronically transmit data to the county's central office.

"We're not doing this for the campaign," Perry said. "We're doing this as a duty. Voters have been disenfranchised."

A spokesman for Johnson, who had called Tuesday's voting process "abysmal," said the county executive agrees that there should be an inquiry.

"We join Mr. Baker in his request . . . to find out what happened and avoid problems like this in the future," said the spokesman, Jim Keary.

Electronic voting machine malfunctions were reported across the region Tuesday. Machines froze, access cards stopped working and computerized voter lists crashed. The glitches renewed fears about the vulnerability of electronic machines used in the electoral process.

Perry said it is unclear whether an investigation would change the outcome of the race for county executive. For now, said Alexander Krughoff, a campaign spokesman, "Mr. Baker has issued his concession, and he stands by that."

A delay in counting votes left the winner of the surprisingly close county executive race undecided until late Wednesday, when Baker accepted defeat. Johnson had 52 percent of the vote to Baker's 48 percent. In the congressional race, Wynn leads by fewer than 3,000 votes, and Edwards has said she will not consider the election over until provisional ballots are counted.

Results trickled in Tuesday night because election workers said they had trouble transmitting data electronically from precincts to the county's central tabulating office.

According to Baker's campaign, only 60 of 206 precincts managed to transmit their results electronically. Election workers at the remaining polling places had to remove voter memory cards from each machine and drive them to Board of Elections headquarters in Upper Marlboro.

The county's interim election administrator, Robert J. Antonetti Sr., acknowledged yesterday that the primary was the most troubled election he has overseen during 34 years in the field. "This was horrendous," Antonetti said.

Antonetti, the longtime head of the Prince George's election office, served as election director in Howard County for four years after leaving Prince George's and then retired. He said he was called back after his predecessor left the area.

Before he retired, Antonetti's long career was marked by turbulence. He was ordered to pay a $7,500 ethics fine for hiring family members as part-time workers in Prince George's, and he sued the Howard County Elections Board for more pay -- a case that was settled with undisclosed terms.

Yesterday, Antonetti did not dispute Baker's statements about the electronic transmissions, and he conceded that 15 polling sites opened late because, he said, technicians he had hired did not show up.

Yet Antonetti flatly rejected any suggestion that the results were compromised. "There is no fraud in this county," he said. "That's a very bad accusation, and it's usually sour grapes."

Antonetti said election judges had been instructed to have the cards delivered to his office if they were unsuccessful after two attempts to transmit electronically. According to the directions, the cards were to be secured in locked bags and driven to the office by technicians who did not have a key.

Oliver Smith, a chief election judge in Cheverly, said that after a day with frustrating electronic equipment, he ordered the cards delivered to the office without even trying to transmit electronically. "Considering that we had some problems with our voter access cards, we had two machines that had failed and it was getting late, I wasn't going to take any more chances," he said.

Still, because of the security precautions, Smith said he was certain the results were not compromised.

Antonetti said that a number of cards were accidentally left in voting machines and that the last of those cards -- close to three dozen in as many machines -- were expected to be delivered to his office late yesterday. On Wednesday, election officials said data were not received from 81 of the county's 2,056 voting machines. The numbers represented two whole precincts -- in Chillum and Landover -- as well as cards from machines at 34 polling stations.

Although the machines have not been under guard, Antonetti said he is confident the cards have not been tampered with. The machines are kept in locked cases, he said, and security tape ensures that any tampering with a machine would be evident.

Edwards described the delay in reporting as "very suspicious." "I don't want to rush to judgment," she said. "I'm still trying to figure out what is going on."

Edwards has asked not only for data from each precinct, but also for "machine-by-machine data."

"They need to verify the chain of custody of these machines," she said.

Antonetti blamed the problems in part on the rapid pace of technological change, which he said was driven by Linda H. Lamone, the state elections administrator. He also accused her office of missing delivery deadlines, leaving the county short on materials needed to train 3,000 election workers, and altering procedures belatedly.

Lamone rejected the allegations, saying that older equipment Antonetti had on hand for training purposes did not differ significantly from the equipment used in the primary.

She noted that Antonetti, unlike many other elections administrators, declined to hire technical support workers from Diebold Inc., manufacturer of the voting machines.

Antonetti said the workers were too expensive and, in his view, no better trained than the less-well-paid technical staff he hired after advertising in newspapers.

Prince George's County State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey (D) said yesterday that he was concerned enough about the balloting to call the state prosecutor's office, which, he said, has jurisdiction over election issues.

Ivey said that even if voter irregularities were within his purview, he would have to refer the matter to another authority because of his endorsement of Baker.

Former Prosecutor Wins Ohio Dem. Primary (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0064313

By James Hannah

AP, September 16, 2006

A former assistant federal prosecutor easily won a Democratic special primary Friday to face U.S. Rep. Mike Turner in November.

Richard Chema had 73 percent, or 5,758 votes, compared with former Waynesville Mayor Charles Sanders who had 27 percent, or 2,105 votes, in Ohio's 3rd District, according to unofficial results.

The special primary was required to replace Stephanie Studebaker, who dropped out of the race Aug. 15 when she and her husband were charged with domestic violence after police answered calls about a fight at their home.

Chema, 50, was an assistant U.S. attorney from 1994 to 2006 in the Southern District of Ohio and previously an attorney in the Navy's JAG Corps, serving as prosecutor at Naval Intelligence Command in Washington.

Chema is expected to have a tough battle Nov. 7 against Turner, a second-term Republican congressman who has made a name for himself on military and urban issues and won 62 percent of the vote in 2004.

The district includes Dayton — where Turner used to be mayor — and runs through fast-growing suburbs, bedroom communities and farm country.

Dayton has historically been Democratic territory, with labor unions spawned by the auto industry wielding heavy influence. But a strong Republican presence in the city's suburbs combined with conservative voters in the rural areas have given the GOP more clout.

Capitalism With A Heart (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

Compassionate conservatism has been an expensive bust in Washington. But an intriguing alternative is emerging around the country: compassionate capitalism.

Tycoons have traditionally discovered their inner saint only after exorcising the inner capitalist. Carnegie, Ford and Gates made their money and then gave it away. But Google's young founders are already taking on poverty, disease and global warming, and they're not just dispensing cash. They've set up their philanthropy as a for-profit organization.

To many liberals, this sounds dangerously oxymoronic. How can philanthropy be profitable? A robber baron is supposed to cleanse his hands by donating his lucre to a foundation run by enlightened beings untainted by commerce (except for the dividends going into their trust funds).

This new Google venture also makes conservatives suspicious. It sounds like the "corporate social responsibility" mantra used by executives trying to be hip — and impress young trophy wives' friends — by financing politically correct boondoggles with shareholders' money.

But to a new generation of entrepreneurs, there's no conflict between capitalism and compassion. Google's philanthropy is the logical extension of a doing-well-by-doing-good strategy followed by companies like Ben and Jerry's, Starbucks and REI. The movement's philosopher is John Mackey, the co-founder of Whole Foods.

Mackey is a passionate environmentalist, an advocate of animal rights, a promoter of sustainable development — and a self-proclaimed libertarian. Call him a bleeding-heart libertarian. He wants to spread the free-market gospel, but he sees an obstacle.

"Corporations are lifting billions of people out of poverty," he says. "Why are they so hated?"

Mackey's answer is that capitalism has a branding problem: its practitioners are experts at marketing everything except their own system. They justify corporate philanthropy, like donating to the United Way, not because it's virtuous but because it buys public good will and thus contributes to the company's bottom line. To hard-core free-marketeers, the corporation's only mission is to generate profits for shareholders.

To Mackey, that's too narrow a vision. He thinks that socially conscious companies like Whole Foods have flourished because their founders, employees and customers want a corporation to have grander goals than enriching shareholders. Mackey defines his company's mission as improving the health and well-being of everyone on the planet. Before taking the company public, he told investors that he was going to devote 5 percent of the profits to philanthropy, so they can't complain now that he's robbing them.

Nor can Google's shareholders, because its founders also warned investors of their philanthropic plans. As Katie Hafner reported in The Times, they've given $1 billion in seed money to Google.org, and set up the philanthropy as a for-profit organization so it can work with venture capitalists, start companies and use any profits to finance further endeavors. One of its first projects is developing a car that gets 100 miles per gallon.

It's smart of Google's founders to try using capitalist tools to save the planet; the market's discipline should keep their philanthropy from backing too many lost causes. Still, whatever Google.org accomplishes, I'd bet that it will pale next to the social good accomplished by Google.com.

The company's founders may not have set out to help humanity with their search engine, but they have enriched countless lives by spreading ideas and connecting people. Maybe they're also smart enough to come up with a way to save gasoline, but what do they know about cars that Toyota doesn't?

If you read Adam Smith's famous passage about the invisible hand causing capitalists to unwittingly serve the public interest, you might conclude that Google's founders are better off investing their time and money in improving their core business. As Smith wrote, "I have never known much good done by those who affected to trade for the public good."

But I don't think Smith would have any problem with Google.org. He also realized that humans are motivated by more than self-interest. He wrote a long book on moral sentiments. If compassionate capitalism is a more appealing brand, if Google and Whole Foods are using philanthropy to strengthen the invisible hand, even Smith would say they're doing good.

Killing Off The American Future (NYT)

America's domination of the global information economy did not come about by accident. It flowed directly from policies that allowed the largest generation in the nation's history broad access to a first-rate college education regardless of ability to pay. By subsidizing public universities to keep tuition low, and providing federal tuition aid to poor and working-class students, this country vaulted tens of millions of people into the middle class while building the best-educated work force in the world.

Those farsighted policies, however, are a thing of the past. Cuts in college aid and soaring tuition at state colleges have made it difficult for young people to educate themselves at a time when a college degree has become the basic price of admission to both the middle class and the global economy.

The warning about American vulnerability, which has been sounded in several reports of late, was underscored yet again in a study by the National Center for Public Policy and Higher Education, a nonpartisan research organization. The report highlights some ominous trends. As the well-schooled boomers march off into retirement, the generation that replaces them is shaping up to be less educated by far. No longer the world leader in terms of the proportion of young people enrolled in college, the country now ranks 16th among the 27 nations examined when it comes to the proportion of college students who complete college degrees or certificate programs.

When judged in terms of college affordability, 43 American states are given F's in the new report. In addition to disinvesting in higher education, the states — and the colleges themselves — have shifted aid once aimed at the poor students to the middle and upper income levels. They are essentially following the lead of the federal government, which has adopted the same strategy, while failing to sustain its commitment to poor students who once could have attended college on the Pell Grant program alone.

Unless America renews its commitment to the higher education policies that made the country great, we could soon find ourselves at the mercy of an increasingly competitive global economy. And if we let ourselves hit bottom, it could take generations for us to dig ourselves out.

WASHINGTON - In an echo of the intelligence wars that preceded the U.S. invasion of Iraq, a high-stakes struggle is brewing within the Bush administration and in Congress over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program and involvement in terrorism.

U.S. intelligence and counterterrorism officials say Bush political appointees and hard-liners on Capitol Hill have tried recently to portray Iran's nuclear program as more advanced than it is and to exaggerate Tehran's role in Hezbollah's attack on Israel in mid-July.

The struggle's outcome could have profound implications for U.S. policy.

President Bush, who addresses the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday, has said he prefers diplomacy to stop Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, but he hasn't ruled out using military force.

Several former U.S. defense officials who maintain close ties to the Pentagon say they've been told that plans for airstrikes - if Bush deems them necessary - are being updated.

The leader of a Persian Gulf country who visited Washington recently came away without receiving assurances he sought that the military option was off the table, said a person with direct knowledge of the meetings.

"It seems like Iran is becoming the new Iraq," said one U.S. counterterrorism official.

This official and others spoke on condition of anonymity because the information involved is classified.

But one facet of the dispute broke into public view in recent days.

The International Atomic Energy Agency complained in an unusual letter made public on Thursday that a House intelligence committee report on Iran contains "erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated information."

A top official of the IAEA, which conducts nuclear inspections in Iran and elsewhere, wrote that the report exaggerated advances Tehran has made in enriching uranium, which can be used to fuel nuclear arms if made pure enough. The official, Vilmos Cserveny, said the report also falsely claimed that IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei had removed an inspector from Iran for being too aggressive.

Cserveny's letter was addressed to intelligence committee chairman Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich.

Hoekstra spokesman Jamal Ware said that the reference to weapons-grade uranium in the report was in a photo caption, but that the report makes clear elsewhere that Iran has not yet achieved that capability.

Committee aides say the report was meant to provoke discussion about Iran and wasn't a call for exaggerated intelligence.

The dispute was a virtual rerun of the months before the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, when ElBaradei and his agency questioned claims that Saddam Hussein was aggressively seeking nuclear weapons. Some top U.S. officials sought to discredit ElBaradei, although the IAEA's assessment proved correct.

The IAEA's written protest, dated Tuesday, was echoed privately by U.S. intelligence analysts, who saw the House report as an attempt to discredit the CIA and other agencies on Iran.

The situations with Iran now and Iraq four years ago, when Bush and his aides were making the case for war, aren't completely parallel.

Even officials and foreign countries that were skeptical about Iraq agree that Iran is probably seeking a nuclear weapon. And there is widespread consensus that Tehran is the No. 1 state sponsor of terrorism in the world.

But there are sharp differences over Iran's capabilities and actions.

Some officials at the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the State Department said they're concerned that the offices of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney may be receiving a stream of questionable information that originates with Iranian exiles, including a discredited arms dealer, Manucher Ghorbanifar, who played a role in the 1980s Iran-Contra scandal.

Officials at all three agencies said they suspect that the dubious information may include claims that Iran directed Hezbollah, the Lebanese militant group, to kidnap two Israeli soldiers in July; that Iran's nuclear program is moving faster than generally believed; and that the Iranian people are eager to join foreign efforts to overthrow their theocratic rulers.

The officials said there is no reliable intelligence to support any of those assertions and some that contradicts all three.

The officials said they fear a replay of the administration's mishandling of what turned out to be bogus information from Iraqi exiles in the run-up to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, documented earlier this month in a Senate intelligence committee report.

But they said this time, intelligence analysts and others are more forcefully challenging claims they believe to be false or questionable.

"There's no question that people are less afraid to speak up after what happened in Iraq," said one intelligence official. "There's less of an inclination to let Cheney and Rumsfeld run free."

It is, said a second U.S. intelligence official, "a little more difficult to try to put forward a one-sided view." Analysts "are not willing to be rolled over," he said.

On Hezbollah, officials say they have fought to tone down administration public statements and internal briefing papers about Iran's complicity in the attack on Israel, which sparked a month-long war.

"They're just basically saying all kinds of wacky stuff," said the first counter-terrorism official. "Now Iran is (said to be) responsible for everything Hezbollah does."

Iran is widely believed to be arming, funding and helping train Hezbollah as its proxy among Lebanon's Shiite Muslims. But a majority of analysts believe Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah maintains quite a bit of independence.

"No one says that Hezbollah is completely independent," said a U.S. intelligence official. But, "I'm not sure anyone thinks Iran ordered the kidnapping of the Israelis."

Adding to the unease, Rumsfeld's office earlier this year set up a new Iranian directorate, reported to be under the leadership of neoconservatives who played a role in planning the Iraq war.

Current and former officials said the Pentagon's Iranian directorate has been headed by Abram Shulsky. Shulsky also was the head of the now-defunct Office of Special Plans, whose role in allegedly manipulating Iraq intelligence is under investigation by the Pentagon's inspector general.

Some officials say they fear the office, whose existence was first reported by the Los Angeles Times, is being used to funnel intelligence from Ghorbanifar, the arms dealer, and an Iranian exile group known as the Mujahedeen Khalq.

A Pentagon spokeswoman didn't return two phone calls seeking comment about the office.

Bill Murray, a retired CIA station chief in Paris who met with a Ghorbanifar associate and found his claims about Iran to be bogus, called the office's establishment "a big bell ringer."

"That is outright manipulation of information to suggest a predetermined policy," Murray said.

European Diplomat Cites Gains In Iran Talks (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

BRUSSELS, Sept. 15 — The European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, offered Friday his most upbeat assessment to date on the nuclear impasse, insisting that talks to persuade Iran to suspend uranium enrichment were progressing.

"I can say honestly that we're making progress," he told reporters. "It doesn't mean that everything has been solved."

In another sign that some headway is being made, a senior Bush administration official said later that Mr. Solana would meet with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, in New York on Sunday. The official, and others cited in this article, insisted they not be quoted by name, following normal diplomatic protocol.

The European Union is softening its previous position that Iran must suspend enrichment before any negotiations can begin. Instead, officials said, there was momentum behind a twin-track approach of starting negotiations before enrichment is halted while simultaneously allowing discussion of possible penalties against Iran to continue at the United Nations.

The United States has insisted that Iran suspend enrichment before any negotiations can take place, though on Tuesday Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the administration might stop seeking to impose sanctions if Iran suspended enrichment. European Union officials said they were still examining an offer by Iran last weekend temporarily to suspend its nuclear enrichment program in return for the beginning of negotiations over a package of economic and political incentives offered by the West.

A senior French diplomat close to the talks said that the mood in European diplomacy toward Iran had shifted. “Things with Iran are not as difficult as they were before,” the official said. “There is a growing sense that suspension and negotiations can happen in parallel, and that flexibility is better than a dead end.”

The United States acknowledged Thursday that it faced resistance from crucial allies over its attempt to press for sanctions.

President Bush, who will visit the United Nations next week for meetings, said Friday he was worried Iran was trying to drag out the process with the United States and its European allies.

“My concern is that they’ll stall, they’ll try to wait us out,” he said. “So part of my objective in New York is to remind people that stalling shouldn’t be allowed. We need to move the process.”

Mr. Solana played down the threat of sanctions, saying that Washington was still willing to give diplomacy a chance. “I don’t think our American friends will be losing their patience,” he said.

But he cautioned that the window for negotiations would not stay open indefinitely. “The United Nations resolution is a track that is still open,” he said, but added: “Dialogue will not last forever. That is not our idea.”

Solana Sees Hope Of Deal With Iran On Nuclear Enrichment (FT)

By Daniel Dombey In Brussels

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, yesterday raised expectations of a deal over Iran's nuclear programme when he said that talks were proceeding better than ever.

But he also made clear that the EU still wanted reassurances that the Iranian negotiators' position was fully backed by the leadership in Tehran.

"We are really making progress: never before have we had a level of engagement and a level of discussion . . . as we have now," Mr Solana said of the talks he is carrying out with Iran on behalf of the world's big powers.

The EU has responded positively to the informal proposal, floated by Iran's top nuclear security official Ali Larijani, that Tehran could temporarily halt uranium enrichment once formal negotiations began.

Uranium enrichment can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons material and is the issue at the heart at the dispute over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Previously, the EU had insisted that Iran suspend uranium enrichment before formal negotiations can begin.

The bloc is now watering down its insistence that Iran act first. Yesterday Mr Solana said only that negotiations could not begin if Iran was still carrying out enrichment - a nod to Mr Larijani's idea that the start of negotiations and the suspension of enrichment could be simultaneous.

However, EU diplomats say they can only agree a deal if they are sure that Mr Larijani's initiative is fully backed by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader.

Mr Solana said talks scheduled last Thursday between himself and Mr Larijani had been downgraded because "a little bit more time was needed in order to reach a consensus in his [Mr Larijani's] own country, among his own leadership . . . to convey to me a possible positive answer."

The two men are expected to meet soon. In the meantime, EU diplomats are trying to nail down exactly what Iran means when it refers to suspending uranium enrichment and to win reassurances that Washington would also sign up to a possible deal.

This is important since the US has offered to sit down with Iran at the negotiating table for the first time since the Islamic revolution of 1979 if Tehran suspends enrichment and enters formal negotiations.

Many US officials are thought to be concerned about the temporary nature of any suspension and reluctant to give any further concessions to Tehran, which is already bound by a UN Security Council resolution to halt uranium enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0064318

However, Russia and China, which both hold Security Council vetoes, have long resisted the alternative path of subjecting Iran to UN sanctions and are still less likely to endorse sanctions in the current atmosphere of compromise.

EU Reports Progress In Iran Nuke Talks (AP)

By Paul Ames, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana was optimistic Friday about progress in talks to persuade Iran to bring its nuclear program into line with international demands.

Solana is trying to persuade Iran to accept an offer of economic and political rewards if it agrees to consider a long-term moratorium on uranium enrichment and commits to an enrichment freeze before talks on details of the incentives package.

"We are really making progress," Solana said. "Never before have we had the level of engagement, and a level of discussion of issues which are difficult."

Iran insists it has a right to develop its enrichment program to generate electricity. But there is increased concern it wants to make weapons-grade uranium for nuclear warheads. Its defiance of a Security Council demand that it stop enrichment activities has prompted U.S. calls for a quick move to impose sanctions.

The Europeans are hoping the talks by Solana's team can bring a negotiated end to the nuclear standoff with Iran.

Solana said he hoped for a new meeting with Iran's top negotiator, Ali Larijani, in the coming days. Lower level talks had been going on daily since Sunday, when he and Larijani last met in Vienna, Austria, he said.

"The atmosphere is good," Solana told a news conference. "We don't want to lose the momentum that was created in Vienna."

Officials in delegations familiar with the outcome of Sunday's talks said this week that Larijani had suggested his country was ready to consider an enrichment freeze for up to two months.

Solana did not confirm that. He said a planned meeting with Larijani was postponed Thursday because "a little bit more time was needed in order (for Larijani) to find consensus in his own country, among his own leadership."

Instead the two men spoke by phone and Solana said he hoped the delay in face-to-face talks would allow Larijani to return with a "possible positive answer" to ideas the European negotiator put forward last weekend.

Iran has balked at a demand issued by the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members and Germany for an enrichment freeze before any talks begin on further de-escalation of the nuclear standoff.

Solana suggested one solution could be to start negotiations at the same time as Iran announces a suspension.

"But we will not negotiate formally with activity on enrichment," Solana said. "That is understood also by the Iranians."

The permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — Russia, China, the United States, France and Britain - along with Germany, have been leading efforts to end the standoff. However the six have not been able to agree on what to do if Iran does not fall into line. China and Russia have refused to follow the tough line sought by Washington.

Bush Warns Iran, Scolds UN On Darfur (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, September 16, 2006

US President George W. Bush said he would push his hard line on Iran next week at the United Nations, and scolded the world body for its inaction on Sudan's violence-wracked Darfur region.

Bush, who will address the UN General Assembly in New York on Tuesday, said he liked UN chief Kofi Annan personally but warned that that many Americans were wary of the United Nations and that he agreed when it came to Sudan.

"I'm frustrated with the United Nations in regards to Darfur," the US president said in a wide-ranging 58-minute press conference in the White House Rose Garden. "The United Nations hasn't acted."

The UN Security Council last month approved the deployment of a 20,000 UN force in Darfur to replace an African Union force, whose mandate runs out on September 30. But the Sudanese government has refused to give its blessing.

DOJ_NMG_0064319

"I'd like to see more robust United Nations action. What you'll hear is, 'Well, the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act.' Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a resolution saying, 'We're coming in with a UN force in order to save lives,'" he suggested.

Amid European optimism that talks with Iran are making progress towards defusing the standoff over its nuclear weapons, Bush warned US partners not to take pressure off Tehran, which he suggested was playing for time.

"My concern is that, you know, they'll stall; they'll try to wait us out," he said. "So part of my objective in New York is to remind people that's stalling shouldn't be allowed."

Asked whether he would consider meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on the UN sidelines, Bush replied sternly: "No, I'm not going to meet with him."

"I have made it clear to the Iranian regime that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program, and I meant what I said," the US president said.

Bush denied that there was now a civil war in Iraq, where nearly 2,700 US troops have been killed and many more wounded, and rejected a US intelligence report of a dire picture of al-Anbar province.

US generals and Iraqi leaders "just don't agree with the hypothesis it is a civil war," he said, adding that "this business about 'al-Anbar is lost' is just not the case. That's not what our commanders think."

That was a direct response to a recent US Marines intelligence assessment that reportedly declared prospects for securing Anbar "dim" and warned "there is almost nothing the US military can do" to improve the situation.

The president's comments came with less than two months before November 7 legislative elections, at a time when many of his Republicans fear the unpopular war in Iraq could cost them dearly at the polls.

Bush used his opening statement to mount a forceful defense of some controversial strategies in the global war on terrorism, including warrantless wiretapping of Americans, secret CIA prisons, military tribunals for terrorism suspects, and harsh interrogation tactics some call torture.

Bush warned the US Congress that "time is running out" for lawmakers to pass legislation safeguarding such practices, which he called vital to saving US lives and preventing attacks like the September 11, 2001 strikes.

He grew visibly annoyed when asked whether former US secretary of state Colin Powell was right to warn that "the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

"It's unacceptable to think that there's any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children," said Bush.

On another front, he rejected charges that his administration has not done enough to catch Al-Qaeda mastermind Osama bin Laden as an "urban myth" fueled by political ambitions.

"We have been on the hunt, and we'll stay on the hunt until we bring him to justice," said Bush.

But he acknowledged telling a conservative journalist earlier this week that he would not send "thousands of troops" into the remote region of the Pakistan border with Afghanistan, where bin Laden is thought to be hiding.

"If he is in Pakistan," said Bush, "Pakistan's a sovereign nation. In order for us to send thousands of troops into a sovereign nation, we've got to be invited by the government of Pakistan."

U.S.: Iran Restricting Religious Freedom (AP)

By Barry Schweid, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

A "threatening atmosphere" in Iran is causing a deterioration in already restricted religious freedom for nearly all minorities despite repeated expressions of concern by the United Nations, the State Department said Friday.

Baha'is and Sufi Muslims especially and other religious groups not recognized by the Iranian constitution are not free to practice their faiths, the department said in its annual report to Congress on religious freedom around the world.

Eight countries, including Iran, were cited for particularly severe violations of religious freedom. The others were Burma, China, Eritrea, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Vietnam.

"We hope this report will serve as a source of encouragement for those whose plight is documented in this report," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

"While democracy and respect for basic freedoms have gained ground throughout the world, many governments still pay no more than lip service to their responsibilities under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international agreements," said John V. Hanford III, U.S. ambassador at large for international religious freedom.

At a news conference, Hanford credited Vietnam with making "enormous progress" on religious freedom, and said in Saudi Arabia "we see things moving in the right direction."

On the other hand, he denounced Uzbekistan for singling out some Muslims and Christians for "brutal treatment" on the grounds that they support terrorism. There are instances of abusing Muslims on the basis of no more than wearing a beard, he said.

Israel's response to terrorist attacks in Palestinian-held territories has severely curtailed access by Palestinians to their places of worship, the report said, although it said the Jewish state for the most part respects religious freedom.

There were credible reports, meanwhile, that the Palestinian Authority colluded with members of gangs to seize land from Christians, it said.

Islam is the official religion in Saudi Arabia and the law requires all citizens to be Muslims. Public practice of other religions is prohibited.

And yet, the report said, the Saudi government continued a campaign against official extremism while King Abdullah and other Saudi officials called for the promotion of tolerance.

Still, there were instances in which imams made intolerant statements toward Jews and other religious groups.

The U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, an independent U.S. government agency, said it was "simply shocked" by what it called an unwarranted softening of the State Department's assessment of Saudi Arabia.

"Freedom of religion does not exist in Saudi Arabia," Felice D. Gaer, the commission chair, said in a statement.

The Saudi government persists in banning all forms of public religious expression other than the government's own interpretation of one school of Sunni Islam and forcefully represses private religious practice, the commission said.

It also said that Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan and Pakistan should be added to the list of the eight most severe violators of religious freedom.

In Sudan, the State Department found some improvement in respect for religious freedom, but in the north of the country the government denied building permits for Christian churches and required all students to study Islam.

In France, some religious groups remain concerned about a 2004 law that bans the wearing of conspicuous religious symbols in public schools. And despite government efforts to stop them, anti-Semitic attacks persisted.

In Pakistan, the report said, reform-minded Muslims were intimidated and Ahmadiyya community continued to barred from practicing their faith.

US Slams Iran, Chides Israel And Other Allies Over Lack Of Religious Freedoms (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, September 16, 2006

The United States assailed Iran for its worsening treatment of religious minorities, but also chided Israel and some other allies in its annual report on religious freedoms around the world.

The State Department report said there had been a "further deterioration of the extremely poor status of respect for religious freedom" in Iran since the election in June 2005 of hardliner Mahmud Ahmadinejad as president.

Iran, which is locked in confrontation with the United States over its suspected nuclear arms program and its support for radical Islamic movements in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, continued its "harsh and oppressive treatment" of religious minorities.

DOJ_NMG_0064321

Targets for abuse, including imprisonment and harrassment, included Zoroastrians, Jews and Christians -- members of the only officially recognized minority religions in the Islamic state.

"Government actions and rhetoric created a threatening atmosphere for nearly all who do not practice ... Shia Islam," it said.

The release to Congress of the "Report on International Religious Freedom" is a precursor to the announcement each year of a blacklist of countries "of particular concern" that are subject to US sanctions.

Iran headed last year's list alongside China, Eritrea, Myanmar, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Vietnam.

The blacklist will be updated in several weeks based on the findings of Friday's report, which covered religious freedoms in 197 countries and territories, officials said.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the government's goal was broader than targeting a handful of repressive regimes.

"Religious freedom is deeply rooted in our principles and our history as a nation," she said. "And it is now integral to our efforts to combat terrorism and the ideology of hatred that fuels it."

The report also complained about the impact of Israel's construction of a controversial wall around the West Bank in response to attacks by Palestinian militants, saying the barrier "limited access to sacred sites and seriously impeded the work of religious organizations" who provide needed social services.

An executive summary of the report singled out 20 countries where the treatment of religious minorities remains of "significant interest" to the US government.

The group included a collection of US foes and allies alike: Afghanistan, Brunei, Cuba, Egypt, India, Israel and the Palestinian territories, Laos, Pakistan, Russia, Sri Lanka, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan.

John Hanford, who oversaw the report as the State Department's ambassador at large for international religious freedom, strongly hinted in a briefing for reporters that this year's blacklist would include Uzbekistan -- which was spared sanctions last year despite the recommendations of an official panel.

"In our assessment, the status of religious freedom declined in the past year in Uzbekistan," he said, noting a "severe" increase in penalties for belonging to unauthorised denominations and "inappropriate arrests" of Muslims on suspicion of terrorism.

At the same time Hanford strongly indicated that Vietnam could be dropped from the black list and also noted important improvements in religious tolerance in Afghanistan, India, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Sudan.

"Vietnam has turned the page and made tremendous progress on religious freedom," he said.

The US was also "very encouraged" by steps taken by the Saudi authorities to reign in the country's "religious police," permit private religious worship and remove anti-Semitic and anti-Christian references from school textbooks, he said.

Those assessments drew a scathing response from the US Commission on International Religious Freedom, a congressionally funded panel that advises the State Department.

"The commission is simply shocked that the department removed longstanding and widely quoted language from its report that freedom of religion does not exist in Saudi Arabia," said Felice Gaer, the panel's chairwoman.

She also said "serious abuses continue against members of all of Vietnam's religious communities" and that Hanoi should remain on the religion blacklist.

Religious Extremism Global Threat, U.S. Warns (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

A rise in fundamentalism around the world poses an increasing threat to religious freedoms and could inspire new sectarian violence, a senior State Department official said yesterday as the U.S. government released its annual global survey on religious freedom.

DOJ_NMG_0064322

John V. Hanford III, State Department ambassador-at-large for international religious freedom, said the new religious fundamentalism could be seen in a number of faiths, but the latest report contained sharp criticisms of a number of Muslim states, including Iran, Saudi Arabia and Uzbekistan.

The rise in fundamentalism "is not restricted to one religion," Mr. Hanford said in a press briefing, saying it could be seen in "certain corners of the Muslim world, the Hindu world and the Buddhist world."

"Followers of this approach to various faiths have increasingly taken efforts either to create sectarian violence and attack people of other faiths, or to try to work through their governments to bring about change that would pass laws highly restrictive on other religions," he said.

Eight countries -- Burma, China, Eritrea, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Vietnam -- are listed as countries of "particular concern" by the U.S. government for their records on religious repression. An updated list of problem countries will be issued in the next few weeks, Mr. Hanford said.

Despite the resentment and diplomatic tensions the report has sparked in the past, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in releasing the report that promoting religious freedom and tolerance abroad "is an essential component of our national security."

In Iran, the report found a "further deterioration of the extremely poor status of respect of religious freedom" in the 12-month period ending June 30, in particular for the Islamic republic's Baha'i and Sufi Muslim minorities.

Mr. Hanford also singled out Uzbekistan for criticism for its recent crackdown on religious minorities, saying the government of President Islam Karimov had stepped up restrictions on both Christian and Islamic groups not registered with authorities.

The most delicate case in the report may be Saudi Arabia, a strict Islamic state but also a critical U.S. ally and oil supplier in the volatile Middle East. The report found no change in the state of religious freedom in the kingdom in the past year, but Mr. Hanford said there were signs of a more tolerant attitude by Saudi leaders.

Miss Rice used her legal authority to waive sanctions against Saudi Arabia despite its record on religious intolerance.

"Some of the issues that would concern us about religious freedom are so endemic to [Saudi] society and to its role within Islam, that these sorts of issues are not going to change in the near future," Mr. Hanford said.

But, he added, "we are very encouraged by the position of the Saudi government ... as well as by a number of statements that have been made by King Abdullah, which I think are forward-leaning."

But the Saudi Arabia section of the report was sharply criticized by the head of the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, an independent federal monitoring agency.

Commission Chairwoman Felice D. Gaer said her panel was "simply shocked" by a softening of the language criticizing Saudi Arabia's record. Previous State Department assessments had flatly stated that freedom of religion "does not exist" in Saudi Arabia.

She said the Saudi government sharply limits religious practice at home and bankrolls activities around the world that promote the kingdom's restrictive brand of Islam.

She added that evidence provided in the new department report justified adding Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan and Pakistan to the list of countries of particular concern when the new designation list is released.

Mr. Hanford said U.S. officials have seen improvements in religious tolerance in some countries, including Laos and Vietnam. He said the United States had refrained from using sanctions against Vietnam despite its designation as a country of particular concern.

"Vietnam has turned the corner and made enormous progress on religious freedom," he said.

Bush Urges U.N. To Act On Sudan (WP/AP)

President Bush suggested Friday that it may be time to override the objections of the Sudanese government in order to send international peacekeepers into Darfur.

"What you'll hear is, well, the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act," Bush said at a news conference in Washington. "Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a U.N. resolution saying we're coming in with a U.N. force in order to save lives."

Bush Urges U.N. To Act On Darfur (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, September 16, 2006

President Bush suggested Friday it may be time to send international peacekeepers into Sudan's war-torn Darfur region over the objections of the government in Khartoum.

"What you'll hear is, well, the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act," Bush said. "Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a U.N. resolution saying we're coming in with a U.N. force in order to save lives."

More than 200,000 people have been killed in Darfur and over 2 million have fled their homes since 2003 when ethnic African tribes revolted against the Arab-led government. The government is accused of unleashing brutal Arab militiamen known as janjaweed in the remote western province.

The mandate for a weak African Union peacekeeping force, which hasn't been able to stop the violence, expires next month.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair called the situation unacceptable, and he urged international pressure on the Sudanese government and rebels to stop fighting immediately.

"Last May, we hoped the signature of the Darfur Peace Agreement by the government of Sudan and one rebel group would set Darfur on the road to peace," Blair said in a statement released early Saturday in London. "The non-signatory rebel groups must now accept it. And the government of Sudan must stop its military campaign."

Meanwhile, the resistance by some rebel groups to sign on to a May peace agreement to end the long conflict has prompted the government to ratchet up the fighting again. As the crisis deepens, many believe Darfur is poised for a catastrophic escalation in atrocities.

A Security Council resolution passed in August, aimed at strengthening the peacekeeping force, would hand it over to a better-funded, larger and more well-equipped U.N. mission. But the resolution is unlikely to take effect without the consent of the Sudanese government, something nations including the United States have worked — without success — to acquire.

Sudan's President Omar al-Bashir says a switch in command would violate the country's sovereignty and has warned that his army would fight any U.N. forces sent to Darfur.

At the State Department, Assistant Secretary Kristen Silverberg said the United States insisted that last month's resolution permit deployment of new peacekeepers over Sudanese objection.

"We think that the likelihood of ending the violence is much better if we have support and cooperation from the government of Sudan," she told reporters. "But it's not required."

But Bush, bringing up the subject as an example of general frustration with the world body, appeared angry that "the United Nations hasn't acted" on Darfur and wants to see a "more robust" effort. His comments suggested the possibility of a new, tougher resolution that would explicitly bypass approval from the Sudanese government.

"There's genocide taking place in Sudan. And it breaks our collective hearts to know that. ... I'm troubled by reports I hear about escalating violence," the president told reporters during a Rose Garden news conference. "Now is the time for the U.N. to act."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will gather diplomats from several countries to discuss Darfur during the United Nations General Assembly session that begins next week, Silverberg said. The participants and the agenda are not yet set.

It is generally thought that the United States does not support including American troops in the peacekeeping force, instead favoring the participation of NATO forces which would provide logistical and other support to any stepped-up mission.

Blair Says Darfur Situation In Sudan Is "Completely Unacceptable" (AFP-Y)

AFP, September 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064324

British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticised the Sudanese government over the "completely unacceptable" situation in Darfur and accused it of breaking ceasefire agreements signed with rebels.

"I am committed to stepping up international efforts to bring a change of mind and action from the government of Sudan," the premier said, adding that the international community could not "just watch as this tragedy deepens."

Speaking on the eve of International Day for Darfur Sunday, Blair insisted that the crisis was "at the top" of his agenda as a number of human rights campaigners wrote an open letter to him in Britain's Independent newspaper.

"I have already talked to (Chinese) Premier Wen and President George Bush about Darfur in the last few days," he said.

"In the coming weeks, I will talk to other leaders to agree an initiative that sets out the help Sudan can expect if the government lives up to its obligations and what will happen if they don't."

He added that he "did not understand" Khartoum's rejection of the peacekeeping force authorised by a UN Security Council resolution last month.

"The government of Sudan must agree to the continuation of the African Union force and transition to the UN," Blair said.

Blair's comments echo those by Bush Friday that he was "frustrated" with the UN for failing to get a robust 20,000-strong force into the war-wracked province, again calling the situation in Darfur a "genocide."

Oscar-winning Hollywood star George Clooney and Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel pleaded with the Security Council Thursday to act, with the actor calling the situation "the first genocide of the 21st century".

Darfur has been in the throes of a civil war since 2003 which has pitched rebel groups against the Khartoum government and allied Arab militia.

The conflict has killed around 300,000 people and displaced more than 2.5 million, according to the UN.

A peace accord signed in May between the Sudanese government and the main rebel groups was meant to end the conflict in the region but incidents between rebel factions in recent months have led to more deaths.

Senior members of the British Muslim, Jewish and Christian faiths will on Sunday gather outside Blair's Downing Street residence in central London to call for an end to the suffering in the troubled region.

Prayers written by the spiritual leader of the worldwide Anglican community, Archbishop of Canterbury Dr Rowan Williams and Britain's Chief Rabbi, Dr Jonathan Sacks, and leading British Muslim scholar Sheikh Ibrahim Mogra will be read out.

Mogra said: "The world must not stand by and witness another Holocaust, another Rwanda or another Bosnia."

The letter in the Independent -- which devoted its front page and four inside pages to the crisis -- urged Blair to "move Darfur to the top of its priority list until a UN force is deployed and the people of Darfur are protected".

It was signed by a number of religious leaders, including the former archbishop of Canterbury George Carey, musician and anti-poverty campaigner Bob Geldof, and the actress and UNICEF ambassador Mia Farrow.

Singer Elton John and his film producer partner David Furnish were also signatories.

"'Never again' is a well-worn phrase. Now is the time to show we mean it," they said.

Join Me To Help Save Darfur (LAT)

By Kofi A. Annan, Kofi A. Annan Is Secretary-general Of The United Nations.

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

The U.N. secretary-general asks for help in pressuring Sudan to accept more international troops.

TOMORROW, SEPT. 17, people around the world will be taking part in a "Global Day for Darfur" to show support for the people of Darfur and to put pressure on governments to protect innocent civilians. They are right, and I hope their call will be heard.

The glimmer of hope that many of us felt when the Darfur peace agreement was signed four months ago — albeit by only two of the warring parties — is being extinguished by renewed fighting among the factions. In violation of the agreement, the Sudanese government has sent thousands of troops to Darfur and renewed its bombing.

I strongly condemn this escalation. The government of Sudan should stop its offensive immediately. All parties should perform what they have promised and abide by the resolutions of the United Nations Security Council.

These latest clashes have brought yet more misery to the people of Darfur, who have already endured far too much. The total number of displaced people stands at 1.9 million. Nearly 3 million people depend on international aid for food, shelter and medical treatment, while aid workers have increasingly become the targets of violence — 12 have been killed just in the last two months.

A year ago, world leaders meeting at the U.N. agreed that all states have the responsibility to protect their populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity. The government of Sudan, if it fails in this sacred responsibility, will face opprobrium and disgrace throughout the world. Neither those who decide such policies nor those who carry them out should imagine that they will not be held accountable.

Once again, I urge Sudan to avoid this by accepting the Security Council's decision to deploy a U.N. peacekeeping operation, which would be better equipped and funded than the current African Union mission and have a clearer mandate to protect those in danger.

About 10,000 U.N. troops are already in Sudan. For more than a year, they have been helping to implement the peace agreement between northern and southern Sudan. On Aug. 31, the Security Council, while reaffirming its commitment to the sovereignty, unity, independence and territorial integrity of Sudan, authorized the deployment of up to 17,300 additional troops to Darfur to implement the peace agreement. There is no hidden agenda, no other ambition than to help the people of Darfur to live in peace and in dignity. But the government of Sudan has refused.

Putting the extra U.N. troops in place will in any case take time. Therefore, the Security Council also called for strengthening the African Union mission, or AMIS, so that it can carry on until the U.N. arrives. The Africans have repeatedly asked for this transition but say that in the meantime their troops, who have performed valiantly in very difficult conditions, need help.

The U.N. has agreed to support AMIS during the crucial transition period. But AMIS will also need increased support from donors — including the League of Arab States, which has offered vital backing and wants AMIS to stay until the end of the year.

I have tried repeatedly to explain the transition to the government of Sudan and to clear up any misconceptions or myths. In public and in private I have stressed the humanitarian situation and appealed to the government's own pragmatic good sense.

But my voice is not enough. Whoever, in Africa or beyond, is in a position to influence the government of Sudan must do so without delay.

The Security Council, and especially its five permanent members — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — have a particular responsibility to ensure that the message to the government of Sudan is strong, clear and uniform. But every voice raised makes a difference, and therefore the responsibility is shared among us all. I urge everyone to join their voices with mine in asking the government of Sudan to embrace the spirit of the Security Council's resolution, to consent to the transition and to pursue the political process with new energy.

There can be no military solution to the crisis in Darfur. All parties should have understood by now, after so much death and destruction, that only a political agreement — in which all stakeholders are fully engaged — can bring real peace to the region.

Twelve years ago, the United Nations, and the world, failed the people of Rwanda in their time of need. Can we now, in all conscience, stand by and watch as the tragedy deepens in Darfur?

For Darfur Women, Survival Means Leaving Camp, Risking Rape (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

GRAIDA, Sudan, Sept. 15 -- The tall, light-skinned man reeking of sweat and cigarettes often gallops his horse right into the nightmares of Darelsalam Ahmed Eisa, 18. Each time, she said, he throws her to the ground, pushes up her skirt and forces himself inside her while muttering: " Abdah. Abdah. Abdah ."

Slave woman. Slave woman. Slave woman.

He was in her dreams just last night, she recalled, as real and horrifying in his green camouflage uniform as he was the day he raped her two months ago. But when Eisa awoke this morning, there was no time for terror, no time for tears. She covered herself in an orange and blue cloth, grabbed the family's ax and departed for the perilous Darfur countryside, out of the relative safety of a sprawling camp for people displaced by the violence in this region of western Sudan.

In the wilderness, Eisa can find grass for the donkeys and firewood for cooking. But it is also where government-backed militias known as the Janjaweed roam, terrorizing villagers. Violence and disease in Darfur have killed as many as 450,000 people since 2003, and an estimated 2 million have been forced to flee their homes.

The government and a rebel group reached a cease-fire agreement in May, but since then, rapes in and around camps for people displaced by the fighting have surged, aid groups and residents say. The International Rescue Committee has recorded more then 200 sexual assaults among residents of a single camp near Nyala, a town in South Darfur state, during a five-week period in July and August.

More and more often, women in Darfur face the starkest of choices: risk being raped by leaving the camps in search of firewood and grass, or starve. If they invite their brothers or husbands along to protect them, the Janjaweed will still rape the women, they say, and kill the men.

"It is better for me to be raped than for my brother to be killed," said Eisa, soft-spoken and round-faced, with hair braided into tight rows beneath her head scarf. She has two children, ages 2 and 5, but no husband. He divorced Eisa last year, she said, after she quarreled with one of his elder wives.

But Eisa is not alone. On this morning, as she walked with the ax on her shoulder, her sister, Aziza, 15, was just a few paces behind. Other women and girls, on foot and on donkeys, soon joined them in a haphazard convoy of mothers, daughters and sisters flowing west, away from the low morning sun.

They passed braying donkeys and smoky wood fires in the camp. They passed children playing soccer and rolling pot lids with sticks. And they passed an African Union military base, close enough to hear a sputtering generator there that powers satellite televisions. On the screens, images of slinky Bollywood dancers entertained the lonely men who are posted at the base to monitor the cease-fire but rarely venture beyond the double-coiled razor wire of their perimeter.

Eisa, her sister and an 18-year-old friend had followed the same path on the day in July that they were attacked.

But that day, they had gone farther -- about two hours west instead of one -- in search of a variety of grass that fetches a higher profit at the camp's makeshift markets, about 75 cents per sack rather than the 50 cents paid for the grass collected near the camp. They had four donkeys with them that day, so 25 cents more per pack meant maybe a couple of dollars more in earnings for the day.

After walking for about two hours, they had nearly reached the better grass when dozens of Janjaweed militiamen on horses and camels suddenly appeared, surrounding the young women.

Aziza tried to run but was caught within seconds and struck in the face. Eisa froze. Quickly and roughly, the men separated the two sisters and their friend, with a man taking each one to a secluded spot.

The tall, light-skinned man was riding a reddish-brown horse, Eisa said. He was clean-shaven and armed with a machine gun. "I will take you," the man told Eisa. "My wife needs a slave."

He then ordered Eisa to lie on her back, but she refused. She knew that if he raped her and the community learned of the attack, she would probably never be able to remarry.

Her defiance enraged the man. He aimed the gun at Eisa and shouted: "I will shoot you! I will shoot you!"

At that moment, a second Janjaweed man stepped in. "Don't waste a bullet on a woman!" he said. "Just throw her."

The tall man hurled Eisa to the dirt and crawled atop her.

A few minutes later, the rapes were over but not the ordeal. The Janjaweed tied the young women together at their wrists and beat them with their fists and the butts of their guns.

Then, the militiamen ordered the women to lead them to a place where they could find some animals to steal. If they found enough, the men said, they might free them.

Terrified, Eisa helped lead their captors to a place where people water their animals. But before they arrived, they came upon two men relaxing with their animals. One mounted his horse and rode off in a panic as the Janjaweed approached, leaving 40 cows behind for them to steal. The second man, having only a donkey, was unable to escape.

The Janjaweed shot him dead, Eisa said, and took his donkey.

DOJ_NMG_0064327

As the group approached the watering place, most of the Janjaweed men decided to ride ahead on their horses and camels, leaving the captives in the custody of one man who appeared to be their leader.

The man appeared to know Eisa's friend and fellow captive. He asked about her father, then untied the women and ordered them to flee, she said.

They raced toward safety, sprinting right out of their flip-flops. After 90 minutes, Eisa said, they had arrived at the outskirts of their camp, with thorns embedded in the soles of their feet.

The young women told their friends and relatives about the attack but not about the rapes. But over the next few weeks, gossip began to spread. Neighbors assumed the worst, about the attack, about Eisa, her sister and their friend.

"They scorn you. They laugh at you," Eisa said. "They look at you as if you are strange, as if they haven't seen you before."

The only good news came about two weeks later. After living in fear that the rape might have made her pregnant, Eisa's period arrived. The relief, she said, was overwhelming.

By the time Eisa reached the end of her story, she and her sister had arrived at the spot where they planned to collect firewood. With expert swings of the ax -- so hard Eisa's head scarf fell to her shoulders -- she and Aziza cut the largest branches off two trees, stripped the bark and bundled the still-moist wood.

With their donkeys long gone -- stolen in the Janjaweed attack -- the sisters hoisted the bundles onto their heads and began the long walk back to the camp beneath the relentless Darfur sun.

Lebanon Must Disarm Hezbollah, Israeli Foreign Minister Warns (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

The Lebanese government must fully implement a recent U.N. resolution requiring the disarming of the militant Shiite group Hezbollah or Israel will be less reluctant to attack the Lebanese state if Hezbollah resumes hostilities, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said yesterday.

Livni, in an interview with editors and reporters of The Washington Post, said that when the fighting began in July after Hezbollah seized two Israeli soldiers, Israel heeded calls from world officials not to undermine the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora because the formation of the government and the subsequent withdrawal of Syrian troops was an "achievement of the international community."

Israel launched attacks across southern Lebanon, Hezbollah's base, and it demolished bridges to Syria and bombed Beirut's airport. Livni said Israel's efforts to keep the military campaign limited made it more difficult to achieve its objectives.

"The result is it was more difficult to find these terrorists among civilians, compared to attacking a weak Lebanon," Livni said. "We could have done Lebanon in a few days, I think, if we had decided to attack Lebanon as a state."

"Now there is a need to implement fully and completely 1701," Livni said, referring to the resolution passed by the U.N. Security Council that led to the cease-fire between Israeli and Hezbollah forces. "If Israel will be attacked, this is the Lebanese responsibility."

Since passage of the resolution, 4,000 international troops have moved into southern Lebanon, as has the Lebanese army, and U.S. officials say arms shipments have been halted. But Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, said this week that Hezbollah fighters are still in southern Lebanese towns near the border with Israel.

If Israel is attacked again, "we are not looking again to find these terrorists among the civilian population," Livni added. "We are going to face a state which does not implement its responsibility or maybe does not exercise its sovereignty. And so in French, they say tant pis " -- which translates as "too bad."

Asked specifically if Israel would attack Lebanon, Livni replied: "It is the responsibility of the state of Lebanon. I don't want to say so clearly that next time this is what we will do. But we will take it into consideration that this is part of their responsibility."

Separately, Livni expressed concern that a proposed unity government in the Palestinian territories will not explicitly recognize Israel. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who supports peace talks with Israel, is attempting to reach a deal with the radical Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, which won legislative elections earlier this year. The victory of Hamas led to a broad cutoff of international aid, leaving much of the Palestinian territories increasingly destitute.

Hamas won on a platform of reform against the increasingly corrupt Fatah movement, which had long led the Palestinians. But Livni said the aid cutoff has greatly weakened the appeal of Hamas -- which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel -- making it imperative for other nations to insist that the new government renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist.

The Quartet -- a coordinating group for Middle East peace made up of the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia -- will meet on Wednesday at the United Nations. Livni said next week will be an important test of the international community's resolve.

"Hamas has to decide what they will do. Abu Mazen has to take some decisions," Livni said, using Abbas's nom de guerre. "They are looking outside; and if the international community will show some hesitation, we will face a unity government, which will be the most dangerous situation."

Livni said "it is easy for us to see something black, Hamas, and white, Abu Mazen, but sometimes the in-between, the gray, is sometimes the most dangerous" because it will appear legitimate through the presence of Abbas while Hamas continues to be an anti-Israeli militia movement. "They can get legitimacy and get the checks, but we cannot end the conflict."

Asked if the Israeli government would refuse to deal with a unity government, Livni said: "The question is not the formation of the government but its platform."

Livni said it was a mistake to believe that elections would transform terrorist groups. "I believe deeply in democratization, but the question is what is the best way to implement it," she said. "The idea is not only voting, one vote for one person, but the acceptance of the values of democracy."

She said that some have argued that governing will transform militants into responsible parties, but she noted that she believes that "if you are political party which believes in an extreme Islamic ideology, when you have the power you will use it in order to force your ideology. It will look like something which is legitimate because it won the election."

She noted that many nations are working to strengthen the Lebanese army in an effort to transform Lebanon into a normal state. But Hezbollah is a minority in the Lebanese government now, she said, so one day "we may face Hezbollah winning the election and it would have the legitimate control of the Lebanese army."

Israeli Official Hopeful On Arms Embargo (AP-Y)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 16, 2006

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, heading home after talks with the Bush administration, said Friday she expects the Lebanese government to prevent the re-arming of Hezbollah.

"Enforcing the arms embargo is crucial," Livni said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press as she headed for the airport. "We know that Hezbollah is weak in terms of arms."

Maintaining the embargo and disarming the Iranian-backed militant group with which Israel fought a costly war this summer "is the test of the Lebanese government and the international community," she said.

"Lebanon has to exercise its sovereignty and disarm Hezbollah," Livni said. "It is our expectation" that Lebanon will follow through.

This week, Assistant Secretary of State David Welch told the Senate Foreign Committee smuggling of weapons across Syria's border with Lebanon had been halted.

And on Friday, a State Department official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to make statements, said there were no indications of new infusions of weapons into Lebanon for Hezbollah.

Livni declined to provide estimates of how much of Hezbollah's arsenal was wiped out by Israeli air and ground assaults.

During the war, Israel reported 70 to 80 percent of Hezbollah's long- and medium-range missiles, which were considered a strategic threat, were destroyed. Much of Hezbollah's short-range arsenal survived.

A Cease-Fire Drives Into A Mirage On A Border That Disappears As It Gets Closer (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064329

HAWSH BEIT ISMAIL, Lebanon, Sept. 10 — There is no fence, no marking, no sense of a border at all in the broad track-crossed swaths of open land and rugged mountains that lie between Lebanon and Syria.

A large concrete block bars cars from crossing a small bridge over a narrow irrigation canal here, beyond which stands a cinderblock guardhouse flying a Syrian flag. But when asked, some local residents say the land west of the canal is Lebanon, others insist it is Syria. Most agree that it does not really matter.

"It's not a border," said Hussein al-Hajj Hassan. "I am here. Mmy brother is there."

Among the most volatile flashpoints in the fragile cease-fire between Israel and Hezbollah is the question of arms crossing this fuzzy border. Israel is concerned that Hezbollah, the Shiite group whose militia set off the war, will continue to receive missiles and other sophisticated weapons from Iran across the 205-mile long, sparsely guarded frontier.

Local residents say it would be a simple matter requiring only the barest collusion of either side for a tractor or truck to haul weapons from one side to the other.

Israel wants the expanded United Nations peacekeeping force, already deploying along Lebanon's southern border with Israel, to monitor the Syrian border as well as to keep weapons out. But Syria says it would consider that a "hostile act" and the Lebanese in this region warn that any foreign presence would face stiff resistance.

"We will consider the U.N. soldiers as occupying troops, and we will have the right to resist them," said Abdul Nasser Asahili, a mukhtar, or local leader, in Hermil, the district's capital. "We advise them to stay south of the Litani River.''

In Hermil District, paved roads crossing the border are blocked with stones or concrete barriers to prevent vehicles larger than motorcycles from passing. Cars, trucks and buses must use one of four main border crossings between the two countries. Lebanon has put more than 8,000 soldiers along the border to monitor traffic, but few people here believe the Lebanese Army is capable of stopping the arms flow.

"Without international observers along the Lebanese-Syrian border, there will be no solution," the Lebanese Druse leader Walid Jumblatt told a rally of his supporters last week. "It will be impossible to stop trucks loaded with arms, ammunition and explosives from entering Lebanon."

He said earlier in a television interview that he had heard of tunnels beneath the border in the northern Akkar District through which weapons can pass.

Mr. Asahili, the Hermil official, said he did not believe that weapons had crossed in his district, but that they had elsewhere. He favors the idea.

"Hezbollah has the right to bring in weapons," he said. "The Israelis are bringing in a lot of weapons from the U.S., and Hezbollah has the right to defend Lebanon."

He says rather unconvincingly that the sparse Lebanese Army presence along the border should be enough to reassure Israel and the West that no more weapons will reach Hezbollah. But at the new army checkpoint in nearby Al Qasr, one of many hastily constructed since the cease-fire, half a dozen soldiers idle away the day in a freshly built cinder-block building beside a blue metal sign reading, "Stop. Lebanese Army." The cars and trucks slow down but rarely stop.

More to the point, Mr. Asahili echoes the widely held view in Lebanon that Hezbollah neither needs nor wants to import arms, for the time being anyway. The group's deputy secretary general, Naim Qassem, said in an interview with the London-based Asharq Al-Awsat newspaper last week that the group used fewer than a quarter of its rockets during the summer's 34-day war. "Rebuilding the party's arsenal is not a priority, since it still has enough weapons," he said.

Elias Hanna, a retired general and security specialist in Beirut, said he believes the claim because of the sustained daily rate at which Hezbollah was firing rockets until the cease-fire. "When you start to run short, you economize," he said.

But Israel insists that it destroyed as much as half of Hezbollah's arsenal and wants the world to make sure it is not restored.

Like so many borders in the Middle East, the line separating Lebanon from Syria is arbitrary, drawn in the 1920's by France when it carved Lebanon from its share of the defunct Ottoman empire.

The border left 15 Lebanese villages in Syria and 9 Syrian villages in Lebanon. Local residents largely ignored the imaginary line even after the two countries won independence in 1943. Their currencies were interchangeable, and land holdings bled into one another.

"It's like New York and New Jersey; there's no difference," said Mr. Asahili.

The real division came in the early 1950's when the two countries separated their customs regimes and the value of their currencies began to diverge. Yet Lebanese living in Syria continued to register births and deaths in the Lebanese administrative seats. Abdullah Sakr, for example, was born in Zaita, a Lebanese village several miles inside Syria, but he carries a Lebanese passport because his birth, like his father's and grandfather's, was registered in Hermil.

The border region is dominated by Shiites, who have a strong allegiance to Syria, crediting its army with stopping the country's brutal civil war, from 1975 to 1990. That relationship grew even stronger during the years that followed, with Syrian troops stationed in the Bekaa Valley.

Shiite towns in the area are festooned with banners urging Hezbollah fighters toward martyrdom and dotted with portraits of Iranian ayatollahs and even Hafez al-Assad, the Syrian president who died in 2000.

"In war, the martyrs are like the sons of God," reads stenciled writing on a concrete wall in Hawsh Beit Ismail beside a stylized image of a soldier planting Hezbollah's flag. A nearby wall is painted with careful calligraphy that reads, "America is God's enemy."

While the Lebanese Army has remained independent of sectarian tensions pulling the government apart, its rank and file are also largely Shiite and sympathetic to Hezbollah.

"For the last 30 years this border was open for everything — gasoline, arms — it was like no border at all," said Mr. Hanna, the retired general. He added that during the years the Syrian Army was in the country, weapons moved freely from one country to the other.

After Syria was forced to withdraw in 2005, though, weapons shipments became clandestine. Mr. Hanna said "a torrent" of weapons was smuggled across the border before the Hezbollah raid that started the war on July 12, but that the government lacked the unity and political will to stop it.

Mr. Asahili, the Hermil official, said smuggling was a fact of life, pointing to several plastic five-gallon containers of gasoline that he fills up in Syria because it costs half the price there. The roadblocks cut down on larger-volume commercial smuggling, but everyone knows there is a brisk, illicit border trade.

"Even if they put soldiers side by side all along the border they couldn't stop it," Mr. Asahili said. "People in this region don't believe in dividing into two countries. To them it is one country."

Israel Army In Disarray Over Lebanon Failures (AFP)

AFP, September 16, 2006

A general resigns, a colonel is disciplined and a military command battered by an unrelenting storm of criticism: the Israeli army is in disarray as it struggles to cope with the failures of the war in Lebanon.

A month after the 34-day war against Shiite militia Hezbollah ended, nothing has halted the flood of criticism against the military and political leadership over their handling of a deadly conflict that failed to achieve its main aims.

Two days after Israel's northern army commander resigned, it emerged that embattled army chief Dan Halutz disciplined the head of an armoured brigade for criticising a superior in front of his subordinates during the war.

Colonel Amnon Eshel, head of the seventh brigade, reportedly complained that his immediate boss, General Gal Hirsh, was "completely cut off from realities on the ground" as his badly-prepared men battled to counter Hezbollah rockets.

Halutz "severely reprimanded" Eshel for disrespecting the military hierarchy and suspended him from promotion for two years, an army spokesman told AFP.

The latest incident, revealed two days after General Udi Adam resigned, underscored the level of disarray in the military.

The war left 162 Israelis dead and failed to achieve either main objectives of retrieving two soldiers captured by Hezbollah in a raid on July 12 or halting the guerrillas' barrage of more than 4,000 rocket attacks on the north.

Israel has also weathered heavy criticism abroad for its devastating use of force in Lebanon, where more than 1,200 people were killed and thousands of homes and infrastructure targets were bombed.

Adam's departure as the first official to step down as done little to quell discontent amid calls for further heads to roll calls such as for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Halutz and Defence Minister Amir Peretz to go.

In an interview published Friday, former chief of staff Moshe Yaalon urged them to step down, charging that the entire conflict was misconceived and mismanaged from start to finish.

"Going to war was scandalous and he is directly responsible for that. The management of the war was a failure and he is responsible for that," Yaalon was quoted as saying in the Haaretz daily when asked if Olmert had to resign.

"The final operation was particularly problematic and he was directly involved in that. He was warned and he did not heed the warnings. Therefore he must resign," Yaalon said.

"Halutz created lack of clarity that rattled the forces in the field, caused a loss of trust and generated chaos. He did not give the commanders in the north backing... He managed the campaign arrogantly and shallowly," he added.

On Sunday, cabinet ministers are expected to approve a five-man government commission into the war, chaired by retired judge Eliyahu Winograd and made up of two university professors and two retired major generals.

"It is high time that a commission of inquiry gets underway," Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told army radio from Washington, amid unease over the late start to a proper investigation.

The committee is to examine how the government and defence establishment dealt with the Hezbollah threat in the years before the war as well as during the conflict from July 12 to August 14.

But its powers fall short of a state commission, Israel's most authoritative inquiry that could subpoena witnesses and order police searches.

Last week, up to 30,000 Israelis in Tel Aviv called for a state commission, but Olmert has said such an inquiry would "completely paralyse" the leadership at a time of serious threat, including from arch-foe Iran.

An interim report drawn up by a parliamentary sub-committee has accused the government and homefront command of serious failures in everything related to the care and protection of civilians in the north.

Palestinian Intelligence Official Is Killed (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 15 — A senior Palestinian intelligence officer and four others were shot to death in their car in Gaza on Friday as political leaders continued to squabble over a possible new national unity government.

The daylight shooting, 200 yards from the home of Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, and the escape of the killers, were indications of the continuing lawlessness in Gaza. The shooting was seen by some local officials as more likely to be a robbery, and by some as part of the conflict between rival security forces of Fatah and Hamas.

The dead senior officer, Brig. Gen. Jad Tayeh, 55, was the international coordination chief in the Palestinian intelligence services and was well known to foreign envoys. A briefcase and the officers' weapons were taken. The immediate speculation in Gaza was that the briefcase contained money.

Progress appeared to be slow on the national unity government announced Monday by the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah. He said that Fatah and Hamas had agreed on a political platform for a new government that he expected to meet international requirements sufficiently to restore funding that was cut off after Hamas took power in March.

But the platform has not been published, the parties disagree about portfolios and Mr. Abbas has delayed dissolving the current government. The United States and some members of the European Union have expressed doubts about whether the new platform will satisfy the West's three requirements: to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

In Brussels on Friday, European Union foreign ministers agreed to support a new Palestinian government, but heeded American warnings that it was too early to abandon the aid restrictions before a new government was formed and its platform published.

On Thursday, Mr. Haniya accused the United States of undermining efforts to form the new government and called on Europe to take the lead in lifting international sanctions against the Palestinians. "The U.S. administration does not want the Palestinians to be unified," Mr. Haniya said. "It puts obstacles in the way of this political coming together. It wants to extort the Palestinian people and the Palestinian government."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a meeting on Wednesday with the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, said that the United States would insist on the three conditions, including an explicit recognition of Israel's right to exist, as agreed upon by the "quartet" of the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations that had been trying to promote peace negotiations.

Hamas will not do that, its leaders say, but is trying to draw a distinction between a political platform designed for a coalition government and the beliefs of the Hamas movement itself.

Still, Mr. Haniya and Mr. Abbas have been appealing to European anxieties about the severe economic depression that the cutoff in funding and aid has produced in the Palestinian territories, and in particular in Gaza, which the United Nations has called "a ticking time bomb."

United Nations agencies have sharply increased their aid, including basic foodstuffs, to prevent malnutrition in Gaza, where 40 percent of the work force is employed by the Palestinian Authority and has received less than two months' salary in the last seven months.

The Europeans want to end the stalemate and use the conclusion of the war in Lebanon as a springboard to renewed Israeli-Palestinian talks. Some European countries want to restore the aid in stages, after specific benchmarks are met, like an end to rocket attacks on Israel.

But the Europeans are split. The external relations commissioner of the European Union, Benita Ferrero-Waldner, said that it should show flexibility provided that a new government "reflected" the three demands. "It is clear we want to be firm on principles, but we should be flexible about the form this government chooses in the text," she said.

The Slovenian foreign minister, Dimitrij Rupel, told reporters: "We are happy about the government of national unity. We are trying to help it, also financially."

But such a government does not yet exist, as Britain's minister for Europe, Geoff Hoon, pointed out, saying that "there is still some further clarification as to precisely what is the underlying agreement involving Hamas."

Ben Bot, the Dutch foreign minister, said that support depended on meeting the three demands. Asked about the prospects, he said, "So far not very positive, I must say."

In a joint statement, the foreign ministers "welcomed" a new Palestinian government and "expressed the hope that its political platform will reflect the quartet principles and allow for early engagement." They also "expressed deep concern at the humanitarian situation in the Palestinian territories," again called on Israel to hand over to the Palestinians nearly $400 million in taxes and duties collected since February and urged Israel to reopen all crossings to and from Gaza.

Mr. Abbas is hoping that a new government will be accompanied by a series of developments: the release of a captured Israeli soldier, the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Gaza, the release of Hamas legislators and ministers held by Israel, a renewed cease-fire, a meeting between himself and the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, the release of about 600 Palestinian prisoners, the handover of the withheld taxes and duties, and the resumption of American and European aid.

That complicated chain of events would get Israeli-Palestinian relations closer to where they were at the end of last year, but would not move the two sides much closer to a final peace agreement.

Also on Friday, Israeli forces bombed a house in Rafah that the army said contained the entrance to a tunnel used to smuggle arms. The Israelis said that they had warned inhabitants to leave, and that there were secondary explosions suggesting that arms were in the tunnel.

Intelligence Official, Aides Slain In Gaza (LAT)

Maj. Gen. Jad Tayeh had ties to President Abbas and Fatah. He led global coordination for agency.

JERUSALEM — Masked gunmen shot and killed a senior official in the Palestinian intelligence service and four aides Friday near the home of Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh.

Palestinian officials said Maj. Gen. Jad Tayeh and the aides were in a vehicle in the Shati refugee camp, on the northern edge of Gaza City, when masked men in a sport utility vehicle cut them off and opened fire.

DOJ_NMG_0064333

The attackers fled after taking weapons and cellphones from the dead, as well as a briefcase containing documents, according to the intelligence service. At least three victims were described as bodyguards.

Authorities said they had opened an investigation but made no announcement about possible suspects.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility.

"It's a crime against the innocents. They were killed after they had performed the Friday prayer," said Gen. Mohammed Masri, a senior officer in the intelligence service.

The intelligence service is under the jurisdiction of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Tayeh, who was in charge of the agency's international coordination, was affiliated with Abbas and the president's Fatah movement.

It was not known whether the attack was part of sporadic strife between the once-dominant Fatah faction and Hamas, the radical Islamic group that won control of parliament in January elections. Many clashes have involved gun battles, often between rival security agencies.

Fatah and Hamas announced this week that they would form a coalition government. The move is aimed mainly at restarting the flow of international aid, but it also could help ease some of the street violence, which has been especially severe in the Gaza Strip.

The United States and the European Union cut off most aid to the Palestinian Authority after the elections because they classify Hamas as a terrorist group. Palestinian officials hope that a unity government involving Fatah, which supports negotiations with Israel, will prompt at least some donors to renew aid and relieve a financial crisis.

The EU on Friday said it welcomed the formation of the unity government, the Associated Press reported from Brussels.

In other developments, Haniyeh joined a chorus of criticism over Pope Benedict XVI's comments Tuesday on Islam that many Muslims consider an attack on their religion.

"We strongly condemn the pope's offensive remarks about Islam, which totally contradict the true nature of Islam and its shining history," he said. "The pope should reconsider his proclamations and stop attacking Islam, the religion of 1.5 billion people of the world."

Some Muslim Leaders Want Pope To Apologize (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

ROME, Sept. 15 — Pope Benedict XVI drew rising anger on Friday over comments he made Tuesday about Islam, as Muslim leaders around the world accused him of dividing religions and demanded an apology.

In Britain, Gaza, Iraq, Syria and Indonesia, Muslim leaders registered their protest. The Parliament in Pakistan passed a resolution against the pope's statements, and the government later summoned the Vatican envoy to express official displeasure. In Lebanon, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, the most senior Shiite cleric, demanded "a personal apology — not through his envoys."

And emotion spilled over in Turkey, which Benedict is scheduled to visit in November, as a top official in the Islamic-rooted ruling party said that the pope was "going down in history in the same category as leaders such as Hitler and Mussolini."

"He has a dark mentality that comes from the darkness of the Middle Ages," the official, Salih Kapusuz, deputy leader of Turkey's governing party, was quoted as saying on the state-owned Anatolia news agency. "It looks like an effort to revive the mentality of the Crusades."

Reaction to the pope's remarks — in which he quoted a description of Islam in the 14th century as "evil and inhuman" — has presented Benedict with the first full-blown crisis of his papacy.

Some in Turkey have questioned whether he should make the visit, the pope's first to a Muslim country. Many Muslims are also comparing his comments to the unflattering cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad that had stoked deep anger among Muslims earlier this year.

DOJ_NMG_0064334

The Vatican did not release an official comment on Friday. On Thursday, as Benedict returned from a six-day trip to Germany, his chief spokesman said that he had not intended to "offend the sensibility of Muslim believers."

Other top Vatican officials also sought to tamp down the anger.

"I am convinced the pope did not mean to assume a position against Islam," a top German cardinal, Walter Kasper, told the Italian daily newspaper La Repubblica.

Archbishop Dominique Mamberti, a French prelate with experience in the Islamic world, was appointed on Friday as the Vatican's new foreign minister. He told Agence France-Press: "The dialogue between different civilizations, cultures and religions — which nobody can hide from — will be one of the great questions which I will tackle in my new job."

In a major speech on Tuesday at Regensburg University, Benedict delivered a long, scholarly address on reason and faith in the West. But he began his speech by recounting a conversation on the truths of Christianity and Islam that took place between a 14th-century Byzantine Christian emperor, Manuel II Paleologus, and a Persian scholar.

"The emperor comes to speak about the issue of jihad, holy war," the pope said.

"He said, I quote, 'Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached,' " the pope said.

While making clear that he was quoting someone else, Benedict did not say whether he agreed or not. He also briefly discussed the Islamic concept of jihad, which he defined as "holy war," and said that violence in the name of religion is contrary to God's nature and to reason.

He also suggested reason as the basis for "that genuine dialogue of cultures and religions so urgently needed today."

Benedict, a respected theologian, is said to write many speeches himself, and some in the Italian news media speculated that the Vatican would be forced into a more stringent review of his statements.

The controversy came as a new Vatican hierarchy was being put in place. In addition to appointing a foreign minister, the pope installed as secretary of state — the highest position after the pope — Cardinal Tarcisco Bertone, 71, an Italian and longtime colleague of the pope's.

Remarks By Pope Prompt Muslim Outrage, Protests (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

BEIRUT, Sept. 15 -- A medieval reference in an academic lecture by Pope Benedict XVI unleashed a wave of denunciations, outrage and frustration across the Muslim world Friday, with officials in Turkey and Pakistan condemning the pontiff, Islamic activist groups organizing protests and a leading religious figure in Lebanon demanding that he personally apologize.

The reception to the pope's speech in Germany on Tuesday was a reminder of the precarious, suspicious state of affairs between a West that often views Islam as a faith in need of reform and a Muslim world that feels besieged in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Some of the criticism evoked the Crusades; others accused the Vatican of joining a Western-led war on Islam.

"We ask him to offer a personal apology -- not through his officials -- to Muslims for this false reading" of Islam, said Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, one of the world's leading Shiite Muslim clerics, who lives in Beirut.

The pope began his lecture at the University of Regensburg by quoting from a 14th-century dialogue between the Byzantine emperor, Manuel II Paleologos, and a Persian scholar. In a passage on the concept of holy war, Benedict recited a passage of what he called "startling brusqueness," in which Manuel questioned the teachings of Islam's prophet, Muhammad.

"Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached," Benedict quoted the emperor as saying.

The pope neither explicitly endorsed nor denounced the emperor's words, but rather used them as a preface to a discussion of faith and reason. The Vatican said the pope did not intend the remarks to be offensive to Muslims.

"It was certainly not the intention of the Holy Father to undertake a comprehensive study of the jihad and of Muslim ideas on the subject, still less to offend the sensibilities of Muslim faithful," Vatican spokesman Federico Lombardi told Vatican Radio.

But the reaction was quick, and though it was largely peaceful, it evoked the storm of violent protests that erupted in most Muslim countries after a Danish newspaper published a series of cartoons a year ago that lampooned Muhammad. In some ways, the denunciations seemed even more pronounced, given the pope's stature and authority over the world's 1.1 billion Roman Catholics.

Pakistan's parliament adopted a resolution Friday condemning the pope for what it called derogatory comments and seeking an apology. The Foreign Ministry summoned the Vatican's ambassador to express regret over Benedict's remarks.

In Turkey, where Benedict planned to visit in November in his first trip as pope to a Muslim country, the deputy leader of Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's Islamic-inspired party called Benedict's remarks the result of ignorance or a provocation.

"He has a dark mentality that comes from the darkness of the Middle Ages. He is a poor thing that has not benefited from the spirit of reform in the Christian world," Salih Kapusuz told state media. "It looks like an effort to revive the mentality of the Crusades."

Even the country's secularist opposition party demanded the pope apologize before his visit to Turkey, which has long been one of the least ostensibly religious of Muslim countries. News agencies reported that another party led a demonstration outside the largest mosque in the capital, Ankara, and about 50 people placed a black wreath outside the Vatican's diplomatic mission.

About 100 people protested in Egypt, the Arab world's most populous country, where demonstrators chanted, "Oh Crusaders, oh cowards! Down with the pope!" Mohammed Sayed Tantawi, the sheik of al-Azhar University, a leading seat of religious scholarship, said the pope's remarks indicated "clear ignorance of Islam," and the Muslim Brotherhood, one of the Middle East's largest and oldest Islamic groups, called on Muslim governments to sever relations with the Vatican if the pope does not apologize.

Thousands of Palestinians protested Friday night in Gaza City after Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, who belongs to the Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, said the pope's lecture had offended Muslims everywhere.

"This is another Crusader war against the Arab and Muslim world," Ismail Radwan, a Hamas official, told the crowd.

The criticism of the pope's remarks was often twofold: at the reference of the prophet Muhammad's legacy as "evil and inhuman" and at the idea that Islam was spread by the sword. Much of the conversion that followed the prophet's life in the 7th century was a gradual, centuries-long process that left a remarkable degree of diversity -- albeit faded -- in parts of the Muslim world.

In Iraq, where religious differences have fueled much of the country's crippling violence, a Catholic representative warned that the pope's remarks were being distorted to "sow a crisis of chaos and enmity between the one family of Christians and Muslims."

A statement posted at mosques in Anbar province, a center of the insurgency, warned that a previously unknown group would begin killing Iraqi Christians in three days unless the pope apologized. In Basra, a bomb exploded at the Assyrian Catholic Church on Friday evening, causing damage but no injuries, according to a church leader who said the attack stemmed from the pope's remarks.

Across Iraq's sectarian Sunni-Shiite Muslim divide, clerics called the remarks another campaign against Islam. "Last year, and in the same month, the Danish cartoons assaulted Islam," Sheik Salah al-Ubaidi, a representative of Moqtada al-Sadr's radical Shiite movement, said in the group's stronghold of Kufa.

Muslim Anger Over Papal Comments Grows (AP)

Pakistan's legislature unanimously condemned Pope Benedict XVI. Lebanon's top Shiite cleric demanded an apology. And in Turkey, the ruling party likened the pontiff to Hitler and Mussolini and accused him of reviving the mentality of the Crusades.

Across the Islamic world Friday, Benedict's remarks on Islam and jihad in a speech in Germany unleashed a torrent of rage that many fear could burst into violent protests like those that followed publication of caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad.

By citing an obscure Medieval text that characterizes some of the teachings of Islam's founder as "evil and inhuman," Benedict inflamed Muslim passions and aggravated fears of a new outbreak of anti-Western protests.

The last outpouring of Islamic anger at the West came in February over the prophet cartoons first published in a Danish newspaper. The drawings sparked protests — some of them deadly — in almost every Muslim nation in the world.

Some experts said the perceived provocation by the spiritual leader of more than a billion Roman Catholics could leave even deeper scars.

"The declarations from the pope are more dangerous than the cartoons, because they come from the most important Christian authority in the world — the cartoons just came from an artist," said Diaa Rashwan, an analyst in Cairo, Egypt, who studies Islamic militancy.

On Friday, Pakistan's parliament adopted a resolution condemning Benedict for making what it called "derogatory" comments about Islam, and seeking an apology. Hours later, the Pakistani Foreign Ministry summoned the Vatican's ambassador to express regret over the pope's remarks Tuesday.

Notably, the strongest denunciations came from Turkey — a moderate democracy seeking European Union membership where Benedict is scheduled to visit in November as his first trip as pope to a Muslim country.

Salih Kapusuz, deputy leader of Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's Islamic-rooted party, said Benedict's remarks were either "the result of pitiful ignorance" about Islam and its prophet or, worse, a deliberate distortion.

"He has a dark mentality that comes from the darkness of the Middle Ages. He is a poor thing that has not benefited from the spirit of reform in the Christian world," Kapusuz told Turkish state media. "It looks like an effort to revive the mentality of the Crusades."

"Benedict, the author of such unfortunate and insolent remarks, is going down in history for his words," Kapusuz added. "He is going down in history in the same category as leaders such as Hitler and Mussolini."

Even Turkey's staunchly pro-secular opposition party demanded the pope apologize before his visit. Another party led a demonstration outside Ankara's largest mosque, and a group of about 50 people placed a black wreath outside the Vatican's diplomatic mission.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said the pope should explain and "tell us what exactly did he mean. ... It can't just be left like that."

Vatican spokesman Federico Lombardi has tried to defuse anger, saying the pope did not intend to offend Muslim sensibilities and insisting Benedict respects Islam. In Pakistan, the Vatican envoy voiced regret at "the hurt caused to Muslims."

But Muslim leaders said outreach efforts by papal emissaries were not enough.

"We do not accept the apology through Vatican channels ... and ask him (Benedict) to offer a personal apology — not through his officials," Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, Lebanon's most senior Shiite cleric, told worshippers in Beirut.

Rashwan, the analyst, feared the official condemnations could be followed by widespread popular protests. Already there had been scattered demonstrations in several Muslim countries.

"What we have right now are public reactions to the pope's comments from political and religious figures, but I'm not optimistic concerning the reaction from the general public, especially since we have no correction from the Vatican," Rashwan said.

About 2,000 Palestinians angrily protested Friday night in Gaza City. Earlier, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of the Islamic militant group Hamas, said the pope had offended Muslims everywhere.

In Cairo, some 100 demonstrators stood outside the al-Azhar mosque chanting: "Oh Crusaders, oh cowards! Down with the pope!"

The pope quoted from a book recounting a conversation between 14th-century Byzantine Christian Emperor Manuel Paleologos II and a Persian scholar on the truths of Christianity and Islam.

"The emperor comes to speak about the issue of jihad, holy war," Benedict said. "He said, I quote, 'Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached.'"

DOJ_NMG_0064337

The pope did not explicitly agree with nor repudiate the comment.

In Britain, the head of the Muslim Council, a body representing 400 Muslim groups, said the emperor's views quoted by the pope were bigoted.

"One would expect a religious leader such as the pope to act and speak with responsibility and repudiate the Byzantine emperor's views in the interests of truth and harmonious relations between the followers of Islam and Catholicism," said Muhammad Abdul Bari, the council's secretary-general.

Many Muslims accused Benedict of seeking to promote Judeo-Christian dominance over Islam.

Even Iraq's often divided Shiite and Sunni Arabs found unity in their anger over the remarks, with clerics from both communities criticizing Benedict.

"The pope and Vatican proved to be Zionists and that they are far from Christianity, which does not differ from Islam. Both religions call for forgiveness, love and brotherhood," Shiite cleric Sheik Abdul-Kareem al-Ghazi said during a sermon in Iraq's second-largest city, Basra.

Few in Turkey, especially, failed to pick up on Benedict's reference to Istanbul as Constantinople — the city's name more than 500 years ago — before it was conquered by Muslim Ottoman Turks.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel defended the German-born pope, saying his message had been misunderstood.

"It is an invitation to dialogue between religions and the pope has explicitly urged this dialogue, which I also endorse and see as urgently necessary," she said Friday. "What Benedict XVI makes clear is a decisive and uncompromising rejection of any use of violence in the name of religion."

In the United States, a Muslim group, the Council for American-Islamic Relations, asked for a meeting with a Vatican representative and urged more efforts at improving understanding between Muslims and Catholics.

"The proper response to the pope's inaccurate and divisive remarks is for Muslims and Catholics worldwide to increase dialogue and outreach efforts aimed at building better relations between Christianity and Islam," the group said.

Muslim States Denounce Pope Over Remarks (WT/AP)

By Benjamin Harvey

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

ISTANBUL -- Pakistan's legislature unanimously condemned Pope Benedict XVI. Lebanon's top Shi'ite cleric demanded an apology. And in Turkey, the ruling party likened the pontiff to Hitler and Mussolini and accused him of reviving the mentality of the Crusades.

Across the Islamic world yesterday, Benedict's remarks on Islam and jihad in a speech in Germany unleashed a torrent of rage that united Shi'ites and Sunnis and threatened to burst into violent protests like those that followed publication of caricatures of the prophet Muhammad.

The pope did not condemn modern-day Islam. But by citing an obscure medieval text that criticizes teachings of Islam's founder for advocating a faith "spread by the sword," Benedict inflamed Muslim passions and aggravated fears of a new outbreak of anti-West protests.

Muslims Demand Apology From Pope (FT)

By Ft Reporters

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Religious and political leaders across the Muslim world on Friday demanded that Pope Benedict XVI apologise for a speech he made this week indirectly criticising the Islamic concept of “holy war.” Muslim clerics said the speech reflected ignorance of Islam and was insulting to Mohammed.

The latest flare-up of tensions between Christian and Muslim faiths has raised fears in the Vatican about the pope’s safety and cast further doubts over his plans to visit mainly Muslim Turkey in November. The proposed trip had already stirred controversy because of the Pope’s public opposition to Turkey’s ambitions to join the European Union.

Ali Bardakoglu, Turkey’s director of religious affairs, said the Pope’s most recent speech was “an extraordinarily worrying, saddening and unfortunate statement.” He added: “Biased and hostile assessments of Islam and the Prophet Mohammed are common in the western world.”

“It looks like an effort to revive the mentality of the Crusades,” said Salih Kapusuz, a senior figure in the ruling Justice and Development party, which has its roots in political Islam.

The Pope made his controversial remarks in a speech on Tuesday evening at Regensburg university, where he was a theology professor in the late 1960s. The leader of the Catholic church quoted from a book that recounted a conversation between 14th century Byzantine Christian Emperor Manuel Paleologos II and a Persian scholar on the truths of Christianity and Islam. “The emperor comes to speak about the issue of jihad, holy war,” the Pope said. “He said, I quote: ‘Show me just what Mohammed brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

According to the text of the speech, the Pope did not explicitly distance himself from the remarks, but noted positively that the emperor as "erudite" and the unnamed scholar as "educated".

Elsewhere in the 30-minute speech, which was greeted with a standing ovation, he condemned violence, arguing "violence is incompatible with the nature of God and the nature of the soul." Throughout his six-day trip to Germany the Pope had stressed the need for a closer dialogue between the Christian and Muslim faiths.

A Vatican spokesman said the Catholic leader had not intended to provide "an in-depth study of jihad and Muslim thinking" but had hoped to "cultivate an attitude of respect and dialogue toward other religions and cultures".

"The Pope's words are being extrapolated and disconnected from the context in which he said them and then used for ulterior purposes," said Monsignor Luigi Padovese Apostolic Vicar for Anatolia.

Theologians noted that the highly academic speech was focused not on Islam but on the relationship between reason and faith in the Christian church. Islamic scholars said the Pope should have been more aware that, even with this focus, he needed to present a more differentiated view of Islam.

Abel Theodor Khoury, a Germany-based Islam professor, from whose book the Pope took the controversial passage, said on Fridayday: "I would have wished for a one or two words of differentiation (in the speech). Two or three lines would have been very effective."

Edmund Stoiber, conservative state premier of Bavaria, on Friday defended the Pope, arguing that the latter's "clear rejection of religiously motivated violence should be taken seriously around the world."

At Friday prayers, Muslim clerics in Pakistan, Lebanon, Egypt and Iran and elsewhere denounced the Pope's comments. The latest controversy comes six months after Muslim protests against a Danish newspaper that published cartoons of Mohammed.

The Pope's Words (NYT)

There is more than enough religious anger in the world. So it is particularly disturbing that Pope Benedict XVI has insulted Muslims, quoting a 14th-century description of Islam as "evil and inhuman."

In the most provocative part of a speech this week on "faith and reason," the pontiff recounted a conversation between an "erudite" Byzantine Christian emperor and a "learned" Muslim Persian circa 1391. The pope quoted the emperor saying, "Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

Muslim leaders the world over have demanded apologies and threatened to recall their ambassadors from the Vatican, warning that the pope's words dangerously reinforce a false and biased view of Islam. For many Muslims, holy war — jihad — is a spiritual struggle, and not a call to violence. And they denounce its perversion by extremists, who use jihad to justify murder and terrorism.

The Vatican issued a statement saying that Benedict meant no offense and in fact desired dialogue. But this is not the first time the pope has fomented discord between Christians and Muslims.

In 2004 when he was still the Vatican's top theologian, he spoke out against Turkey's joining the European Union, because Turkey, as a Muslim country was "in permanent contrast to Europe."

A doctrinal conservative, his greatest fear appears to be the loss of a uniform Catholic identity, not exactly the best jumping-off point for tolerance or interfaith dialogue.

The world listens carefully to the words of any pope. And it is tragic and dangerous when one sows pain, either deliberately or carelessly. He needs to offer a deep and persuasive apology, demonstrating that words can also heal.

Raúl Castro Speaks Out Against U.S. At Summit Talks (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 15 — Raúl Castro, who is standing in as Cuba's leader while his brother, Fidel, recuperates from surgery, railed at the United States during a summit meeting in Havana of nonaligned nations on Friday, urging them to unite against "unacceptable acts of aggression essentially motivated by insatiable appetite for strategic resources."

Mr. Castro's first public speech since taking power in July was just as stridently anti-Washington as those offered by his elder brother. He spoke of the Bush administration's "irrational pretensions for world dominance" and called "absurd" its aggressive military spending now that the cold war is over.

"With regard to international relations, we are not the decisive force that we could be," Mr. Castro, 75, told members of the 118-member group of developing nations. "The Non-Aligned Movement now has to wage courageous battles against unilateralism, double standards and the impunity granted to those in power, for a fairer and more equal international order."

The United States declined observer status at the summit meeting. In Miami, however, the Bush administration's top Cuban-American official, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, delivered his own rebuke to Cuba's government.

Condemning repression on the island and calling Raúl Castro "simply another military dictator," Mr. Gutierrez called on Cuba to hold a referendum on its future leadership, a proposal that the Communist government would surely dismiss.

"Why not ask the people?" Mr. Gutierrez said at conference on Latin America's economic future, which attracted leaders from throughout the region. "Let the Cuban people speak. Let the Cuban people determine their own destiny."

Noticeably absent from the fray in Havana was Fidel Castro, 80, who continued his recuperation. Cuban newspaper photographs showed him clad in pajamas while meeting with Secretary General Kofi Annan of the United Nations, and President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela.

"Despite the rigor and will with which he pursues his treatment and physical therapy, the doctors have insisted that he continue to rest," Felipe Pérez Roque, Cuba's foreign minister, told reporters on Friday.

The Non-Aligned Movement began during the cold war, when many nations were firmly allied with either the United States or the Soviet Union. The group has lived on, and now has 118 members that see themselves as the voice for the developing world.

U.S. Proposes Cubans Vote On Raul Castro (APY)

By Jessica Gresko

AP, September 16, 2006

The Bush administration proposed Friday that Cubans hold a referendum to decide if they want to be ruled by Raul Castro, who is acting leader of the communist nation while brother Fidel recovers from surgery.

Fidel Castro has long fiercely resisted any attempts by the U.S. to interfere with his government, and Cuba is highly unlikely to accept the proposal, announced in Florida by U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez.

"I would say to the Cuban regime, 'why not ask the people?'" Gutierrez said at The Miami Herald's Americas Conference. "Why would a real leader be so insecure about giving his people a voice?"

Gutierrez aides said the administration wanted the Organization of American States to organize the referendum. OAS officials had no immediate comment. Cuba has been excluded from participating in the group since the early 1960s, after Castro took power.

Castro handed over power temporarily on July 31 because of his intestinal surgery. The government has treated the exact illness as a state secret, although Castro has been shown this week in pictures talking to visiting leaders in Cuba for a Nonaligned Summit.

Gutierrez, who was born in Cuba, said a referendum is not a "U.S.-only idea" but one many countries around the world support.

He cited Chile as an example of a country that rejected a military dictatorship and showed "what can happen under freedom and democracy."

"They were asked a simple yes or no to dictatorship, very simple, and the people said 'no,'" Gutierrez said.

Cuba Steers Non-aligned Nations Against US (FT)

By Marc Frank And Agencies In Havana

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Delegations from the Non-Aligned Movement on Friday began negotiations over a final document sharply critical of Israel and supportive of Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Cuba – the host country of the movement's 14th summit – and its close ally Venezuela sought to steer the group towards more a more radical anti-US line.

Meeting in Havana, the summit has also allowed Cuba to advertise the recovery of President Fidel Castro, who underwent stomach surgery for intestinal bleeding at the end of July, and has served to highlight Cuba's strengthening ties with Venezuela under its controversial president, Hugo Chávez.

With large numbers of international journalists in Cuba to cover the event, the authorities have streamed pictures and video from the secret clinic where an apparently jovial Mr Castro is recovering, well enough to work on a book of interviews entitled One Hundred Hours with Fidel and hold a stream of meetings with conference participants.

Although Mr Castro was on Friday not expected to make a formal appearance it has been claimed that he has orchestrated events from behind the scenes. Raúl Castro, his 75-year old brother, who temporarily took over as head of state last month, hosted Friday's opening session.

"When Castro first announced his illness it appeared that hosting the NAM summit would pose an unwanted task at an inconvenient moment. Saturday, with Castro recuperating and Cuba playing host to hundreds of influential well-wishers from across the world, top Cuban leaders now think that the summit was exquisitely timed after all," said Dan Erikson, Caribbean expert at the Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington.

Mr Chávez, who will host a visit to Caracas by the Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad on Sunday, described the summit as the most important event in recent years "because it takes place when the US empire is experiencing decline.

"Nobody can deny this; it is visible. It will end up being as Mao Zedong said: a paper tiger."

Many observers, however, believe it will be impossible to link the movement, formed in 1961 by developing countries anxious to define themselves as independent equally of the Soviet Union and of the US, to such a radical geopolitical agenda.

"The NAM is a political forum but not a movement, because its members do not act as a bloc," said Phil Peters, vice-president of the Virginia-based Lexington Institute policy group. "Regardless of the resolutions passed, these countries will follow their own interests and make their own coalitions on issues such as trade, nonproliferation, and terrorism."

However, Venezuela was also using the summit to lobby for votes to win a seat on the United Nations' Security Council in the face of US opposition, and may have more success in that area.

"The Arab League says yes, the US says no, almost all of Africa says yes, the US says no, Russia says yes, the US says no, China says yes, now that's already a big victory, let's just wait for the results," Mr Chávez said late on Thursday.

Developing-country Leaders Meet In Havana Without Ailing Castro (AFP-Y)

By Patrick Moser

AFP, September 16, 2006

Developing-world leaders, including virulent US foes, have met at a Havana summit without Cuba's communist strongman Fidel Castro, whose convalescence kept him away from the spotlight he cherishes.

"Doctors insisted that he continues his rest," Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said at the opening of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) summit, adding that Castro's brother Raul would represent Cuba at the gathering.

Raul Castro, 75, officially heads Cuba while his bearded sibling recovers from gastrointestinal surgery he underwent in July. "Once he is fully capable of resuming his duties, Fidel will be the chairman of the Non-Aligned Movement," Perez Roque said.

Among the prominent leaders speaking at the two-day summit was Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who insisted Tehran's controversial atomic program had strictly peaceful objectives, and claimed the United States was the real nuclear threat.

"Why should people live under the nuclear threat of the United States?" he asked at the summit of the 118-member NAM.

"What is the UN Security Council waiting for to react to those threats?"

DOJ_NMG_0064342

He urged his counterparts to help "counter attempts to prevent Iran from developing its peaceful nuclear activity." Washington is pushing for sanctions to force Tehran to stop producing enriched uranium, which can be used both for nuclear power and for atomic weapons.

Raul Castro, and Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez, also delivered blistering condemnations of the United States, while Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh called for "moderation, harmony and reason."

Singh also urged NAM leaders to make a priority of countering terrorism.

"If NAM is to be relevant in today's circumstances, it cannot afford to equivocate on the subject of terrorism," he said.

Singh planned to hold talks on the sidelines of the summit with Pakistani President Pervez Musharaf, who on Friday said the two countries had a "historic opportunity" to restart negotiations on the Kashmir dispute.

"Leaders who cannot grasp fleeting opportunity are no leaders," Musharaf said.

Talks over the Himalayan region, divided between the two countries but claimed in its entirety by both, have been stalled since July, when 183 people were killed in bomb attacks in Mumbai.

New Delhi had pointed the finger at Islamabad and a Pakistan-backed Islamic rebel group for the blasts.

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, an invited guest at the summit, urged NAM leaders to respect human rights and prevent crimes against humanity.

The movement includes several states that face harsh criticism for their human rights records, including North Korea, Zimbabwe and Belarus.

"We need governments of the South to fulfill their obligations to their people at home ... Ending suppression of opposition groups and the media. Taking serious and sincere measures against corruption," Annan told the leaders.

He said governments also had a duty to "protect populations from genocide, warcrimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity."

The summit was due to conclude on Saturday with the adoption of a draft statement fine-tuned during four days of preparatory meetings.

The document statement calls for a reform of the UN Security Council and stresses the need for increased cooperation among developing countries in order to counter overwhelming US influence. It also condemns what it terms Israel's "unlawful" policies in the Palestinian territories and its recent military intervention in Lebanon.

Several of the leaders paid tribute to Fidel Castro for his historic role in the NAM, a movement created at the height of the Cold War.

The 80-year-old communist leader met some of the dignitaries over the past days, and Cuban media showed pictures of a pajama-clad Castro chatting with Chavez in a hospital-like room and, in a separate meeting, with Annan.

Raul Castro insisted his brother was keeping close tabs on the summit. "He has listened intently to the statements and the debate," he said.

Raul Slams U.S. As Non-Aligned Summit Chairman (WT/AP)

By Vanessa Arrington

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

HAVANA -- Raul Castro stood in for ailing brother Fidel yesterday as Cuba took over the leadership of the Non-Aligned Movement, but a top official didn't rule out the possibility the recovering revolutionary might still appear at the meeting.

After acknowledging his brother's illness, Raul unleashed a stream of anti-American rhetoric in his inaugural speech, saying the world today is shaped by the United States' "irrational pretensions for world dominance."

"When there no longer is a Cold War, the United States spends $1 billion a year in weapons and soldiers and it squanders a similar amount in commercial publicity," he said. "To think that a social and economic order that has proven unsustainable could be maintained by force is simply an absurd idea."

Raul earlier accepted Cuba's three-year chairmanship of the Non-Aligned Movement to a round of applause by leaders from two-thirds of the world's nations, saying "Comrade Fidel has asked that I transmit to you his most cordial greetings."

But while Fidel is under doctors' orders not to preside at the summit, the iconic leader could make an appearance, Cuba's foreign minister told the assembly.

"Despite the rigor and will with which he pursues his treatment and physical therapy, the doctors have insisted that he continue to rest," Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said. "His health improves continually and his convalescence is satisfactory."

Many are wondering whether the 80-year-old Fidel will be able to guide the group formed during the Cold War in its search for relevance in this era of globalization.

And in the United States, the Bush administration has tried to hasten the end of the Castro brothers' rule. Yesterday, it proposed that Cubans hold a referendum to decide if they want to be ruled by Raul -- a suggestion certain to be rejected by the island's communist leadership. There was no immediate mention of the U.S. proposal at the summit.

Fidel temporarily ceded Cuba's leadership to his 75-year-old brother and a handful of other top officials after emergency intestinal surgery in July. He's remained out of sight this week, appearing only in photos and video in state press and television, wearing pajamas in meetings with his close friend Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

Mr. Chavez, who like Fidel is famous for giving long speeches, spoke well beyond his allotted time, saying that because the ailing Mr. Castro wasn't there, he would take that liberty.

It was the second such statement in as many days by Mr. Chavez, who has moved forcefully to assert himself as an heir to the ailing Cuban leader. "Homeland or death, we will overcome," he thundered, echoing Fidel's favorite slogan.

Mr. Chavez also upstaged Raul at a side meeting of the "Group of 15" developing nations while pledging Venezuela's support for Iran if it is invaded because of its nuclear dispute with the U.N. Security Council.

"Iran is under threat; there are plans to invade Iran. Hopefully it won't happen, but we are with you," Mr. Chavez told Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

"Under any scenario, we are with you just like we are with Cuba," Mr. Chavez told Mr. Ahmadinejad. "If the United States invades Cuba, blood will run. ... We will not have our arms crossed while bombs are falling in Havana or they carry Raul off in a plane."

It was not clear what Mr. Chavez would do for Iran. He's previously vowed to cut off Venezuelan oil supplies to the United States if it invades Cuba.

Mr. Ahmadinejad told the assembly yesterday that "Cuba's fight for liberation from imperialism has been a source of inspiration for the world's peoples."

The Non-Aligned Movement was formed during the Cold War to establish a neutral third path in a world divided by allegiances to the United States and the Soviet Union. It now counts 118 members with the addition of Caribbean nations Haiti and St. Kitts this week.

U.S. Foes Meet At Nonaligned Summit (AP-Y)

By Anita Snow

AP, September 16, 2006

Cuba took over leadership of the Nonaligned Movement Friday, but with Fidel Castro too sick to promise an appearance, his younger brother and his close friend Hugo Chavez of Venezuela were left to mete out the anti-American invective.

The meeting hosted by Cuba brought together some of the staunchest U.S. foes - the presidents of Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe.

Cuba's Acting President Raul Castro, who was presiding over the meeting of more than 50 leaders, said the world today is shaped by irrational American desires for world dominance.

"When there no longer is a Cold War, the United States spends one billion dollars a year in weapons and soldiers and it squanders a similar amount in commercial publicity," he said. "To think that a social and economic order that has proven unsustainable could be maintained by force is simply an absurd idea."

DOJ_NMG_0064344

In the United States, President Bush's administration tried Friday to hasten the end of the Castro government, proposing that Cubans hold a referendum to decide if they want to be ruled by Raul Castro. The suggestion faced certain rejection by the island's communist leadership, but they did not immediately address it at the summit.

The big question was whether the 80-year-old Castro would be healthy enough to show up for the summit dinner, let alone guide the group during Cuba's three-year chairmanship. The ailing revolutionary leader was under doctors' orders not to preside over the summit, and he did not appear in a closed-circuit television feed showing leaders arriving for the meal Friday night.

Castro temporarily handed power to his 75-year-old brother and a handful of other top officials after emergency intestinal surgery in July. And while Cuban officials raise expectations of a return to power, Fidel has appeared only in photos and video in state media, wearing pajamas while meeting Venezuelan President Chavez and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

Raul Castro has settled into his new leadership role, giving several speeches calling for unity against U.S. policies. And Chavez, still campaigning for Venezuela's bid to join the U.N. Security Council, has repeatedly asserted himself as the natural heir to Castro, who remains a hero to leftists around the world.

"To be radical is not to be insane, it's to go to our roots. Let's go to our roots, let's be truly radical," Chavez told diplomats and leaders from two-thirds of the world's countries. He concluded by chanting "Patria o Muerte!" — "Fatherland or Death!" — a favored Castro rallying cry.

The 118-nation group gave Raul Castro a round of applause, and Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi expressed satisfaction that the movement "will once again be in Cuba's very capable hands."

"Cuba's fight for liberation from imperialism has been a source of inspiration for the world's peoples," Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told the assembly.

Zimbabwe's President Robert Mugabe also attended the summit. The Bush administration charges that Mugabe's authoritarian government is a serious violator of human rights.

Annan told the group the world has changed dramatically since Cuba last hosted the movement in Havana 27 years ago, and that developing nations have new responsibilities to promote democracy, protect human rights and develop civil societies.

"The collective mission of this movement is more relevant than ever," Annan said.

With next week's U.N. General Assembly session in New York looming, Chavez and Ahmadinejad called on Nonaligned nations to support Venezuela's Security Council bid and provide more balance at the U.N. Both said the veto power of the United States has made the council a toothless promoter of U.S. policy.

"The U.S. is turning the Security Council into a base for imposing its politics," Ahmadinejad complained, according to the official translation of his speech in Farsi. "Why should people live under the nuclear threat of the U.S.?"

Guatemalan Vice President Eduardo Stein told The Associated Press in an interview Friday that his country has secured 90 of 128 necessary votes, and denied that U.S. support for Guatemala's bid has made his country a "puppet" of Washington. Venezuela, however, is confident it will win the seat.

Guatemala has stressed its conciliatory foreign policy in the U.N. campaign, while Chavez has made it clear if chosen for the security council, Venezuela would support Iran in its high-stakes standoff over its enrichment of uranium.

On Thursday, Chavez pledged his country would stand with Iran if the Middle Eastern country is invaded, just as it has pledged to defend Cuba.

The Nonaligned Movement was formed during the Cold War to establish a neutral third path in a world divided by the United States and the Soviet Union. It now counts 118 members with the addition of Haiti and St. Kitts this week.

Indian PM Urges NAM Make Priorities Of Terror, Mideast (AFP-Y)

By Michael Langan

AFP, September 16, 2006

Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has urged Non-Aligned Movement leaders to take a conciliatory tone as they work to counter terrorism, and try to keep the Mideast peace process on track.

"If NAM is to be relevant in today's circumstances, it cannot afford to equivocate on the subject of terrorism," Singh told more than 55 leaders of state and government from the NAM's 118 developing-country member states.

DOJ_NMG_0064345

"A message must emanate from us that we are united in our desire to fight and eliminate the scourge of terrorism. We cannot allow the forces of intolerance and extremism to distract the world's attention from the vital concerns of our people -- the problems of poverty, ignorance and disease," Singh stressed.

At a summit that has been rife with sharp words on US policy Singh appealed for a new "inclusive globalization."

He and also argued that "as a group we have rejected extremes. We must spread the word of Gandhiji, the apostle of peace.

"Our voice must then be one of moderation, harmony and reason," Singh said. "If such is the voice of more than half of the people of the world, it will prevail."

The Indian premier also pressed for NAM members to work to bolster efforts to achieve peace in the Middle East.

"The emerging fault lines of the new ideological divide are nowhere more apparent today then in West Asia," Singh said.

"We have just been witness to a tragic and pointless war in Lebanon. It has only sharpened the sense of alienation and resentment brutalizing a country that had just begun to reclaim its heritage of inter-ethnic and inter-religious harmony after years of conflict," he said.

"I would recommend that we constitute a suitable high level group for West Asia. This group could undertake a sustained mission to promote understanding in the region and assist in the implementation of the agreed roadmap toward a comprehensive peace," he said.

On the energy front Singh also proposed a NAM working group on energy security which he said his country would be prepared to coordinate.

Singh argued that the United Nations should be at the forefront of progress in international relations.

"The United Nations played a creative and critical role in shaping the international agenda in the past," he said. "It has to do so again.

"Reforming the UN and revitalizing the General Assembly is a pressing imperative. The developing world must find its due representation among the permanent members of the Security Council," Singh said. They five permanent council members are the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China.

Singh also said he would work to launch a new NAM initiative on nuclear disarmament. "We would invite fellow members of NAM to join us in our efforts to achieve universal nuclear disarmament, and a world free of all nuclear weapons."

Nuclear powers India and Pakistan were expected to play a key role during the NAM's meeting of national leaders on Friday and Saturday.

Singh and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, who both arrived on Thursday, planned to meet on the sidelines of the summit in a bid to restart negotiations on the decades-old conflict over Kashmir, a Himalayan territory shared by the two countries but claimed in its entirety by both.

Financial Leaders Gather, A Bit Tensely (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

SINGAPORE, Sept. 15 — The world's finance ministers gathered Friday for their first annual meeting in East Asia since the region was gripped by an economic crisis in the 1990's, with their most urgent order of business being to overhaul the institutions that safeguard the global economy and help the poor.

As tropical rains drenched this busy and prosperous island nation and snarled its downtown traffic, thousands of economists and financial officials gathered in hotels and meeting halls for the annual meeting of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund in what appeared likely to be one of the most contentious sessions in years.

There was even tension between Western leaders and the government of Singapore, their host, over Singapore's last-minute denial of visas to some of the leaders of the "civil society" groups that were invited to participate in the meetings.

In years past, there have been sometimes violent protests at these sessions, focused on criticism that the rich countries of the world are indifferent to the poor and to the environment. Singapore has banned demonstrations and has kept the city in a tight security grip.

About 500 nongovernment groups are taking part in some of the sessions here and issuing reports critical of their hosts' policies. Paul D. Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, was especially embarrassed by the visa problem because he has repeatedly called on developing countries to open their political processes to dissent.

He said Friday that it was "unfortunate that the government of Singapore seemed not to be honoring" the agreement made to hold the meetings here. He also said that Singapore leaders told him they would review the cases of those denied entry.

As it turned out, the government relented at the last minute, allowing 22 of the 27 advocates who had been denied visas to enter the country.

Mostly, Mr. Wolfowitz and others sounded a note of optimism about the world economy by saluting the records of Singapore and other Asian countries in recent decades.

"Being here is symbolically important," Mr. Wolfowitz said Friday. "The success that we see around us in Singapore and more broadly in East Asia is a reminder that there is a path out of poverty, there is a path from poverty to prosperity."

But the success of prospering countries in East Asia, many of them reeling from financial crises only a decade ago, has also created tensions, with many of them demanding more of a voice in the institutions created after World War II to help avoid a repeat of the economic disasters of the 1930's.

Mr. Wolfowitz has also stirred a furor inside the World Bank with proposals to crack down on corruption in bank lending. Many leaders of donor countries in Europe have joined with some developing countries to resist the policy paper that Mr. Wolfowitz wants approved at meetings here.

The critics charge that Mr. Wolfowitz's anticorruption plan could lead to cutbacks in lending to the poorest countries.

But the main issue of contention is a proposal backed by the Bush administration to change the governance of the International Monetary Fund to give more votes to China and three other developing countries, and to give dozens of other countries more votes in a restructuring over the next two years.

Both American and I.M.F. officials say that while they were optimistic that it will be approved by 85 percent of the fund's board by Monday, the votes were not there yet. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. was due to arrive in Singapore Friday evening for a final round of lobbying with countries resisting the plan.

Several countries are skeptical of the proposal, among them Brazil, India, Argentina, Indonesia and Malaysia, who all fear that they could be left out as the fund is reconfigured. Many poor countries also fear that their influence will be reduced in the rush to reward countries that have prospered in recent years.

Some European countries are also resisting the proposal, concerned that they will be marginalized.

Rodrigo de Rato, the managing director of the International Monetary Fund, said he realized that "most industrialized countries in the world" will have to "restrain" themselves as other, newer economic powers like China are given more of a voice and as poor countries in Africa and elsewhere get additional voting rights themselves.

"There is a consensus that we need a new formula," Mr. de Rato told reporters Friday, but he suggested that it had not been translated into a precise long-term plan.

China, South Korea, Japan and other East Asian nations are sitting on huge dollar-denominated reserves flowing from their surpluses in trade with the United States. The American fear is that they will try to set up their own Asia-only fund to help bail out countries in the future.

The American fear of a fracturing of the International Monetary Fund is an echo of the administration's concern over the failure of the recent round of global trade talks, which collapsed over the summer in recriminations involving the United States, Europe and several developing countries.

All of these countries blamed one another for not lowering tariff barriers enough to jolt the talks toward success, and administration officials say plainly they cannot afford to have another debacle involving another global economic institution.

U.S., Allies Seek Currency Crackdown (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064347

SINGAPORE -- The U.S. and its major allies are working to give the International Monetary Fund greater power to crack down on countries that meddle with exchange rates to gain an edge in international trade.

At a series of meetings here this weekend, top financial officials from the Group of Seven major industrial nations are expected to press for new IMF rules that would make it easier for the global economic watchdog to brand a country for manipulating its exchange rate -- and, in theory, embarrass it into stopping.

The U.S.-led push comes at a time when the Bush administration faces enormous pressure from Congress, manufacturers and unions to confront China over its currency practices. Beijing, they argue, keeps the yuan artificially weak against the dollar, giving Chinese firms a huge competitive advantage over their American counterparts by making Chinese exports cheaper.

As a result, markets will likely parse every currency-related comment that the new U.S. Treasury secretary, Henry Paulson, utters both in Singapore and when he makes his first official visit to China next week. Mr. Paulson, a former chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. with long experience in China, has promised a patient approach to the Asian powerhouse, but has also said it is imperative that Beijing loosen its grip on the yuan.

Amid the controversy over China's currency practices, Timothy Adams, undersecretary of the U.S. Treasury for international affairs, says there is a "strong emerging consensus" among the big countries that it is time to rewrite the international rules of the road regarding exchange rates.

Those rules should establish, Mr. Adams says, "in a modern world, what do beggar-thy-neighbor policies look like? What is and is not acceptable behavior?"

Brazil, Egypt and some other developing nations, however, are resisting the effort by the G-7, whose members include the U.S., Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Canada and Japan. Developing countries see the initiative as an attempt to hand the IMF, which provides rescue loans to troubled countries and often demands austere economic policies in return, yet another stick with which to force its will on those too weak to resist.

MORE

• Issue Briefing:1 IMF and World Bank officials convene in Singapore this weekend. Some big changes are on the agenda.

"It's important for the IMF to exercise its mandate in an evenhanded manner, and not be influenced by one or two countries," says Khor Hoe Ee, assistant managing director for economics at the Monetary Authority of Singapore. "The IMF needs to engage the Asian region to get the rich diversity of views that could contribute to the multilateral surveillance issues."

Singapore, which itself regularly intervenes in the market for Singapore dollars to combat domestic inflation, is playing host to the IMF annual meetings.

For the past two years, the IMF has been pondering how to sharpen its monitoring of the exchange-rate practices of its 184 member nations. Mr. Adams, however, jump-started the process a year ago with a speech accusing the IMF of being "asleep at the wheel" when it comes to exchange rates.

Currently, the IMF follows a set of rules, originally drafted in 1977 following the 1973 collapse of the international gold standard and fixed-exchange-rate system. Those rules generally require the IMF to discern whether a country intends to cheat the system through its exchange rate. Among the warning signs the IMF is supposed to look for are official restrictions on capital flows and unsustainable government borrowing.

"If these are the only things you're looking at, you haven't got a very good handle on a country's foreign-exchange policy or whether it's manipulating" its currency, a senior IMF official says.

Under U.S. trade law, every six months the Treasury must issue a report identifying any country that manipulates its currency, using the IMF definition. Despite complaints about China's practices, the Bush administration has never listed it. The decisions have a large foreign-policy component, but Treasury officials have also blamed their decision on their inability to prove Beijing intends to manipulate the yuan.

Now IMF Managing Director Rodrigo de Rato is championing a plan that would define manipulation by looking at whether a country's actions leave its exchange rate out of whack with economic realities. The IMF would then identify offenders and exert public pressure for changes.

DOJ_NMG_0064348

Mr. Adams says the IMF is now on the right track and that he hopes that member governments at Sunday's IMF board meeting will offer at least general support for the idea of rewriting the old rules. The details would then be negotiated in coming months.

Germany Eyes Free-trade Zone To Rival China (FT)

By Bertrand Benoit In Berlin

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Spurred by concern about China's growing economic might, Germany is considering a plan for a free-trade zone between Europe and the US.

A senior aide to Angela Merkel said the chancellor was "interested" in promoting the idea as long as such a zone did not create "a fortress" but rather "a tool" to encourage free trade globally, "which she is persuaded is a condition of Germany's future prosperity".

Separately, on Friday, the US, Canada and the European Union complained to the World Trade Organisation about China's tariffs on car parts, raising the prospect of Beijing facing its first WTO dispute.

The three said they had lost patience with Beijing's refusal to further open the $19bn-a-year market.

News that the free trade zone, last pursued by Sir Leon Brittan, when European trade commissioner in 1998, is being debated in the German chancellery testifies to the rapprochement between Washington and Berlin since Ms Merkel's election last November.

This convergence of views was underlined this week when Wen Jiabao, Chinese premier, was politely chided by Ms Merkel for China's poor human rights record and recent restrictions on foreign news agencies, during an official visit to Berlin.

As German perceptions of China have grown more American, Washington's approach has shifted too. Speaking before his first trip to Beijing, Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, this week outlined a more balanced policy mixing traditional US criticism with praise for China's reforms.

Ms Merkel's aide said it was "far too early" to tell whether the project of a transatlantic free-trade zone would be part of Germany's priorities when it assumes the six-month presidency of the European Union and chairs the G8 group of leading industrial nations from January.

Two of Ms Merkel's most senior advisers, Jens Weidmann on economic policy and Christoph Heusgen on foreign policy, have warned her the initiative could be construed as protectionism.

Yet the notion has struck a chord with Ms Merkel, who has often called for "a global framework of rules" – minimum social, environmental and ethical standards – to prevent competition from sophisticated yet authoritarian low-wage economies eroding western achievements in these domains.

"The west needs to pull together," Gabor Steingart, Berlin bureau chief for the Spiegel weekly, told the FT yesterday. His book, World-War for Prosperity, a warning about the dangers of globalisation published this week, is credited with influencing the debate in the chancellery.

"What Nato did for the west under the cold war, Tafta (Transatlantic free-trade area) can do in the current battle."

Pressure Mounts For China To End Auto-Part Tariffs (WSJ)

By John W. Miller And Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

Teaming up with Europe and Canada, the Bush administration moved to turn up pressure on Beijing to end tariffs that critics say put foreign-made auto parts at a competitive disadvantage in China's domestic market.

The Western economic powers filed a request Friday for a formal investigation of the tariffs by the World Trade Organization, which is based in Geneva. The filing raised stakes significantly in the long-simmering dispute over auto parts, which first boiled over during the spring when the U.S. and European Union filed a preliminary complaint with the WTO on the issue. Canada later joined the case. That initial filing prompted a series of negotiations, but no progress was made toward diffusing tensions.

"China has demonstrated no willingness to remove its unfair charges," said U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab. "While we are open to settling this dispute, China's current stance leaves us no choice but to proceed with our WTO case."

At issue are complicated rules under which Beijing charges an average 25% tariff, instead of the usual 10%, on imported parts when a company making cars in China buys less than 40% of its components from local suppliers. The rules are problematic for auto makers with plants in China, such as General Motors Corp. and Volkswagen AG. Those companies all buy Chinese-made parts, but rely on some parts made outside of the country, exposing them to tariffs that ultimately raise the cost of their vehicles sold in China.

A GM spokesman said the company views Friday's filing as "a government-to-government action" and hopes for an "amicable and successful resolution."

The action reflects a tougher U.S. trade stance toward China, and comes a few days before Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson arrives in China, where he is expected to press complaints over China's currency practices. Critics say those practices distort trade flows and create unfair advantages for Chinese companies in the world market.

More broadly, the heightened tensions on auto parts reflects a dynamic that has helped stall the Doha Round of trade negotiations. In those talks, suspended during the summer, the U.S. and EU have pushed developing countries to lower barriers to trade in manufactured goods produced in the developed world. Developing countries, by large, have resisted those calls.

Friday's filing may lead to creation of an investigative panel as soon as next month. A Chinese official in Brussels told Dow Jones Newswires that "we will follow the legal proceedings to the end."

The U.S. exported $539.82 million in auto parts to China last year, a small part of China's estimated market at $19 billion. The EU says its auto-parts exports to China are valued at about €3 billion, or roughly $4 billion. Canada says it exports about $256 million annually in parts to China.

China Faces WTO Complaint Over Foreign-made Auto Parts (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab announced a trade action Friday that's designed to force China to open its fast-growing market to American-made auto parts.

In a conference call early Friday, Schwab said the United States, European Union and Canada together were lodging a complaint at the Geneva-based World Trade Organization about China's treatment of foreign-made auto parts.

It's the first high-profile trade complaint against China since the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative conducted a top-to-bottom review of bilateral trade earlier this year. It signals that the United States may begin taking a tougher stance on China, whose rapid economic growth is sending shock waves across the global economy.

With November congressional elections approaching, Schwab's help for the American auto industry carries political overtones in battleground states such as Ohio, Indiana and Michigan. Her announcement came as Ford - the world's third-largest carmaker - sought to cut another 10,000 jobs in the United States, Canada and Mexico by the end of 2008.

It also came days before Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson arrives in Beijing for meetings next week and as the Senate weighs trade sanctions against China for failing to liberalize its currency regime.

Her move sent China a good cop-bad cop message from the Bush administration, since Paulson, a former head of banking giant Goldman Sachs & Co., on Wednesday used his first speech on the international economy to call for patience with China. He said relations were "truly generational" and shouldn't suffer because of current disputes.

Schwab said her action had nothing to do with Paulson's trip, and she focused on defending U.S. jobs.

"In the U.S. alone, 700,000 workers produce over $200 billion in auto parts," Schwab said, noting that about a quarter of those products are exported. It's "not appropriate for our exports to be barred from that market, particularly in view of Chinese commitments to the WTO."

DOJ_NMG_0064350

World trade in auto parts exceeded $445 billion last year. U.S. makers exported about $700 million in auto parts to China last year, a fraction of the $55 billion in total American exports of auto parts. U.S. companies complain that the figure is low because China is trying to force them to manufacture in China.

"What they're doing in essence is, if a car produced in China has too many imported parts, then we're going to duty (tax) those parts the same as if it was a whole imported car," said Frank Vargo, the vice president-international affairs for the National Association of Manufacturers.

If a Chinese-made vehicle has more than a certain amount of imported auto parts, China levies a 25 percent duty on the imported parts to favor domestic producers.

"We negotiated a 10 percent rate, and that's what our companies deserve," Vargo said.

The dispute is really about China moving up the value chain, shifting from simple assembly and low-tech production to the kind of high-tech manufacturing done in the United States, Mexico and Canada.

U.S. companies complain that they're being strong-armed into manufacturing in China. For example, auto industry data suggest that about 60 percent of the auto-parts manufacturing in China is done through joint ventures with foreign firms.

"This is the tip of the iceberg. It's unfortunate that we're not bringing 10 of these cases instead of one," said Peter Morici, a business professor at the University of Maryland.

Some want the Bush administration to get tougher on China.

"Taking them to the WTO is being a little more than a doormat, but I don't think this signals a particularly new aggressive policy," said Clyde Prestowitz, a former Reagan administration trade official and the author of "Three Billion New Capitalists," a book that warns of an economic power shift to Asia.

Paulson signaled Wednesday that the administration will treat the rising Asian power as an equal and expects it to begin behaving like a developed - not a developing - nation.

"China deserves recognition for what it has become, but at the same time China must be more than a beneficiary of open markets," Paulson said. "As a global economic leader, China should accept its responsibility as a steward of the international system of open trade and investment."

China's Selection For Nuclear Job Is Expected Soon (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

BEIJING -- China will announce by year end which company has won a contract potentially worth $8 billion to build four nuclear-power plants, said a top U.S. energy official.

"They are getting very close to deciding which path they will go down," Assistant Secretary of Energy Karen Harbert said Friday in Beijing, a day after meeting with her Chinese counterparts.

"We hope we see an award of that bid in very short order. There's no indication of a date certain," she added. "But we certainly hope to see something by the end of this year at the very latest."

Pittsburg-based Westinghouse Electric Co. and France's state-owned Areva SA are considered the top contenders for the contract to build four 1,000-megawatt reactors, valued at $1 billion to $2 billion each. The reactors will use third-generation technology that differs from what is in place in most of the world's nuclear-power plants that use older, second-generation designs. Russia's AtomStroyExport is also bidding.

China plans to build as many as 32 nuclear reactors by 2020, in addition to the 10 already in use or under construction. The country aims to boost its nuclear-power generation capacity to 4%, or 40 gigawatts, of its overall generation capacity, from 1.5% currently, as part of plans to diversify its energy supply.

Industry observers had expected a decision on the contract as early as December 2005. But Chinese officials have said they needed more assurances about what they describe as untried technologies. Areva and Westinghouse say they have already proved the safety and efficiency of their new reactors.

Japanese electronics firm Toshiba Corp. is in the process of buying Westinghouse. The deal still needs to pass regulatory approval.

Ms. Harbert met Wednesday with Chen Deming and Zhang Guobao, vice chairmen of the National Development and Reform Commission, where they share the energy portfolio. Mr. Zhang is set to retire in coming months.

During the talks, the U.S. invited China to join a consortium of 10 nations working to develop a fourth-generation nuclear-power-plant design. "We believe it's very important for the world for China to be a part of this" Generation IV International Forum , Ms. Harbert said.

The U.S. sees nuclear power as an environmentally viable alternative to burning fossil fuels, which emit carbon dioxide and other gases associated with global warming and rising pollution rates.

Economic growth topping 10% has sent China scrambling for energy. The country is now the world's biggest consumer and producer of coal -- and the biggest emitter of sulfur dioxide, which causes acid rain, among other problems. China's growing wealth has also made it the world's second-biggest user of oil after the U.S.

The growing demand has brought the issue of energy security to the fore among China's policy planners and raised concerns among U.S. leaders fearful of competition for scarce resources.

"We want them to understand that energy is a global market. Energy security is not derived by ownership of oil assets but by building a variety of sources, a diversity of supply, and energy type," Ms. Harbert said.

Outsourcing: It's Been Good To Him (NYT)

By Saritha Rai

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

Azim H. Premji, 61, is chairman of Wipro, India's third-largest outsourcing firm, with $2.39 billion in revenue last year. Mr. Premji, whose 81.4 percent ownership stake makes him India's richest man, is known for his austere style, whether providing visitors recycled drinking water at the company's Bangalore headquarters or flying himself and his top executives in economy class.

He talked recently about outsourcing, competition and education. Following are excerpts:

Q. Has the furor over outsourcing cooled down?

A. The debate in the United States is significantly more balanced. But what is not getting adequate focus is that globalization is a two-way street. If the United States wants access to Chinese, Indian or Vietnamese markets, we must get access to theirs. U.S. protectionism is very subtle but it is very much there.

The important thing about outsourcing or global sourcing is that it becomes a very powerful tool to leverage talent, improve productivity and reduce work cycles. The West is not producing enough engineers. The United States will produce 75,000 engineers this year; they will produce more sports therapists than engineers. Germany, the great engineering power of Europe, will produce 35,000 engineers this year; they will produce more architects than engineers. Western companies want access to Indian talent, that is why they outsource, that is why they come to India to set up base.

Q. Wipro began as a company making cooking oil and is now the third-largest outsourcing firm in India, but you still make cooking oil?

A. Being in the consumer business helps us groom talent in areas like marketing, finance and logistics. We can benchmark our outsourcing business to our consumer business and its best practices. Plus, our consumer business is independent, profitable, growing at 25 percent annual growth rates and is now of a respectable size.

Q. In 1977, India's socialist government sent I.B.M. packing. Was that the turning point for Wipro's technology business?

A. Their leaving gave us a chance to build the business from the start and we also learned to have a high degree of sensitivity to the customer. I.B.M. was not really bringing their best technologies to India. They were dumping old machines in the country that had been thrown away in the rest of the world 10 years before. Now they have a vastly changed attitude and they are back with a frenzy.

Q. You came into managing the company recently, after several executives had brought your outsourcing business to a level of success. Do you enjoy being so hands-on?

A. We have transitioned; we have collapsed the corporate office into the business office and de-layered our structure. We have four presidents who run the four businesses; each of these businesses is under a billion dollars in revenue. We continue to see it working well.

Q. Now global consulting firms like I.B.M. and Accenture are your competitors and they are investing billions of dollars in India. Is that a threat to your business model?

A. The fact that I.B.M. and Accenture are cannibalizing our model is a rubber-stamp endorsement of the global delivery model. It legitimizes our business from the customer point of view. But in terms of the quality processes, business model changes and fulfilling employee career goals, our domestic competitors and we are two to three years ahead of global consultancy firms.

Q. Is finding talent an increasing challenge for firms like Wipro?

A. Talent is in short supply everywhere. At Wipro, we are training nonengineers to be engineers. We hired 2,500 of them last year and coach them on the job. Thus, we are supplementing engineering talent on a significant scale.

Q. You dropped out of graduate school at Stanford to take charge of Wipro when your father died in 1966, but you have since made education your cause. How has it become so important to you?

A. Because education is the fulcrum for an equitable society. A girl child who is even a little bit educated is more conscious of family planning, health care and, in turn, her children's own education. Thus, we are killing three birds with one stone. I am particularly interested in primary education because the state of affairs in primary education in this country is a cause for concern.

W.H.O. Supports Wider Use Of DDT Vs. Malaria (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — The World Health Organization on Friday forcefully endorsed wider use of the insecticide DDT across Africa to exterminate and repel the mosquitoes that cause malaria. The disease kills more than a million people a year, 800,000 of them young children in Africa.

Dr. Arata Kochi, who leads the group's global malaria program, unequivocally declared at a news conference on Friday that DDT was the most effective insecticide against malaria and that it posed no health risk when sprayed in small amounts on the inner walls of people's homes. Expanding its use is essential to reviving the flagging international campaign to control the disease, he said.

Dr. Kochi has powerful allies on DDT and, more broadly, on using insecticide sprays, in Congress and the Bush administration — an odd bedfellows coalition for an agency of the United Nations, which has often been at odds with the White House.

At the news conference, Adm. R. Timothy Ziemer, who leads President Bush's $1.2 billion malaria undertaking, stood at Dr. Kochi's side and described spraying with insecticides as a tool "that must be deployed as robustly and strategically as possible."

The health organization's news release quoted Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma.

"Finally, with the W.H.O.'s unambiguous leadership on the issue, we can put to rest the junk science and myths that have provided aid and comfort to the real enemy — mosquitoes," said the senator, a medical doctor.

Dr. Kochi said the most substantive change in the W.H.O.'s guidelines on the use of insecticides would extend the reach of the strategy. Until now, the agency had recommended indoor spraying of insecticides in areas of seasonal or episodic transmission of malaria, but it now also advocates it where continuous, intense transmission of the disease causes the most deaths.

Dr. Kochi's new policies and abrasive style have stirred the small world of malaria experts. Dr. Allan Schapira, a senior member of the W.H.O. malaria team who most recently oversaw its approach to insecticide spraying, resigned last week.

Reached Thursday on his cellphone, Dr. Schapira declined to comment on his reasons, except to say that they were professional. He did not return messages left Friday.

His successor, Pierre Guillet, a medical entomologist, said Dr. Schapira quit because he was uncomfortable with the new approach on insecticide spraying.

DOJ_NMG_0064353

There are fierce debates among experts over when it is best to use indoor spraying or mosquito nets impregnated with insecticides that last up to five years, though most agree that both spraying and nets are important tools.

Dr. Kochi said in an interview that half the professional staff of the W.H.O.'s malaria program has left "one way or the other" since he took over in October. He described Dr. Schapira as the "main brain" behind the past approach.

"He was professionally insulted by me," Dr. Kochi said.

In answer to a question, Dr. Kochi acknowledged that he had indeed told members of the staff in meetings that they were stupid. "They are very inward looking, and they do not communicate outside the malaria field," he said. "It's ridiculous."

Dr. Kochi earlier headed the W.H.O.'s tuberculosis campaign until he was forced out after his blunt manner alienated important partner organizations.

He has brought the same in-your-face approach to malaria. In January, he demanded that 18 drug companies — all named — stop selling some forms of a new malaria drug he believed could speed up drug resistance. If they did not comply, he threatened to try to disrupt sales of their other medicines.

In April, he accused the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, through which rich countries finance health campaigns, of ignoring W.H.O. rules that forbid treating malaria with herbal-based therapy alone — a charge that Dr. Bernard Nahlen, a senior adviser at the Global Fund, called "outlandish" on Friday.

There are now 17 African countries using at least some indoor spraying of insecticides to combat malaria. Only 10 of them use DDT — Eritrea, Madagascar, Ethiopia, Swaziland, South Africa, Mauritius, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Namibia and Zambia — the W.H.O. said. Too many countries in Africa have shied away from DDT, Dr. Kochi said, because of the nasty environmental reputation it earned in an earlier era when it was widely sprayed on crops — dangers that do not apply when spraying small amounts indoors.

DDT has carried a special stigma since the publication in 1962 of Rachel Carson's "Silent Spring," which helped set off the environmental movement in America by documenting how mass spraying of DDT entered the food chain, causing cancer and genetic damage and threatening to wipe out some bird species, including bald eagles.

The nonprofit group, Beyond Pesticides, distributed news releases on Friday opposing the W.H.O.'s new policy, saying a dependence on pesticides like DDT "causes greater long-tem problems than those that are being addressed in the short-term."

Dr. Kochi said some African countries had also been reluctant to use DDT because of fears that European countries would block food exports if crops were tainted by even minuscule amounts of DDT. In an interview, he called on leaders of the European Union to publicly encourage African countries to use DDT against malaria. Uganda, for one, has not used it because of what Dr. Kochi called "a bureaucratic standoff between the ministry of health and the ministry that oversees trade."

A spokesman for the European Union, Alain Bloedt, said Friday that it was too late in the afternoon to get a reply.

Dr. Kochi said he himself did not worry about whether he would lose his job if he took on too many influential players. Success will require many difficult changes, he said. "I don't want to fail."

WHO Backs DDT To Rid Malaria (WT)

By Tom Carter

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

The U.N. World Health Organization (WHO) reversed 30 years of policy yesterday, giving DDT a "clean bill of health" for controlling malaria, and it asked environmental groups to support limited use of the insecticide to save the lives of African babies.

"DDT presents no health risk when used properly indoors," said Dr. Arata Kochi, director of the WHO's malaria program. "Well-managed indoor spraying programs using DDT pose no harm to wildlife or humans."

Malaria rivals AIDS as the leading killer in sub-Saharan Africa. The mosquito-borne parasite kills an estimated 1 million people each year, mostly women and children under age 5.

"Help save African babies as you are helping save the environment," Dr. Kochi urged environmental groups at the National Press Club yesterday. "African babies ... need your help."

Swiss inventor Paul Hermann Muller won the Nobel Prize for medicine in 1948 for discovering DDT, or dichloro-diphenyl-trichloroethane. The insecticide helped wipe out malaria in the developing world.

DOJ_NMG_0064354

With the publication of Rachel Carson's 1962 anti-pesticide tome, "Silent Spring," DDT became the world's most vilified pesticide. It was banned from use in the United States in 1972 and abandoned in much of the world.

Dr. Kochi said WHO stopped promoting DDT in the early 1980s. As its use declined, mosquito populations soared, and malaria deaths in Africa and Asia skyrocketed.

An estimated 500 million become sick from malaria each year, making the disease one of the biggest obstacles to economic development in poor nations.

Yesterday, the WHO revised its recommendations and saidDDT is safe for humans and "remarkably effective" when a small amount of DDT is sprayed in the indoor walls of houses and huts.

The spraying, which lasts about six months, keeps mosquitos from entering a building and kills them if they do..

The WHO said DDT is a powerful weapon and should be used in combination with bed nets, better malaria medicines and other pesticides.

Environmental and anti-pesticide groups said safer and more effective alternatives to DDT were available such as pyrethrum and recent studies suggest DDT is harmful to humans, especially children.

"It is about time the international community focused on combating malaria, but this approach takes us exactly in the wrong direction," Dr. Paul Saoke, director of Physicians for Social Responsibility in Kenya, said in a statement released by the Pesticide Action Network, which opposes the reinstatement of DDT.

But those who campaigned for years to reinstate the use of DDT in the battle against malaria called yesterday's announcement a tremendous victory.

"We are finally in a position to provide the maximum amount of protection to poor people in poor countries," said Dr. Donald Roberts, professor of tropical medicine at Uniformed Services University of Health Sciences in Bethesda.

He said pyrethrum insecticides are more expensive and are far less effective over time. He called recent studies that imply DDT may impair development in breast feeding babies "bogus."

"It is a choice between a proven benefit, saving millions of lives, and a hypothetical, speculative and minor risk," he said.

Richard Tren, director of Africa Fighting Malaria, agreed.

"DDT is the most studied of man-made chemicals, and there is no evidence that it is unsafe for humans. Remember we are not spraying for fun. Malaria is a deadly disease," he said.

But the WHO specialist responsible for indoor spraying, or "vector control," said more study is required.

"We do not feel the product is toxic, but we want to take all necessary precautions," said Dr. Pierre Guillet.

According to U.S. Agency for International Development figures, the United States has spent about $25 million on indoor spraying in the 2005 and 2006, but very little of that money has gone to purchase DDT, which is currently made only in India and China.

Dr. Kochi said the new WHO recommendation met with some resistance within WHO, and since he took over the program, he has replaced about 50 percent of his professional staff.

"The malaria program was a failure and the WHO decided to go in a strong new direction," said Dr. Kochi. "We had to ask, does our staff have enough expertise and will they contribute in a meaningful way or not."

He said there is also resistance in some European countries to importing food and agricultural products from African nations that might begin using DDT.

Ugandan exporters recently came out against using DDT in their nation where malaria is epidemic, fearing the loss of millions in agricultural exports if Europe bans Ugandan products.

Dr. Kochi said those fears are unwarranted, noting that the European Commission supports the WHO recommendations.

In A Shift, Annan To Fill Out A U.N. Form Disclosing His Finances (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064355

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 15 — Secretary General Kofi Annan reversed course on Friday and said he would file a new financial disclosure form. Although completing the form is not mandatory in his case, his top aides considered it advisable to avoid misunderstanding.

"He has nothing to hide and does not want to cause embarrassment to the organization or to himself, so he has decided to voluntarily submit a financial disclosure form to the U.N. ethics office," Mark Malloch Brown, the deputy secretary general, said in an interview on Friday night.

Mr. Malloch Brown said that Mr. Annan had communicated the decision to him on the telephone from Havana, where he was attending the conference of nonaligned nations.

"His lawyers had clearly advised him that he both does not need to sign the form and indeed that he might be imprudent to do so because he would be tying the hands of his successor," Mr. Malloch Brown said. Mr. Annan leaves office on Dec. 31 after two five-year terms.

Mr. Annan's earlier decision not to supply the form emerged Wednesday in a news conference and exposed him to criticism that he was not living up to the standards of openness that he was demanding of others in the organization.

Filling out the form is required of most United Nations staff members under new procedures put into effect last year as part of the management overhaul that Mr. Annan has championed.

The push for management change was accelerated by findings of mismanagement and corruption revealed in the reports by Paul A. Volcker, the former Federal Reserve chairman, into abuses of the oil for food program.

Mr. Annan is technically not a staff member and therefore not covered by the rules. Asked at the news conference whether he had submitted the form, he said, "I honor all my obligations to the U.N., and I think that is as I've always done."

Two United Nations officials confirmed afterward that he had not filled out the form, despite advice to do so from aides including Mr. Malloch Brown, and the undersecretary general for management, Christopher B. Burnham.

The news proved to be particularly awkward since Stéphane Dujarric, his spokesman, told reporters in early May that although Mr. Annan was not obliged to comply, he would do so "to show an example, to be an example to the rest of the staff who need to fill it out."

At a briefing on Thursday held to present the first-ever consolidated financial and program report — a management advance that Mr. Annan said in a foreword would produce "greater transparency and clearer accountability" — Mr. Burnham commented indirectly on Mr. Annan's action.

"I believe that we all should fill out annual financial reports," he said, "and I encourage everyone to do so in a timely fashion."

Mr. Malloch Brown said that in the aftermath of the Volcker report, Mr. Annan "feels that his private and public finances have had the most public scrutiny of any secretary general."

Mr. Dujarric, reached in Havana, said, "The Volcker commission had an exhaustive look at his finances and clearly wrote in its report last September that the examination of his finances did not raise any concern."

The report, published Sept. 7, 2005, examined Mr. Annan's financial information for the period Jan. 1, 1998, through Dec. 31, 2004, and concluded that it did not "reveal any payments or transactions that appear suspicious or improper."

Japan's Charismatic Leader To Leave A Lasting Mark (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

TOKYO - During five dynamic years in office, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi revived Japan's economy, nurtured a new self-assurance in his countrymen and cemented uncommonly good relations with the United States.

Now that he's about to leave his job, commentators are casting him as one of the most influential leaders in Japan's postwar history.

With a take-no-prisoners political style and a penchant for sunglasses, long hair, direct language and Elvis, "cool Koizumi" has shaken the pillars of politics in Japan.

Will his nation ever be the same?

DOJ_NMG_0064356

On Wednesday, the long-ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) will pick Koizumi's successor as party leader, who will then become prime minister on Sept. 26. Koizumi, 64, will head off to retirement. He's changed Japan in ways that could be long lasting, but Shinzo Abe, the likely new prime minister, will face pressures to ease off some of the reforms.

Koizumi's biggest achievement "is that he instilled confidence in the Japanese nation," said Jesper Koll, chief economist at Merrill Lynch in Tokyo. "Japan is back, and people here again think, `We deserve to be the second most important economy in the world.'"

When Koizumi came to office in 2001, Koll said, "Japan was desperate. The banks were bankrupt. ... You had an economy that was on the brink of depression."

Five and a half years hence, the economy purrs, major corporations once again build factories, land prices edge upward, and Japan contemplates its resurgent role as the U.S. deputy sheriff in East Asia, where China's power is rising and North Korea is going nuclear.

Koizumi's departure will be felt in Washington. The Japanese leader bucked his nation's decades-old pacifist tradition and stretched long-unused military muscle by deploying troops to Iraq in 2004. Despite public opposition, the troops stayed until July of this year, offering symbolic support that the White House hugely valued.

Koizumi shared an unusually strong bond with President Bush, who took him in late June on a personal tour of Graceland, the Memphis home of Elvis Presley, an idol of Koizumi.

"His personal relationship with President Bush ... has been fundamental in bringing the U.S.-Japan alliance to its high-water mark," said Brad Glosserman of the Honolulu-based Pacific Forum of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Much of what made Koizumi unique, though, involved his penchant for smashing plates in domestic politics. Unlike his predecessors in the LDP, Koizumi wasn't beholden to a system of opaque negotiations among faction leaders, which has marked postwar Japanese politics.

After decades of colorless politicians, Japanese voters ate it up. Koizumi's command of the sound bite and direct style of speaking endeared him to the masses.

"Koizumi didn't care much about the status quo and personal relationships," said Tsuneo Watanabe, a senior fellow at the Mitsui Global Strategic Studies Institute in Tokyo.

He largely shunned party bosses for his Cabinet and expanded the functions of his job, adopting an unusual presidential style of governance. For chief economic minister, he brought in an outsider, Heizo Takenaka, who helped slash public works projects.

That was particularly evident last year when Koizumi called snap national elections to thwart renegades in his own party blocking privatization of the $3 trillion postal system. Analysts coined the term "political theater" to describe how Koizumi lured outsiders to challenge and drum out of office the 38 LDP legislators who defied him.

It was a remarkable triumph. His allies won a landslide victory in September 2005, which revived the fortunes of the LDP. Analysts said a new political style had emerged.

"Japanese are more comfortable with this kind of maverick or individualistic politician," Watanabe said.

Indeed, Koizumi has the support of an astonishing 64 percent of Japanese, according to a nationwide poll published Friday by the newspaper Mainichi Shimbun.

Not all was rosy. Relations with China and South Korea, two of Japan's most important trading partners, are tenser than ever. To fulfill a campaign promise, Koizumi has gone every year to worship at Yasukuni, the shrine where the nation's 2.5 million war dead are honored, including more than a dozen convicted Class-A war criminals. The visits have enraged Beijing and Seoul.

Ultra-nationalism is on the rise, and it's not just guys in sound trucks blaring patriotic slogans. Some academics report anonymous threats, and a legislator saw his home burned to the ground on Aug. 15 after he criticized Koizumi for visiting Yasukuni. A lesser candidate as party chief, Sadakazu Tanigaki, said the atmosphere is "not dissimilar to the 1930s," when the country was racked by "narrow-minded nationalism."

Moreover, Koizumi's pro-market economics weakened a sense of an egalitarian state, widening the gap between rich and poor. The rural economy remains vulnerable, and many elderly are trapped in poverty from deep cuts in welfare assistance.

Even so, it's in the economic sphere that Koizumi achieved what few expected, given Japan's dire situation when he took office. Back then, Japan was sputtering at an anemic 0.4 percent growth rate per year, and Japan Inc. appeared mired in deflation.

When Koizumi slashed spending, private businesses started tackling structural problems. Slowly, reforms took effect. By 2004, Japan chalked up 2.3 percent growth, and last year it sped up to 2.8 percent growth. Similar growth is expected this year.

Ironically, Japan's newly steady economic course may slow momentum on reform, and some experts say the Koizumi era could be an intermission in politics-as-usual.

Abe, the Koizumi Cabinet chief who's his likely successor, is far less charismatic than Koizumi, and faces challenging Upper House elections next year. Abe will struggle to hang on to power and is likely to bring back the LDP rebels Koizumi ousted from the party and revive pork barrel spending.

In some sectors, fatigue with painful cost cutting has set in.

"The golden age of pro-market reforms is over," predicted Koll, the Merrill Lynch economist.

Abe, who at 51 is a generation younger than Koizumi, faces other challenges. In fundamental ways, Koizumi postponed key issues, including whether Japan will alter its pacifist constitution to turn the self-defense forces into a normal army and modernizing a longstanding U.S.-Japanese security alliance to reflect Japan's stronger role.

"We haven't seen any explanation to the Japanese people and to the world about ... where Japan is going," Glosserman said.

Far-right Parties Making Inroads In East Germany (WT)

By David Crossland

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

BERLIN -- A far-right party that shares Iranian President Mahmud Ahmadinejad's doubts about the Holocaust and wants to deport foreigners is expected to make strong gains in elections in an eastern German state tomorrow.

Opinion polls indicate the National Democratic Party (NPD), which calls for the repatriation of foreigners and opposes immigration, will get the minimum 5 percent needed to enter the assembly in Chancellor Angela Merkel's home state of Mecklenburg-Vorpommern, an economically depressed rural region known chiefly for its beautiful Baltic coastline.

"The opinion poll results appear to be unsettling the media cartel and the mainstream parties to such an extent that they can only resort to lies," said Udo Pastors, the NPD's leading candidate.

He was referring to charges that NPD backers intimidate opponents and disrupt campaign events.

The party made international headlines in 2004 when voters elected it to the regional parliament in Saxony, another eastern state, with 9.2 percent of the vote.

The NPD and another far-right party, the German People's Union (DVU), are now represented in two of Germany's five former communist eastern states -- embarrassing a country that has spent decades atoning for the Holocaust. Their nationwide support, however, remains marginal.

There is little awareness or guilt about the Holocaust among the party's supporters because Germany's Nazi past wasn't addressed under the communist regime in the east.

"The NPD is well organized and is tapping into people's feelings that they have lost out as a result of unification," said Manfred Gullner, director of the Forsa polling institute. Unemployment in the state, Germany's most sparsely populated one, is 18.2 percent, the highest among the 16 states and far above the national rate of 10.5 percent.

The failure of the mainstream parties to cope with the mass unemployment and social upheaval after unification made people more receptive to the radical right, said professor Hajo Funke of Berlin's Free University, an analyst of far-right trends. "Many people have the feeling that they're superfluous," he said.

Eastern anger has provided fertile ground for the NPD, especially among young people, he said.

Like all other parties, the NPD receives state funding because it is a legal party. An attempt to ban it failed in 2002 when Germany's Supreme Court rejected the case because some of the NPD members accused of stoking racism turned out to be informants for the intelligence service.

Hardly A Revolution, But Swedes Could Evict Leaders (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

STOCKHOLM, Sept. 14 — Relaxing with a dish of ice cream at the Gallerian shopping center, a profusion of trendy clothes, fancy cellphone accessories and expensive coffee in the center of town, 54-year-old Christina Jonsson was speaking like a political revolutionary — or at least what passes for one in Sweden.

"I'm fed up with Goran Persson and his men," Ms. Jonsson said crossly of the Swedish prime minister, whose Social Democratic government has held power since 1994. "They've done nothing about jobs. They haven't created any more jobs, and they say they have, and I don't trust them anymore."

Ms. Jonsson, a lifelong Social Democrat who runs a day care center, has a chance to help evict Mr. Persson on Sunday, when Sweden holds its most closely contested national election in years. But like someone at the hairdresser who wants a jazzy new style as long as it is not really different from the old one, Ms. Jonsson is not sure whether to take the plunge and vote for the alternative candidate, Fredrik Reinfeldt. "I haven't decided yet," she said.

Swedes revel in stability and moderation. The Social Democratic Party, with its policies of high taxes, big government and generous benefits, has run the country, alone or in coalitions with other parties, for 65 of the past 74 years. Economic growth is high, at a projected annual rate this year of 4.1 percent. Unemployment, according to the national statistics bureau, is 5.7 percent, one of the lowest in Europe. (Eurostat, Europe's statistics agency, calculates the figure differently and puts it at 7.1 percent.)

Meanwhile, the conservative party, which Mr. Reinfeldt leads, wants so much to appear not to be extreme that it calls itself the New Moderate Party. The father of three children, one of whom he looked after at home for nine months while his wife was working, Mr. Reinfeldt, 41, comes across as friendly, self-assured and reasonable.

"He's hard to dislike, because in policy terms he has been ultracautious," said Nicholas Aylott, a political scientist at Sodertorn University College here. "His whole strategy, ever since he took over the leadership in 2002, has been what I would call an office-seeking strategy, to pull the party back into taking office."

But Mr. Reinfeldt has found the government's Achilles' heel in the issue of unemployment, arguing with some success that the government's rosy figures hide a much darker reality. The Economist recently called Sweden "a world champion at massaging its jobless figures," and Mr. Reinfeldt agrees. If you take into account the number of working-age people who are neither working nor studying — including early retirees, people in job-training programs and those on long-term disability leave — the figure is more like 21 percent, he says.

Mr. Reinfeldt's criticisms are echoed by many Swedes, who offer anecdotal evidence of friends without work and job openings flooded with overly qualified applicants.

"A lot of people who go to university find that when they graduate, there aren't any jobs," said 18-year-old Linus Kullanger, who, having delayed higher education himself, is working as a supermarket clerk. "I have so many friends who are just sitting home playing poker on the Internet, trying to get money."

To tackle the problem, Mr. Reinfeldt is proposing to cut unemployment benefits, decrease payroll taxes for low-income workers and provide tax breaks to businesses that hire the chronically unemployed.

Mr. Reinfeldt makes a virtue of presenting his proposals as incremental rather than radical, saying he has learned from bitter experience that most Swedes will not support traditional conservative causes like huge cuts in taxes, benefits and government spending. In the last election, four years ago, his party got just 15 percent of the vote.

This year, it is running in an alliance with the other three center-right parties, which will govern as a coalition if they collectively win the election.

"This is an election campaign of small words," Mr. Reinfeldt said in an interview in his office. "I'm not asking for a revolution. If I were to do that, then we would never win, never."

But Mr. Persson's Social Democrats are portraying him, essentially, as a traditional conservative hiding behind a falsely mild facade.

DOJ_NMG_0064359

"They're trying to do what Karl Rove and George W. Bush did in the first election campaign; they're the Swedish equivalent of compassionate conservatives," the country's genial finance minister, Par Nuder, said in an interview in his office, casual in a jacket and blue jeans. "They know they're not electable if they show their real face."

Mr. Nuder accused Mr. Reinfeldt of playing with the numbers, saying he was disregarding, for instance, the 93,000 jobs that have been created since August 2005. Unemployment has actually been falling for the last year, Mr. Nuder said.

"He's trying to manipulate the statistics and make unemployment an issue to show that the glass is half empty rather than half full," he said. "I state — and I state very strongly — that the glass is getting more and more full."

Polls show that the race is neck and neck, with a huge pool of undecideds whose votes are still up for grabs. A series of debates on radio and television, with Mr. Persson appearing forceful and authoritative, Mr. Reinfeldt calmer and milder, have not proved decisive.

One voter, a 58-year-old woman who works for the Stockholm city government and who asked that her name not be used because as a civil servant she is supposed to be politically neutral, pronounced herself flummoxed.

"I'm a little bit red," she said, meaning that her instinct is to vote Social Democrat, whose color is red (the Moderates are blue), "but the Social Democrats have made the gap between social classes greater. They promise and promise and promise, but which promises are they going to keep?"

But whether she is ready for a change is another matter entirely.

"I don't know Reinfeldt, and I don't feel too safe about him," she said. "I'm not sure he knows what he's talking about. I'm an old, experienced woman, and he's not an old, experienced man."

U.N Officials Support Forum On Migration (AP-Y)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

Top officials from dozens of countries supported a U.N. initiative to create a new global forum on migration on Friday, but the U.S. said the international community should rely on the arrangements already in place to deal with the problem.

The first-ever General Assembly meeting on international migration wrapped up Friday with calls for increased cooperation and dialogue to promote the positive aspects of migration while minimizing the dangers such as human trafficking and smuggling.

With nearly 200 million international migrants recorded last year, many making dangerous crossings to escape poverty or repression, dozens of speakers at a General Assembly meeting supported a U.N. initiative to create a new global forum to address the sensitive issue which has become a high priority for countries on the sending and receiving ends.

"We are convinced that international migration cannot be handled unilaterally," Spain's top immigration official Consuelo Rumi said.

Thousands of people try to reach Europe through Spain each year, an increasing number of them setting off in small boats from Mauritania and Moroccan-controlled Western Sahara. The government says it catches virtually all of them.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan has proposed a Global Forum on Migration and Development as an informal, non-binding way for countries to debate the issue and come up with solutions. Belgium has offered to host the first meeting next year.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey said the United States is committed to confronting the challenges of migration but prefers to do so via existing forums and agreements with neighboring countries.

"We are not interested in grand and elaborate global dialogues simply because we have seen the inherent weakness that results from their size and scope," she said. "They lumber under the great weight of rounds and rounds of conversation, far removed from immediate problems and realistic solutions."

She said the U.S. believes that "the international community, including the U.N. system, already has adequate capacity to address migration issues, and that creation of additional structures will hinder, not help, international cooperation on these issues."

Among the proposals raised Friday in speeches and roundtable discussions was the need for international cooperation to maximize the benefit of remittances — the money sent home by migrants — with suggestions including ending double taxation on the funds or reducing fees for transferring them.

Annan said Thursday that remittances amounted to an estimated $167 billion last year.

Sauerbrey said it also was important to encourage countries of origin to undertake economic and social reforms to enable people to use the money more effectively in "building, entrepreneurship and investment."

Delegates also stressed the need to end the brain drain that plagues many developing countries as their most talented doctors and other professionals seek higher wages and better opportunities in wealthier foreign countries.

"While celebrating the importance of remittances, we need to be reminded that countries of origin certainly lose human capital through the emigration of skilled professionals and unskilled laborers," said Richard Msowoya of Malawi.

Europe is host to nearly 34 percent of all migrants, North America 23 percent and Asia 28 percent. Approximately one-third of migrants move between developing nations; the same proportion move from developing nations to developed nations, the U.N. Department of Economic and Social Affairs reported.

Latvian Joins Race For U.N.'s Top Post (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga joined the race to become the next U.N. secretary-general on Friday, becoming the first woman vying for the U.N.'s top post.

The former psychology professor who has led the Baltic nation since 1999 became the sixth candidate to replace Kofi Annan when his second five-year term ends Dec. 31.

Vike Freiberga faces an uphill struggle because most members states generally agree that the next secretary-general should come from Asia, part of a tradition to rotate the job between regions. U.S. Ambassador John Bolton, however, has argued that the job should go to the best qualified candidate regardless of nationality.

In an informal poll of the 15 Security Council members on Thursday — before Vike-Freiberga entered the race — South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon came in first followed by India's Shashi Tharoor, the U.N. undersecretary-general for public affairs, and Thailand's Deputy Prime Minister Surakiart Sathirathai.

Jordan's U.N. Ambassador Prince Zeid al Hussein, the only Muslim candidate, came in fourth and former U.N. disarmament chief Jayantha Dhanapala of Sri Lanka was last.

The secret poll is largely meant to indicate whether the candidates should remain in the race, and some diplomats say the person who will become the eighth secretary-general in the United Nations' 60-year history may not yet have come forward.

Vike-Freierga is likely to face difficulty because China — a veto-wielding council member — has repeatedly said it wants an Asian candidate.

Philanthropy At Clinton Fest, Trust But Verify (WSJ)

By Laurie McGinley

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

On Wednesday, more than 1,000 people will gather in New York at the second annual Clinton Global Initiative, a project led by former President Clinton, to tackle problems involving global health, poverty, religious strife and threats to the environment.

Setting the meeting apart from other gabfests, in part, is its steep price: An admission ticket costs $15,000. More than that, most participants -- who include government leaders, corporate executives, heads of nonprofit organizations and an array of big names like Christiane Amanpour, Shimon Peres, Katie Couric and Rupert Murdoch -- must pledge to fund and carry out an initiative to help address one of the problems. And therein lies a dilemma.

A few participants at last year's fest "pledged" to carry out programs that already were under way. In other words, the initiatives weren't specifically generated by the CGI. Moreover, not all participants followed through on their commitments. That's a no-no.

So this year, the Clinton folks have adopted a Reaganesque principle: Trust but verify. "We have an even greater focus on ensuring that the commitments are specifically for CGI and that the commitments are real," says spokesman Jay Carson.

To that end, CGI's 10-person "commitments team" has been working with participants to develop pledges for this year's conference. Some commitments were made months ago. Others will emerge at the meeting itself, as attendees rub elbows and drink cocktails with 60 heads of state and celebrity philanthropists such as Bill and Melinda Gates and Warren Buffett.

Those who don't follow through on their pledges won't be invited back. "Just under 20" participants from last year's conference weren't invited to this year's session, says Mr. Carson.

The event is a cross between a Hollywood premiere and a tent-revival meeting. Sessions at the three-day meeting have ambitious goals -- "Presenting and Resolving Deadly Conflicts," for example, is on Thursday's agenda. Last year's meeting generated 300 pledges valued at $2.5 billion, ranging from initiatives to increase the number of people tested and treated for HIV to efforts to help women in the Middle East develop business skills. This year, Laura Bush, who will conduct the opening session with Mr. Clinton, is expected to announce an administration pledge to help provide clean drinking water to Africa.

The long-term impact of the CGI is yet to be seen. But ensuring that promises made are promises kept increases its chance of success. "It's one thing to say, 'I have planted two million seedlings' and another to see how many trees are growing up and whether it's more than have been cut down," says S. Prakash Sethi, a professor of management at Baruch College in New York, who attended CGI last year but this year will be out of the country.

Gordon Brown Dances, Delicately, With Bush (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

LONDON

Britain's "stable and orderly transition," the Labour Party's favored phrase, has turned into the "Tony and Gordon Show," a TV soap opera mixing farce and venom and featuring two middle-aged men who've used a decade of intimacy at the pinnacle of power to rehearse the finer points of mutual loathing.

It would be very funny if it wasn't so serious - the strenuous assertions through pursed lips that they are really friends, the surreal little dance of their family movements at 10 and 11 Downing Street, the legend of Tony's broken promise to Gordon (as if promises ever meant anything in politics), the tiffs and tantrums.

But of course this unstable and disorderly transition from Tony Blair, the prime minister, to, in all likelihood, Gordon Brown, his once-trusted chancellor of the Exchequer, is serious. It involves British-American relations, Iraq, Afghanistan and the future conduct of what President George W. Bush calls the war on terror.

A spot of history is in order here. Back in the last century, at some joint in Islington, or so the legend has it, Blair promised Brown that in exchange for his loyalty he'd one day get a crack at the top job. Since then, more or less uninterruptedly, the remote Brown - not a man to pick up the phone himself - has been chafing.

Britain, under Blair's New Labour, went along swimmingly. London completed its transition from fog-bound fish-and-chip parlor to cosmopolitan metropolis. Even the likes of Liverpool and Leeds got a face-lift. Football matches stopped being an excuse for a pint and a punch-up and became coveted boardroom perks complete with sauvignon blanc. The helipads multiplied across England's green fields. Prosperity fairly oozed.

So Brown, who as chancellor had a substantial share of responsibility for all this, had to wait. Blair was popular and, as we all know, power addicts. Until the prime minister got himself into an unpopular mess in Iraq and into an even more unpopular relationship with Bush that has earned him the unkind epithet of "poodle."

Which allowed the Scottish terrier Brown to pounce. In a moment of weakness before the last election, Blair, who did after all win that election easily, allowed himself to say this would be his last term in office. That was it. Brown and his restive cronies started baying until, facing a virtual putsch and muttering blackmail under his breath, Blair said this month that he'd be gone within a year. Read by June, 2007.

Moral of story: If you're going to fire your rival for the top job, do it while that rival is weak and you're still strong. Blair might have ousted Brown at any moment until the Iraq shadow fell, but it seems his dislike of conflict and a moralist's nagging conscience - that Islington promise - got in the way of his killer instincts.

So here we are, with Brown getting ready to take what he considers his due, Cherie Blair in an even worse temper than her husband, and the prime minister sounding positively giddy with the absurdity of his situation.

"One of the good things about being in my position is that I can give people advice, and it is up to them whether they take it or not," Blair told a trade union conference this week.

That would be funny if it were not serious. The word of the leader of a major European power whose soldiers are getting killed in Afghanistan and Iraq should not be a take-it-or-leave-it proposition.

But Blair is a much-reduced figure, his halo, history. The "Yo-Blair" episode at the St. Petersburg summit in July seemed to capture, for his electorate, all the more poodle-like aspects of the Blair-Bush relationship, whose central mystery is that it seems to have given the prime minister so little in return for his loyalty.

Which brings us to Brown's central conundrum. That he can outmaneuver his Labour Party rivals and get Blair's job seems probable. That he can tone down his impatience, suffer fools more easily, and inject a touch of humanity into his zombie-Presbyterian image seems possible.

But what does he do about marking his distance from Bush and Iraq, moves that seem critical to his chances in the next election?

"I can't think of another moment when relations with the United States were the central question in the transfer of power from one prime minister to another within the same party," said Jonathan Eyal, a foreign policy expert at the Royal United Services Institute. "But that's the seminal issue today."

Here's the puzzle for Brown. If he doesn't turn Britain into a more critical ally, and doesn't demonstrate that he's not in the pocket of the most unpopular politician here (Bush), he's in deep trouble.

But if he gets too critical of the United States, he will be branded a left-winger, which would suit the resurgent Conservatives. He would also appear to move closer to the European Union, a direction he dislikes.

So the answer would appear to be constructive criticism of Bush, establishing some distance while avoiding anything as draconian as the removal of troops from Iraq.

The problem is that David Cameron, the Conservative leader, has already staked out that position, in a speech on the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attack.

In it, Cameron said: "We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America." He criticized the amalgamating of diverse threats into "a single global jihad." He called for "a new multilateralism." He criticized "disproportionate Israeli bombing in Lebanon" and the "stoop to illiberalism" at Guantánamo Bay.

Those are words designed to make the ice-cool Brown sweat. For where then does he take British foreign policy, a subject on which taciturnity has been his favored, but now inadequate, mode?

The cover this week of Private Eye, the satirical magazine, featured Britain's unhappy pair. "You've got to name your successor," says Gordon. "O.K. It's David Cameron," says Tony.

That would be funny if it were not serious.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Says G.O.P. Rebels Are Putting Nation At Risk (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — President Bush made an impassioned defense on Friday of his proposed rules for the interrogation and prosecution of terrorism suspects, warning that the nation's ability to defend itself would be undermined if rebellious Republicans in the Senate did not come around to his position.

Speaking at a late-morning news conference in the Rose Garden, Mr. Bush said he would have no choice but to end a C.I.A. program for the interrogation of high-level terrorism suspects if Congress passed an alternate set of rules supported by a group of Senate Republicans.

Those alternate rules were adopted Thursday by the Senate Armed Services Committee in defiance of Mr. Bush. Setting out what he suggested could be dire consequences if that bill became law, Mr. Bush said intelligence officers — he referred to them repeatedly as "professionals" — would no longer be willing and able to conduct interrogations out of concern that the vague standard for acceptable techniques could leave them vulnerable to legal action.

"Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that Al Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," he said. "But the practical matter is if our professionals don't have clear standards in the law, the program is not going to go forward."

The administration has said the Central Intelligence Agency has no "high value" terrorism suspects in foreign detention centers, having transferred the last of them this month to military custody at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. But officials said they considered the program crucial to efforts to foil attacks.

"This enemy has struck us, and they want to strike us again," Mr. Bush said, "and we'll give our folks the tools necessary to protect the country. It's a debate that, that really is going to define whether or not we can protect ourselves."

It was also a debate Mr. Bush had hoped to have this week exclusively with Democrats as he and his party's leadership set out to draw unflattering distinctions between Republicans and Democrats on fighting terrorism for the fall elections.

Instead, Mr. Bush spent Friday in a second day of heavy debate, casting some of the most respected voices on military matters in his own party as hindering the fight against terrorism. As of late Friday there seemed to be no break in the impasse, even as White House officials worked behind the scenes to build new support in the Senate for the legislation the president wants.

Leading the efforts against him in the Senate are three key Republicans on the Armed Services Committee with their own military credentials: the chairman and a former secretary of the Navy, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia; Senator John McCain of Arizona, a prisoner of war in Vietnam; and Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a military judge. And publicly taking their side is Mr. Bush's former secretary of state, Colin L. Powell.

The dispute centers on whether to pass legislation reinterpreting a provision of the Geneva Conventions known as Common Article 3 that bars "outrages upon personal dignity"; the Supreme Court ruled that the provision applies to terrorism suspects. Mr. Bush argued that the convention's language was too vague and is proposing legislation to clarify the provisions. "What does that mean, 'outrages upon human dignity'?" he said at one point.

Mr. McCain and his allies on the committee say reinterpreting the Geneva Conventions would open the door to rogue governments to interpret them as they see fit.

In a statement late Friday, Mr. McCain stuck to his position, saying that his proposed rules included legal protections for interrogators. "Weakening the Geneva protections is not only unnecessary, but would set an example to other countries, with less respect for basic human rights, that they could issue their own legislative reinterpretations," he said.

Mr. Bush rejected the crux of Mr. McCain's argument when a reporter asked him how he would react if nations like Iran or North Korea "roughed up" American soldiers under the guise of their own interpretations of Common Article 3.

"You can give a hypothetical about North Korea or any other country," Mr. Bush said, casting the question as steeped in moral relativism. "The point is that the program is not going to go forward if our professionals do not have clarity in the law."

He also discounted an argument made in a letter from Mr. Powell that his plan would encourage the world to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

Asked about that analysis, Mr. Bush said, "If there's any comparison between the compassion and decency of the American people and the terrorist tactics of extremists, it's flawed logic."

Mr. Bush was alternately combative and comedic during the hourlong session with reporters. At one point, in describing how he thought the economy and Republican tax policies would help his party in November, he said: "I've always felt the economy is a determinate issue, if not the determinate issue in campaigns. We've had a little history of that in our family, you might remember."

It was an off-hand reference to his father's losing presidential re-election campaign in 1992, when he was damaged by economic woes and the breaking of his "read my lips" vow not to raise taxes.

Mr. Bush said it was "urban myth" that his administration had lost focus on capturing Osama bin Laden. The president said he was frustrated by the United Nations at times, especially when it came to addressing genocide in Darfur.

Asked about a Senate report concluding that there was no working relationship between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda in Iraq, Mr. Bush said forcefully, "I never said there was an operational relationship."

The questioner had included a reference to Mr. Bush's Aug. 21 news conference at which he had said, "Imagine a world in which you had Saddam Hussein who had the capacity to make a weapon of mass destruction, who was paying suiciders to kill innocent life, who would — who had relations with Zarqawi," referring to the Qaeda mastermind in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Democrats for the most part on Friday were content to allow Republicans to fight among themselves on the terrorism question.

"When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

But Republicans boasted that their top issue, terrorism, was dominating the political news for yet another day and overtaking Democratic criticisms of the war in Iraq.

GOP Infighting On Detainees Intensifies (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

President Bush warned defiant Republican senators yesterday that he will close down a CIA interrogation program that he credited with thwarting terrorist attacks if they pass a proposal regulating detention of enemy combatants, escalating a politically charged battle that has exposed divisions within his party.

DOJ_NMG_0064367

An irritated Bush, raising his voice and gesturing sharply at a Rose Garden news conference, excoriated legislation passed by a Senate panel Thursday that is intended to conform U.S. detainee practices with the Geneva Conventions. Bush insisted on legislation more specifically defining what is banned so intelligence officers would not worry about being charged with war crimes.

"The professionals will not step up unless there's clarity in the law," Bush said. "So Congress has got a decision to make: Do you want the program to go forward or not? I strongly recommend that this program go forward in order for us to be able to protect America."

The president's threat to end the interrogation program seemed to make little impression on the Republican dissidents who have balked at his interpretation of the Geneva Conventions. Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), two of four Republicans who voted against Bush's position on Thursday, again rejected his logic after the news conference, and a fifth Republican senator, Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), joined the rebellion against the president.

"Weakening the Geneva protections is not only unnecessary, but would set an example to other countries, with less respect for basic human rights, that they could issue their own legislative 'reinterpretations,' " McCain said in a written statement. "This puts our military personnel and others directly at risk in this and future wars."

The dispute over how the United States conducts its ongoing battle with international terrorists dominated a question-and-answer session with the president that touched on a variety of high-profile issues 53 days before the midterm elections. Bush lashed out at the United Nations for not moving more aggressively to stop genocide in Darfur, rejected what he called the "urban myth" that his administration has lost focus on finding Osama bin Laden, and acknowledged that spiraling violence in Iraq has frustrated his hopes to begin bringing U.S. troops home this year.

At a time when Bush hoped to be drawing distinctions with Democrats, though, he spent most of the conference arguing with fellow Republicans. As Congress tries to wrap up business to go home and campaign, Bush is pressing for legislation endorsing his leadership against terrorism, including warrantless surveillance of overseas telephone calls, military commissions to try enemy combatants and expansive rules permitting tough interrogations.

The most explosive debate centers on how the Geneva Conventions should apply to U.S. intelligence officers, who captured, held and questioned terrorism suspects in secret overseas CIA prisons for years until the last 14 detainees were transferred recently into military custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that U.S. detainees fall under the Geneva Conventions, which require that wartime captives be "treated humanely" and ban "outrages upon personal dignity." Bush wants legislation interpreting the conventions as barring "cruel, inhuman or degrading" treatment, adopting language from a McCain-sponsored law on prisoners signed last year. The broader "personal dignity" phrases, he argues, are so vague that they leave interrogators open to prosecution for a wide variety of techniques.

McCain, Graham and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) have rejected the Bush approach as too narrow and as an invitation to other countries, including Iran, Syria and North Korea, to reinterpret the Geneva rules as they see fit if they ever hold U.S. soldiers. "What is being billed as 'clarifying' our treaty obligations will be seen as 'withdrawing' from the treaty obligations," Graham said. "It will set precedent which could come back to haunt us."

Another dispute centers on trials for terrorism suspects, who in the Bush proposal could under some circumstances be barred from the proceedings and not allowed to view classified evidence against them. The Republican legislation, passed by Warner's committee 15 to 9 on Thursday, would make it more difficult to introduce secret evidence.

Joining McCain and the other Republicans this week was former secretary of state Colin L. Powell, who wrote in a letter that reinterpreting the Geneva Conventions would encourage other countries to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

Bush bristled at the criticism from his former top diplomat yesterday, calling it "flawed logic" and accusing Powell of equating U.S. tactics with those of terrorists, even though Powell's letter made no such comparison. "It's unacceptable to think that there's any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children," Bush said.

He likewise rejected the argument that nations such as Iran and North Korea would cite U.S. precedent in reinterpreting Geneva rules. "If the nations such as those you named adopted the standards within the Detainee Detention Act," Bush said, meaning the model for his preferred legislation, "the world would be better."

Asked twice if he would veto the McCain-backed bill, Bush avoided answering directly but repeated 11 times in the course of an hour that intelligence officials would not "go forward" with their interrogation program. "Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that al-Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," he said.

In a nod to the harsh campaign rhetoric flying around Washington, Bush disavowed a statement by House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who suggested this week that Democrats care more about protecting terrorists than protecting Americans. "I wouldn't have exactly put it that way," Bush said. "But I do believe there's a difference of attitude."

Democrats, who have largely sat on the sidelines as Bush and Republicans battled this week, seized on the president's remarks yesterday. "Instead of picking fights with Colin Powell, John McCain and other military experts, President Bush should change course, do what the American people expect and finally give them the real security they deserve," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.).

Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) called for a Judiciary Committee investigation into whether military judge advocates general were pressured into writing a letter this week saying they "do not object" to two sensitive parts of the administration's legislation.

Officials who attended the meeting in question, in the office of Pentagon general counsel William J. Haynes II on Wednesday, said there was no pressure on the military lawyers to produce the letter, describing a robust discussion about how to word its contents. The lawyers initially drafted a letter saying they "support" the two sections but later settled on saying they "do not object" to them.

"None of us would have signed anything if we had not believed it and absolutely agreed with it," Col. Ronald M. Reed, counsel to the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, said yesterday. "The discussion was nothing out of the ordinary."

But late yesterday, Maj. Gen. Scott C. Black, the Army's judge advocate general, sent a new letter to McCain and other senators, saying "further redefinition" of the conventions "is unnecessary and could be seen as a weakening of our treaty obligations, rather than a reinforcement of the standards of treatment."

Bush Threatens To Shut CIA Interrogation Program (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Warning that terrorists "are coming again," President Bush said Friday that he'd shut down a secret CIA interrogation program if lawmakers refused to give interrogators wide latitude in dealing with detainees.

"It's a dangerous world," Bush said as he prodded Congress to follow his lead in dealing with suspected terrorists. "I wish I could tell the American people, `Don't worry about it, they're not coming again.' But they are coming again."

The president's use of fear to pressure lawmakers came a day after a Republican-led Senate committee defied the White House and approved legislation that would prohibit abusive treatment of detainees. The bill, which the Senate Armed Services Committee endorsed 15-9, also would revise Bush's rules of evidence for trials of suspected terrorists.

The House of Representatives appears headed toward approving the president's approach, but the Senate is likely to oppose him. That may leave the issue unresolved before November's congressional elections.

Bush cast the dispute as a choice between protecting the nation or leaving it vulnerable to another terrorist attack. His critics, including many retired military officers and former Secretary of State Colin Powell, say his approach violates American values, undermines the moral foundation of the war on terrorism and increases the risk that U.S. prisoners of war will be abused.

Both sides say they want to clarify the CIA's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, a series of international agreements that govern the treatment of wartime prisoners. Bush's critics say his approach essentially would jettison the agreement.

"What is being billed as `clarifying' our treaty obligations will be seen as withdrawing from the treaty obligations," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a member of the Armed Services Committee. "It will set precedent which could come back to haunt us."

The president bristled when he was asked about Powell's comment Thursday that "the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

"That's flawed - flawed logic," he said. "It's unacceptable to think that there's any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children to achieve an objective."

The Pentagon has banned abusive interrogations in military detention centers, but the CIA, until recently, had more latitude in its efforts to pry information from terrorist suspects. The techniques the agency used are classified, but they reportedly include simulated drowning, temperature extremes and sleep deprivation.

Bush suspended the CIA interrogation program and emptied the agency's secret prisons after the Supreme Court ruled in June that the detainees are covered by the basic protections that the Geneva Conventions provide. The protections, spelled out in a provision known as Common Article 3, prohibit "outrages upon personal dignity" as well as "humiliating and degrading treatment."

The president said he would shut down the CIA interrogation program permanently if Congress didn't pass legislation that gave the agency latitude in dealing with suspects and protected its interrogators from possible prosecution for war crimes.

"This program has saved innocent lives,'" he said. "The intelligence community must be able to tell me that the bill Congress sends to my desk will allow this vital program to continue."

When he was asked how he'd react if captive Americans were subjected to the same treatment as the CIA's prisoners, Bush replied that "the world would be better" if other countries observed his treatment standards.

Turning to Iraq, the president acknowledged that deploying more Iraqi security forces hasn't led to reducing the number of U.S. troops in the country, the stated goal of his Iraq strategy. In fact, the number of American troops in Iraq has increased in recent months, from 135,000 to 147,000.

"The enemy is changing tactics, and we're adapting," Bush said.

Looking ahead to his trip to the United Nations General Assembly next week, the president criticized the U.N. and said he wouldn't meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad there. He chided the U.N. for failing to respond to violence in Sudan's Darfur region.

On another topic, Bush said he was "just speculating" when he told a group of conservative journalists earlier this week that America might be in the midst of a "Third Awakening" of religious devotion.

Religious historians refer to a wave of Christian fervor in the American colonies in the mid-1700s as the First Great Awakening. The Second Great Awakening refers to a similar wave in the early 1800s.

The president said his musings about a third religious wave were inspired by his experience and a book on Abraham Lincoln that he read recently.

"It seems like to me that something is happening in the religious life of America," he said. "I'm able to see a lot of people, and from my perspective, people are coming to say, `I'm praying for you.'"

Bush Fights GOP Revolt Over Terror Bill (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, September 16, 2006

President Bush fought back Friday against a Republican revolt in the Senate over tough anti-terror legislation and rejected warnings that the United States had lost the high moral ground to adversaries. "It's flawed logic," he snapped.

Bush urged lawmakers to quickly approve legislation authorizing military tribunals and harsh interrogations of terror suspects in order to shield U.S. personnel from being prosecuted for war crimes under the Geneva Conventions, which set international standards for the treatment of prisoners of war.

Tough interrogations have been instrumental in preventing attacks against the United States, Bush said. "Time's running out" for the legislation, he warned, with Congress set to adjourn in a few weeks.

The president called a Rose Garden news conference to confront a Republican rebellion led by Sens. John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Susan Collins of Maine.

To the administration's dismay, Colin Powell, Bush's former secretary of state, has joined with the lawmakers. Powell said Bush's plan to redefine the Geneva Conventions would cause the world "to doubt the moral basis" of the fight against terror and "put our own troops at risk."

Seven weeks before the November elections, the dispute left Republicans fighting among themselves — rather than with Democrats — about national security issues that have been a winning theme for the GOP in past elections.

Responding to Bush, McCain rejected the president's assertion that an alternative bill approved by the Senate Armed Services Committee dealing with the trial and interrogation of terror suspects would require the closure of the CIA's detainee program.

McCain said the measure would protect agents from criminal and civil liability and, by not reinterpreting the meaning of the Geneva Conventions, uphold the nation's obligations.

"To do any less risks our reputation, our moral standing and the lives of those Americans who risk everything to defend our country," the senator said.

Democrats were eager to point out the GOP disarray.

"When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "These military men are telling the president that in the war on terror you need to be both strong and smart, and it is about time he heeded their admonitions."

DOJ_NMG_0064370

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said, "Instead of picking fights with Colin Powell, John McCain and other military experts, President Bush should change course, do what the American people expect, and finally give them the real security they deserve."

Warner, a former Navy secretary, is chairman of the Armed Services Committee. McCain is a former Navy pilot who spent more than five years in enemy captivity during the Vietnam War. Graham is a former Air Force Reserve judge. Powell, a retired general, is a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

On another major national security issue, Bush said he was disappointed that the number of U.S. troops in Iraq was climbing rather than falling. He said hopes for troop withdrawals were dashed by a spike in violence in Baghdad, where in just the past two days more than 130 people were killed in attacks or tortured and dumped in rivers and on city streets.

"Look, we all want the troops to come home as quickly as possible," the president said. Polls show the war is unpopular among Americans, and Republicans worry it could cost them votes. He said he would base troop levels on the recommendations of his top commanders, Gen. William Casey and John Abizaid, and said he had great confidence in both men.

Bush took vehement exception when asked about Powell's assertion that the world might doubt the moral basis of the fight against terror if lawmakers went along with the administration's proposal to come up with a U.S. interpretation of the Geneva Convention's ban on "outrages upon personal dignity."

"If there's any comparison between the compassion and decency of the American people and the terrorist tactics of extremists, it's flawed logic," Bush said. "It's just — I simply can't accept that."

Growing animated, he said, "It's unacceptable to think that there's any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children to achieve an objective."

Bush said the Geneva Convention's ban was "very vague" and required clarification. "What does that mean, 'outrages upon human dignity?' That's a statement that is wide open to interpretation."

He said that unless Congress acts, the CIA will end its program of tough interrogation methods that the administration says has prevented attacks.

"So Congress has got a decision to make," Bush said. "You want the program to go forward or not? I strongly recommend that this program go forward in order for us to be able to protect America."

On another anti-terror matter, with Osama bin Laden still at large five years after the 9/11 attacks, Bush said he could not send thousands of troops into Pakistan to search without an invitation from the government. "Pakistan's a sovereign nation," Bush said.

At the same time, Bush expressed frustration that the United Nations had not sent peacekeepers to stop the misery in the Darfur region of Sudan. "What you'll hear is, well, the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act. Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a resolution saying, we're coming in with a U.N. force, in order to save lives."

On other issues, Bush said:

_He will not meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad next week while both are at the United Nations. The U.S. won't sit down with Iranians until they suspend nuclear enrichment, he said.

_He would not have gone as far as House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio that Democrats "are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people." "I wouldn't exactly put it that way," Bush said. But he said that "there's a difference in attitude" between Republicans and Democrats.

Bush Says Congress Must Pass Clear Law On Detainees (Update6) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 16, 2006

By Catherine Dodge and James Rowley

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said CIA intelligence-gathering that has already thwarted al-Qaeda attacks on the U.S. would stop unless Congress passes his proposed rules for the treatment of suspected terrorists.

``Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that al-Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," Bush said in an hour-long news conference at the White House.

Bush raised the ante in the face of a rebellion by members of his own Republican Party on Capitol Hill. Four Republicans yesterday joined Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee to approve legislation that would give more legal protection to suspected terrorists than the administration wants.

Bush sidestepped a question on whether he would veto legislation that didn't match his proposal, saying he is confident Congress will send him a ``good bill." Bush's former secretary of state, Colin Powell, endorsed the Senate panel's approach, warning that the administration is risking the safety of U.S. troops and worldwide opinion by permitting harsh treatment of detainees and redefining what is allowed under the Geneva Conventions.

Powell, also a former chairman of the military's Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a Sept. 13 letter to Republican Senator John McCain that ``the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

`Flawed Logic'

Asked today about Powell's suggestion the U.S. is following a flawed strategy, Bush said: ``If there's any comparison between the compassion and decency of the American people and the terrorist tactics of extremists, it's flawed logic."

The legislation is needed to restart war-crimes tribunals Bush set up at the U.S. Navy Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Supreme Court invalidated those tribunals in June, ruling that they fail to incorporate the 1949 Geneva Conventions on the treatment of war prisoners.

Bush said those treaty standards are ``vague" and the U.S. has learned valuable information from detainees. ``I'm asking Congress to pass a clear law with clear guidelines," he said. ``If Congress passes a law that does not clarify the rules, the program is not going forward."

Gonzales Comments

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters that the Supreme Court decision created ``confusion and concern" about Central Intelligence Agency interrogation techniques. On Sept. 6, Bush announced that all 14 ``high-value" detainees at CIA-operated prisons had been transferred to Guantanamo Bay.

While ``there is no one currently in CIA custody," the attorney general said, ``We're going to capture additional high- value detainees" and ``we will need to get information from them."

Four of the 13 Republicans on the Senate panel joined all 11 Democrats to approve their version of the measure, rejecting Bush's proposal to bar defendants from seeing classified evidence prosecutors may want to use in court. The committee acted just hours after the president made an unusual visit to Capitol Hill yesterday to urge support for his proposals on domestic eavesdropping and military tribunals.

In addition to McCain, a former Vietnam War prisoner and torture victim, Republican Senators John Warner of Virginia, the panel's chairman; Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a former Air Force lawyer, and Susan Collins of Maine sided with the Democrats. Senator Olympia Snowe, also a Maine Republican, announced today she would support the bipartisan measure. Republicans John Sununu of New Hampshire and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania have also voiced support.

Treaty Obligations

Graham, in a statement, took issue with the president's characterization of the legislation. ``What is being billed as `clarifying' our treaty obligations will be seen as `withdrawing' from the treaty obligations," he said. ``The Senate legislation, for the first time, clearly defines what would be criminal conduct by the CIA in the war on terror."

``When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is," said Senator Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, in a statement.

After the committee vote, McCain accused CIA Director Michael Hayden of asking to be ``immunized not from liability but from criticism."

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said Hayden was trying to protect CIA employees.

CIA Interrogations

Lieutenant General Patrick Hughes, the former head of intelligence at the Homeland Security Department, said the committee's measure was ``implicitly limiting" of CIA interrogations.

``Surely no one believes we can use a 1940's set of rules -- absent any change -- to govern our actions now," Hughes said.

Steven Fleischmann, a former official at the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, said the U.S. should be more concerned about the perception of abuse adding to the difficulties of fighting the war on terror.

``Fear on the other side can be a useful tool in getting people to cooperate, but anger on the other side helps them recruit," he said. The debate over detainee treatment ``seems feckless and likely to catch mid-level personnel in the middle of a domestic political struggle."

Senate Republican Whip Mitch McConnell, who supports Bush's measure, promised that ``a floor debate will highlight important bright-line issues." In a Senate speech today, McConnell said ``only one side of the argument has been prevalent in the last day or do." House leaders plan a vote next week on legislation that closely tracks Bush's proposal.

The intra-party squabble has disrupted Republican plans to highlight their differences with Democrats over national security before the Nov. 7 elections. All 435 seats in the House of Representatives are up for grabs, as are 33 of 100 Senate seats. To overturn the Republican majorities, Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate.

Bush: Interrogation Vital (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

President Bush yesterday warned Congress that failure to pass his proposal for interrogating and trying suspected terrorists will kill a vital program that has prevented attacks on the United States, but he expressed optimism that the final legislation will follow his recommendation.

One day after four Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee joined Democrats to approve a bill that calls for broader rights for suspected terrorists than he has set out, the president said lawmakers need to act swiftly because "time's running out."

"Congress has got a decision to make: Do you want the program to go forward or not? I strongly recommend that this program go forward in order for us to be able to protect America," Mr. Bush said during a Rose Garden press conference.

"If not for this program, our intelligence community believes al Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," he said.

But Democrats yesterday reminded Mr. Bush that the senators and others leading the fight against his proposal are Republicans.

"When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat. "These military men are telling the president that in the war on terror you need to be both strong and smart, and it is about time he heeded their admonitions."

Mr. Powell, the former secretary of state and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said this week that the president's proposal would encourage the world to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism" and "put our own troops at risk."

Republican Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine also announced that she supports Mr. McCain's and Mr. Warner's proposal rather than Mr. Bush's.

The president urged the Senate to support the kind of legislation passed by the House Armed Services Committee, which would allow the administration to try terror suspects before military tribunals and use interrogation techniques the president argues have been crucial to protecting America.

He refused to speculate on whether he would veto a bill that doesn't include his proposals.

"I believe we can get a good bill," Mr. Bush said. "Hopefully, we can reconcile differences; hopefully, we can come together and find a way forward without ruining the program."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said Mr. Bush should bow to the "bipartisan process under way in the United States Senate."

The president's proposal seeks to clarify Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which bans "outrages upon human dignity."

"That's ... very vague. What does that mean, 'outrages upon human dignity'? That's a statement that is wide open to interpretation," he said.

Mr. Bush argued that "by clarifying Article 3 we make it stronger, we make it clearer, we make it definite."

The administration sought congressional clarification this month after the Supreme Court in June struck down the president's current setup for trying detainees held at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, a ruling the president called "flawed."

Mr. Bush said Congress must act to protect U.S. intelligence professionals who are called on to question detainees to obtain vital information. "They don't want to be tried as war criminals. ... They expect our government to give them clarity about what is right and what is wrong."

He also urged Congress to support the terrorist surveillance program, which allows the federal government to eavesdrop on international calls to and from suspected terrorists in the United States.

"Both these bills are essential to winning the war on terror. We'll work with Congress to get good bills out because we have a duty," Mr. Bush said.

On other subjects, the president:

·Again pressed for comprehensive immigration legislation, but did not say whether he would support a House bill passed Thursday that calls for construction of a 770-mile fence on the U.S.-Mexico border.

DOJ_NMG_0064373

·Rejected a face-to-face meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad next week when he attends the U.N. General Assembly meeting, saying, "I have made it clear that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program."

·Predicted the Republicans will retain control of Congress. "I don't believe the Democrats are going to take over because our record on the economy is strong," he said.

·Paid tribute to Ann Richards, who died Wednesday. Of his one-time rival for Texas governor, Mr. Bush said: "Running against Ann Richards taught me a lot. She was a really, really good candidate. She was a hard worker. She ... had the capacity to be humorous and yet make a profound point. I think she made a positive impact on the state of Texas."

Bush On Defensive Over Anti-terrorism Measures (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington And Daniel Dombey In Brussels

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

In the wake of Republican rebellion over his proposals to approve interrogation techniques for terrorists and military tribunals, President George W. Bush on Friday used a Rose Garden press conference to defend his legislation and warned Congress: “Time is running out . . . Congress must act wisely and promptly.”

Mr Bush, at times testy and defensive, explained his effort to clarify the terms of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, and denied it would put at risk US soldiers who might be captured in countries such as Iran or North Korea. “I don’t think Americans want international courts determining how we protect ourselves,” he said.

The battle over the legislation has pitted the authority of the White House and House Republicans against the moral authority claimed by a group led by Senators John McCain, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, who contend that the US could see the basis of its fight against terrorism undercut by efforts to legalise controversial interrogation methods and tribunals.

The European Union on Friday added to the pressure on the White House when it denounced as “illegal” the secret CIA prison whose existence Mr Bush acknowledged last week.

“The existence of secret detention facilities where detained persons are kept in a legal vacuum is not in conformity with international humanitarian law and international criminal law,” the EU said in a formal statement at a foreign ministers’ meeting.

Mr Bush appeared to create room for negotiations with Congress when he sidestepped the chance to pledge that he would veto any bill if it matched the one passed by 15 votes to 9 in the Senate armed services committee, and said his key criterion for success was one question: “That the intelligence community must be able to tell me this bill enables this vital programme to continue.”

Michael Hayden, director of the CIA, warned this week that if the current Senate version were passed it would lead to the end of the programme of interrogations held at secret CIA prisons. The administration has defended this as a “vital tool”.

Mr Bush, capping a week in which he has put the war on terror at the centre of the Republican congressional campaign, said: “We didn’t ask for this war. This enemy has struck us and wants to strike us again. It’s a dangerous world.”

Some are concerned that the battle within the Republican party is frustrating efforts to present a unified front on the issue of the war on terror.

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, yesterday denied that the split would have any political impact on the mid-term elections. “The average American is not paying attention to committee mark-ups,” he said.

“If you look at every one of the elements of the war on terror, Democrats opposed the Patriot Act, the terrorist surveillance, voted to cut intelligence funding. When you look at the overall picture you see that Republicans are united in recognising we are at war . . . what would we see if the Democrats were in charge? We would have a much weaker effort in the war on terror.”

Behind The Debate, Controversial CIA Techniques (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

President Bush's push this week for legislation that narrowly defines U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions is motivated by his aides' conviction that the CIA must continue using a small number of highly controversial interrogation techniques on suspected terrorists, according to current and former U.S. officials. These methods include some that cause extreme discomfort and have been repudiated by other federal agencies.

The nature and legitimacy of these coercive techniques is the largely unpublicized subtext of the legislative dispute that has erupted between the administration and its opponents on Capitol Hill, including lawmakers from both parties who have said privately that they find some of the CIA's past interrogation methods abhorrent.

On the surface, Bush's proposal requires that interrogations in the previously secret CIA prison system comply with legal rules written by Congress last year. Privately, the administration has concluded that doing so would allow the CIA to keep using virtually all the interrogation methods it has employed for the past five years, the officials said.

That conclusion is based on an unpublicized memo to the CIA from the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, which named the precise interrogation methods the department believed to be sanctioned by last year's broadly written congressional requirement that no U.S. detainees "shall be subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" as those terms are defined in U.S. laws.

The officials said the CIA and the White House are convinced that retaining access to these methods is key to extracting information from captured terrorism suspects who have urgently needed information about dangerous plots.

Congressional critics of this position have some support from within the government: Neither the FBI nor the Defense Department allows the use of the CIA's harshest techniques, and last week senior Pentagon officials said they believe that more cooperative forms of interrogation produce better results than inflicting extreme discomfort.

But the CIA feels differently. A memo sent by CIA Director Michael V. Hayden to the agency's employees Thursday approvingly quoted Bush's endorsement of the CIA interrogations for "defending the homeland, attacking [al-Qaeda] . . . and saving thousands of American and allied lives." Hayden said in the memo that the clarifying language of the administration's bill would give him confidence that what he "asked an Agency officer to do under the program is lawful."

The rival Senate bill on interrogations -- approved by the Armed Services Committee on Thursday and sharply criticized by Bush yesterday -- is silent on how the CIA should comply with the Geneva Conventions. Its intent, according to several government officials, is not only to avoid sending a signal to other nations that Washington is reinterpreting its treaty obligations, but to leave in place a historic understanding of international law, which would render unlawful many of the extreme interrogation techniques the CIA has been using.

Bush and other senior officials have not discussed what those methods include, but the president described them as an "alternative set of procedures," emphasizing that they differ from those used elsewhere in the government.

At a news conference yesterday, Bush alluded to these special methods when he said the new legislation was needed to provide "intelligence professionals with the tools they need." One well-informed source said the techniques include prolonged sleep deprivation and forced standing or other stress positions. Another source said they match the techniques used by the agency in the past, but with a notable exception: The CIA no longer seeks to use a notorious technique called "waterboarding," which is meant to simulate drowning.

A senior administration official, authorized to speak with reporters about the legal issues behind the administration's strategy yesterday on the condition that he not be named, said the CIA interrogations at issue are in "the gray area on the margins -- that ill-defined boundary -- of Common Article 3." He was referring to a Geneva Conventions provision that bars cruel, humiliating and degrading treatment, as well as "outrages upon personal dignity."

There are ironies in the positions of each side in the current dispute. The administration says its intent is to define the explicit meaning of Common Article 3 so that CIA officers know exactly what they can do. But the senior official who addressed the legal issue yesterday said the standard the administration prefers is "context-sensitive," a phrase that suggests an endlessly shifting application of the rules.

The reason is that the administration's language would in effect ban only those interrogation techniques that "shock the conscience." That phrase, drawn from a judicial interpretation of the U.S. Constitution, is a "flexible" standard, the official said. Others have said that standard would allow interrogators to weigh how urgently they felt they needed to extract information against the harshness of their techniques, instead of following rigid guidelines.

The official did not try to explain how embracing such an inherently flexible standard would actually create clarity, the watchword of the administration's public campaign for its version of the bill.

Another irony lies in the fact that the congressional rules for interrogations that the Bush administration now seeks to embrace in the new legislation -- the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 -- were vigorously opposed by the White House before their adoption by Congress. Bush disliked them so much that when he signed the law Dec. 30, he appended a statement objecting to some of its provisions and explicitly reserved his right to interpret them "in a manner consistent" with his constitutional authorities as president and commander in chief.

In another twist, the principal Republican lawmakers responsible for the Detainee Treatment Act -- Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) -- said last year that they meant the law to set a minimum, humane standard of treatment for detainees held by both the Defense Department and the CIA. But they now are telling colleagues it would be a bad law for the CIA to follow in the future because its language would slight international treaty obligations.

A retired intelligence professional who said he has discussed the matter at length with colleagues said the predominant view at the agency is that McCain -- who made clear in congressional debate last year that he disapproved of what the CIA was doing -- was surprised to learn later that the Detainee Treatment Act did not put a stop to it.

His bill "did not formally disallow anything that was being done," the source said. Now, he said, McCain "is not going to let the practitioners off the hook."

Military Lawyers Caught In Middle On Tribunals (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti And Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — On Wednesday evening, the night before a crucial Senate vote on the Bush administration plan for the interrogations and trials of terrorism suspects, the Pentagon general counsel, William J. Haynes II, summoned the senior uniformed lawyers from each military service to a meeting.

The lawyers, known as judge advocates general, had been pivotal players in years of debate over detention, interrogation and prosecution.

They had repeatedly sparred behind the scenes with Mr. Haynes, the top civilian lawyer in the Defense Department. This summer, the judge advocates general emerged in public after the Supreme Court struck down a Bush administration plan to take an important role in opposing parts of a White House effort to resurrect military commissions for terrorism suspects in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

But at the meeting on Wednesday, Mr. Haynes sought to enlist the lawyers on the administration's side by asking whether any would object to signing a letter lending their support to aspects of the White House proposal over which they had voiced little concern.

The lawyers agreed, but only after hours of negotiating over specific words, so that they would not appear to be wholly endorsing the plan.

What followed was a scuffle that left at least some of the military lawyers embittered and stoked old tensions at the Pentagon between civilian leaders and uniformed military officers, who under Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld have often found themselves privately at odds.

Early Thursday morning, White House allies distributed the letter that the lawyers had signed, as evidence that the group, known as Jags, now supported the administration plan.

That prompted loud protests from Republican senators opposed to the plan. They dismissed the letter on grounds that the lawyers would have signed it only under pressure.

The truth lies somewhere in between, said one of the senior lawyers and other current and former military officials familiar with their views.

"I didn't have any problem signing what I signed," Maj. Gen. Charles J. Dunlap Jr., deputy judge advocate general of the Air Force, said Friday in an interview. "How people use it and what they use it for I can't control."

General Dunlap represented the Air Force at the meeting because the top lawyer was out of town.

A spokesman for the Pentagon, Bryan Whitman, said it was nonsense to suggest that the military lawyers had been coerced, a point that General Dunlap agreed with.

"Do you really think that an officer with 30 years' service could be coerced by the Pentagon bureaucracy to sign something he didn't want to sign?" General Dunlap asked.

Of the five senior military lawyers, just General Dunlap agreed to comment for the record. Spokesmen for the other four — from the Army, Marines, Navy and Joint Chiefs of Staff — said those senior lawyers would not speak publicly because of the sensitivity of the topic.

Other military officials insisted on anonymity, saying the lawyers' experience had demonstrated the perils of active-duty officers' speaking openly about sensitive subjects.

The views of professional military lawyers have been much sought after in the five-year debate over what permissible techniques in the fight against terrorism.

In early 2002, the administration brushed aside the objections of the military's most senior uniformed lawyers to the original plans for military commissions. When the lawyers' role as dissenters became known later, they were lauded by human rights advocates and others as having tried to be an independent voice and brake on the administration.

According to documents released last year, the military lawyers later objected strenuously to the conclusions of an administration legal group that said in early 2003 that President Bush had authority as commander in chief to order harsh interrogations of Guantánamo Bay detainees.

In public testimony to Congress last month, the lawyers voiced objections to specific parts of the White House plan, which was an effort to resurrect the Guantánamo military commissions that the Supreme Court struck down. Most significant, the lawyers disputed the provision prohibiting defendants from access to classified evidence against them.

The top uniformed Marine lawyer, Brig. Gen. James C. Walker, said in his testimony that no civilized country ought to deny defendants the right to see evidence against them and that the United States "should not be the first.'' The lawyers stand by those objections, military officials said.

The letter signed on Wednesday focused instead on two different parts of the White House proposal, the provision amending Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and a provision of the War Crimes Act that enforces that article.

Mr. Haynes drafted the letter focusing on these provisions because neither had been a sticking point in the military lawyers' objections. But when the lawyers reached Mr. Haynes's office, they declined to sign immediately, people with knowledge of the meeting said.

The lawyers spent more than an hour huddled in a private room wrangling over language they could agree on and trying to call Rear Adm. Bruce MacDonald, the Navy judge advocate general.

A participant in the meeting said Admiral MacDonald told his colleagues that he could not sign a letter saying he supported the Common Article 3 definition in the White House legislation because he advocated a broader definition that relied more on international law, rather than a narrow interpretation of American constitutional law.

In the end, the military lawyers all agreed to language in the letter saying they "do not object" to the provisions in the administration bill.

But the letter included a sentence that the clarification would be "helpful to our fighting men and women at war on behalf of their country."

White House officials said that sentence demonstrated the military lawyers' support.

General Dunlap said in his mind that signing the letter meant just to convey that trying to clarify ambiguous language was helpful and that it did not mean that he and his colleagues fully endorsed the administration view.

The Question Of Liability Stirs Concern At The C.I.A. (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — Behind the debate between Congress and the White House over the proper treatment of terror suspects is an old fear at the Central Intelligence Agency: that officers could be vulnerable to lawsuits, or even criminal prosecution, for actions they believed at the time complied with administration policy.

Legislation proposed by the White House would address that concern head-on by offering retroactive protection for some actions taken since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Specifically, it would amend the War Crimes Act to prohibit only certain "serious violations" of a provision of the Geneva Conventions, including torture, murder and other clearly unsanctioned acts.

The distinction is a crucial one, because the War Crimes Act prohibits any violation of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which outlaws "outrages upon personal dignity" and "humiliating and degrading treatment." In view of the Supreme Court's ruling in June that Common Article 3 applies to all interrogations of terror suspects, some harsh techniques used by C.I.A. or military officers since 2001 could be viewed as illegal under the existing law.

The plan favored by the White House bans what it defines as "serious violations of Common Article 3," including murder, torture and the use of biological experiments. The alternative favored by a group of Republican senators led by Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, does not introduce any such distinction.

The two plans also differ in their treatment of past abuses. The White House plan would be retroactive to Sept. 11, 2001, while senators working with Mr. Warner say their approach avoids dealing with past events because of legal and constitutional concerns. The senators say they believe that past abuses should be reviewed case by case.

A. John Radsan, assistant general counsel at the C.I.A. from 2002 to 2004, said he thought the legal exposure for officers involved in capturing and interrogating suspects since 2001 was not as great as some feared. But Mr. Radsan said he understood their concern.

"Their perspective is that they got authorization, they got legal advice and they did the difficult, dirty work of the war on terror," said Mr. Radsan, now at the William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul. "They think they should not suffer because someone changed the rules."

Mr. Radsan and other legal experts said Friday that it was highly unlikely that intelligence officers could be prosecuted in American courts for their actions in interrogating terror suspects. Similarly, they said, lawsuits filed by former prisoners would probably face insurmountable hurdles in American courts.

But some said future investigations by Congress or a C.I.A. inspector general were quite possible and could bring the daunting prospect of high legal fees or devastating news coverage.

Nearly 100 terror suspects have spent time in C.I.A. custody since the Sept. 11 attacks, President Bush acknowledged publicly last week, when he announced the transfer of the last 14 of them to military custody in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Mr. Bush has defended the interrogation program and has said it should not be disbanded, but he has said his legislation is necessary to provide clear legal guidelines to interrogators. Within the C.I.A. and the military, concern about possible repercussions against interrogators has increased since 2004, when disclosure of the abuses at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and elsewhere prompted a tightening of the guidelines on interrogation.

The first such step came in December 2004, when the Justice Department formally withdrew a controversial 2002 legal memorandum, intended primarily as a guideline for the C.I.A. interrogation program, that had defined torture as treatment leading to organ failure.

Last December, over White House objections, Congress passed an amendment proposed by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, that explicitly outlawed "cruel, inhuman and degrading" treatment of prisoners. Finally, in June, the Supreme Court ruled that Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, contrary to what the administration had argued for nearly five years, did apply to all prisoners captured in the campaign against terrorism.

With the possibility that the Democrats could win control of one or both houses of Congress in the November elections, the prospect of aggressive, public investigations of detainee treatment also looms.

Jack L. Goldsmith, a law professor at Harvard who served in the Defense Department and the Justice Department under Mr. Bush, said the shifting legal atmosphere made fear of criminal or civil liability on the part of C.I.A. and military personnel "a completely genuine concern, even if it seems far-fetched."

Suzanne Spaulding, a former assistant general counsel at the C.I.A., said agency officers could face legal liability abroad. Ms. Spaulding said some countries had asserted jurisdiction over war crimes committed anywhere in the world. And C.I.A. officers involved in the seizing of a Muslim cleric in Milan in 2003 faced an arrest order in Italy.

A C.I.A. spokesman, Mark Mansfield, acknowledged officers' concerns about possible legal troubles, but he said those concerns should not be exaggerated.

Mr. Mansfield said, for example, that while many C.I.A. officers, including polygraph examiners, members of promotion boards and interrogators, had long had professional liability insurance, he had seen no evidence of a recent increase in purchases of such insurance, the cost of which is reimbursed by the agency.

"It is fair to say that C.I.A. officers are mindful of these situations and developments,'' Mr. Mansfield said, "but it's unwise to make generalizations or sweeping statements about levels of concern. That said, we have a very important mission to carry out — helping to protect the country — and that has been and continues to be the paramount concern."

Bush Proposal May Slow Abuse Prosecutions (LAT)

By Andrew Zajac And Cam Simpson, Chicago Tribune

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

The president wants to narrow the definition of war crimes. But that could make it harder to win indictments in some Abu Ghraib cases.

WASHINGTON — When the Muslim world was first inflamed over images of abuse from the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, President Bush took the lead in a campaign to minimize the damage by pledging that his government would speak through its actions.

"There will be investigations. People will be brought to justice," Bush said on May 5, 2004, speaking from the Map Room of the White House and into the lens of a camera for Al Arabiya, the Arabic-language satellite network.

But more than two years later, provisions in Bush's proposed legislation for detainee interrogations and terrorism tribunals could hamper potential criminal prosecutions in some of the 17 abuse investigations from Iraq and Afghanistan pending before federal prosecutors in Virginia.

The CIA's former assistant general counsel, a defense attorney for one veteran intelligence officer under scrutiny in a pending investigation, and outside military-law experts all said Bush's proposal would retroactively weaken the U.S. law against war crimes, possibly making it more difficult to win criminal indictments in those cases.

Bush's plan would backdate a more narrow definition of war crimes to Sept. 11, 2001, the day terrorists crashed jets into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The proposal seems to fit a broader pattern of Bush administration efforts to protect interrogators working for the CIA and the Department of Defense, or to find ways to keep the law in question, the 1996 War Crimes Act, from applying to post-Sept. 11 actions.

Another provision in Bush's proposal would mandate taxpayer-financed legal defenses for intelligence agents charged or sued in connection with detainee abuse.

Even those simply under investigation would get their legal bills paid under the plan, presumably including those involved in the 17 pending cases.

Although Bush was commenting on the future of interrogations, and not his proposed legislation's potential effect on the pending cases, the president said Friday that he wanted to give intelligence operatives confidence to proceed.

"These are decent, honorable citizens who are on the front line of protecting the American people, and they expect our government to give them clarity about what is right and what is wrong in the law. And that's what we have asked to do," Bush said.

One pending investigation in Virginia involves the death of Manadel Jamadi, an alleged Iraqi insurgent. Images of his battered corpse, which was packed in ice, were aired by ABC's "World News Tonight" the same day in 2004 that Bush made his pledge to prosecute abusers. It was soon dubbed the "iceman" case.

Nina Ginsberg, the attorney representing 47-year-old Mark Swanner, a veteran CIA officer who interrogated Jamadi before the prisoner's death, said in an interview Thursday that she believed the administration was attempting to use its proposed legislation to retroactively immunize or protect interrogators now under investigation.

Although she said it would be difficult to indict some of the Pentagon and CIA interrogators under investigation even if Bush's bill is rejected by Congress, Ginsberg said there was no other explanation for the retroactive nature of the changes proposed by the White House except to protect operatives already under scrutiny.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty, who as the U.S. attorney in Alexandria, Va., oversaw the 17 pending cases before becoming the Justice Department's acting No. 2 lawyer in November, did not deny during a brief interview Friday that the legislation would retroactively affect the investigations.

But asked about the potential effects, McNulty would only say, "I don't want to say…. The best I can say right now is [an answer] would probably reveal more about those cases involved than has been publicly said."

All of the cases assigned to Virginia remain secret, and no one has been charged. John Radsan, assistant general counsel at the CIA from 2002 to 2004, suggested that bringing charges against agency officers in any of the cases is already a difficult proposition — legally, practically and politically.

But Radsan also said, "This legislation will make it even more difficult to bring a case against a CIA officer for violating the War Crimes Act," because it would significantly limit the definition of a war crime.

Eugene Fidel, a military law expert in Washington and president of the National Institute of Military Justice, said the Bush proposal "would make it much more difficult for federal prosecutors to even take those cases into court."

Fidel added, "The prosecutor could just say, 'What you did doesn't even fall within the War Crimes Act anymore; therefore I'm not even going to paper it,' " that is, bring charges. He predicted that some of the investigations would "turn out to be unprosecutable because of this legislation."

Jim Rybicki, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Alexandria, confirmed that 17 abuse investigations remain open but declined to discuss any details.

The New Yorker magazine first identified Swanner's connection to the Jamadi case last year.

A Justice Department memo written in January said 20 investigations related to detainee abuse allegations in Iraq and Afghanistan had been referred for prosecution.

Ten came from the Defense Department, the memo said, while the remainder came from "another agency," a reference to the CIA.

Only one, that of CIA contract interrogator David A. Passaro, has been prosecuted. He was convicted in Raleigh, N.C., last month of felony assault for beating an Afghan prisoner who died one day after being pummeled with fists and a flashlight, evidence showed.

Passaro was indicted before then-Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft set up the special prosecution team in Virginia.

The Justice memo said two of the 20 cases were closed without charges because "the department has determined in each of them that there was insufficient evidence to support a prosecution."

In a statement Friday, the Justice Department declined to comment "on ongoing criminal investigations." But the agency, which is supporting Bush's push for the legislation, said there has never been a War Crimes Act prosecution because the statute is too vague.

Dispute Centers On Reading Of Geneva Convention (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

President Bush on Friday pushed for passage of his military tribunals bill, asking Congress to clarify the meaning of the Geneva Convention to allow the CIA to continue detaining and interrogating prisoners under a formerly secret program. The issue has grown more divisive between Bush and other Republicans.

Question: What are the similarities and differences between the president's proposal and the one supported by Sen. John McCain?

Answer: Both would set up special courts known as military commissions to try detainees. The bill supported by McCain, several other Republicans and many Democrats would give detainees greater legal rights, including more rights to see evidence used against them, than Bush's proposal.

The main difference has to do with how each of the bills would apply the Geneva Convention — in particular the provision known as Common Article 3. McCain's bill would apply the protections without interpreting them, whereas Bush's proposal would "clarify" them in a way that could give the CIA greater latitude in the way it treats detainees.

Q: What is Common Article 3?

A: It is a provision of the treaty that provides a minimum level of protection for any fighter involved in a civil war and for unlawful combatants — such as terrorists or insurgents — in all conflicts.

Q: The president contends Common Article 3 is vague. Is it?

A: Common Article 3 bans "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." Bush says it is subject to interpretation. However, international law experts say the article is not vague — at least no more so than any other law or treaty. Fifty years of case law and commentary define the article, and many military lawyers say they have a good idea of what is allowed and what isn't.

Q: Why does the president say that the CIA detention and interrogation program could not continue without redefining Common Article 3?

A: It depends on what the CIA does while detaining and interrogating prisoners, and few people outside the agency know with certainty what they do. Some experts on Geneva say there are many tough tactics — such as "stress positions" that cause discomfort, or limited sensory deprivation — that have recently been banned by the U.S. military but not by the CIA. Some of those tactics may not violate Common Article 3. But tactics causing unbearable pain to break prisoners would violate Common Article 3.

Q: Is "water-boarding" — a method that makes prisoners feel as though they are drowning — allowable under Common Article 3?

A: No.

Q: Does the CIA use water-boarding?

A: The CIA has used water-boarding as an interrogation tactic, U.S. officials have said.

Q: Does it still use water-boarding?

A: The agency won't answer the question — which could mean that it still does, or that it wants terrorists to think it still does. The U.S. government, which considers simulated drowning a form of torture, has said the military will not use the tactic. But that ban explicitly leaves out the CIA.

Q: Do these bills spell out which tactics can and can't be used during interrogations?

A: No, not specifically. They mainly define how much latitude interrogators have, and how closely they must observe the Geneva Convention's terms.

Q: Administration officials say that if the McCain bill passes, CIA interrogators will be subjected to civil suits and prosecution for violating Common Article 3. Will they?

A: McCain's bill bans civil suits based on the Geneva Convention. It also offers other protections from criminal prosecution, by saying that U.S. forces can be prosecuted only for a "grave breach" of Common Article 3, including torture, murder, and "cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment." Administration lawyers want better retroactive protections for interrogators and more coverage in international courts. They say they can only get that by clarifying the meaning of the convention.

Q: Critics of the president's plan have said that redefining Geneva would put U.S. troops at risk. Has Common Article 3 ever protected an American service member?

A: Yes. In 1993, the United States invoked Common Article 3 protections for Chief Warrant Officer Michael J. Durant, who was captured by Somali warlords. Because he was not the prisoner of a government and because Somalia was embroiled in a civil war, traditional Geneva prisoner-of-war protections did not apply. Although Durant had been roughly treated initially, the militants ultimately decided to observe Common Article 3 and allowed the Red Cross to visit Durant.

Q: Would Common Article 3 protect U.S. forces in current conflicts?

A: Yes. Common Article 3 would protect a U.S. soldier captured by a rebel group in Afghanistan, the Philippines or Colombia — if the captors observed it.

Position On Detainee Trials Comes At Political Risk For GOP Senators (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - One endured torture as a prisoner of war in Vietnam. One is a former Navy secretary and stalwart supporter of the military's priorities. One is a former military lawyer and a judge in the Air Force reserves.

All three are Republican senators, and together they're battling President Bush over how to handle detainees in the war on terrorism.

These three senators - John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, respectively - say Bush's plan would damage U.S. credibility around the world, jeopardize the lives of U.S. troops captured in future wars and deny basic legal and human rights to suspected terrorists in U.S. custody. They're using their combined stature to advance a competing, bipartisan proposal.

But by their stand, each of the three senators is taking a substantial political risk.

"They think this is more important than politics," said John Hutson, former Judge Advocate General for the Navy.

McCain could alienate conservative Republicans when he needs them most. For several years he's worked hard to gain the trust of conservative Bush allies skeptical of his maverick streak.

He's worked his way into being the odds-on favorite to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, but now he's breaking with his party's president on an issue that threatens to undermine Republican strategy for November's congressional elections - following Bush's leadership on national security. That could hurt him.

And he knows it. On Friday, while reiterating his opposition to Bush's plan, he released a statement whose first line read, "I respect very much the president's unwavering determination to protect America from terrorist attack." Still, he opposes Bush.

Katon Dawson, the Republican Party chairman in South Carolina, a key 2008 primary state, said: "South Carolina is certainly Bush country. Overwhelmingly, the communications we're getting are supporting the president. Obviously, the president is right on this issue. I think John McCain thinks he's right - McCain and Warner and Graham. I think people on the ground think they're wrong."

Graham could reap opposition to his re-election within his South Carolina base. Many conservative activists already were frustrated with him for blocking a conservative judicial nominee's confirmation and supporting legislation that would allow illegal immigrants to stay in the country.

"You just don't even know how people are bent out of shape!" said Kristin Maguire, a member of the state Republican Party's executive committee. "The holier-than-thou attitude of `I'm the attorney, I understand this better than you.'

"He has undermined this being an election point this year. He's taking it off the plate and he's making it easier for Democrats to run against incumbent Republicans in weak seats by making it OK to be weak on terrorism and national security."

In an interview Friday, Graham stood his ground.

"This is one of the most important things I will ever do. What experience I've had in life is relevant here. I think I owe it to my state and my nation to apply it in a way that's reasonable and constructive. Whatever political risk might come my way pales in comparison with our soldiers and other people who are risking everything they have, including their lives," Graham said.

Warner, 79, a World War II veteran and former Navy secretary, is slated to give up his chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee after this year. He enjoys broad bipartisan support in Virginia and is less obviously at risk by his stand.

Yet the renegade role doesn't come easily to this consummate diplomat and staunch Republican. Nevertheless, he takes great pride in defending the military, and many senior military leaders oppose Bush's position.

Warner implored reporters not to interpret his stand as defiance of Bush: "I still think we can work it through - I do not think negotiations have broken down."

If Democrats win control of the House of Representatives or the Senate in November, all three senators could suffer the sting of blame.

The House is poised to pass the administration's bill next week. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., favors it, too.

But with the support of most, if not all, Senate Democrats and a handful of moderate Northeastern Republicans, the three senators are expected to prevail in the Senate.

"These are people who have lived it," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee. He was speaking of McCain, Graham and Warner.

Rear Adm. Harry Harris War Inside The Wire (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0064381

By James Taranto

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba -- You might call Rear Adm. Harry Harris a jailer. As commander of Joint Task Force Guantanamo, a job he has held for six months, he is in charge of one of the world's best-known detention facilities. But if you call this place a prison, he will correct you.

"Prisons are about rehabilitation and punishment," Adm. Harris told me in a phone conversation last week, reiterating a point he had made a few days earlier in a briefing for visiting journalists here. "What we are about is keeping enemy combatants off the battlefield. . . . The enemy combatants that we have here were captured on the battlefield or running from the battlefield, and they were engaged in combat operations against Americans, and in many cases killed Americans. What we're trying to do here in Guantanamo is simply keep them off the battlefield, because we know that many of them would go back to the fight."

In fact, Adm. Harris says, many of them have kept fighting even while in captivity. They are carrying out coordinated actions with the apparent goals of disrupting the camp's operations, furthering anti-American propaganda, and wounding and intimidating the servicemen who guard them. * * *

One such action unfolded on May 18. Early that Thursday morning, guards patrolling the high-security Camp 1 (one of five numbered detention areas, with a sixth under construction) found two detainees who had attempted suicide. "One was found unconscious," Adm. Harris recalls, "and then another one was found a little later, frothing at the mouth, if you will. It looked like . . . poisoning of some sort." Both survived, although one took seven days to regain consciousness, and the other took four days. Neither had a prescription for any drug, "so they had to get the meds from other detainees somehow."

To prevent more suicide attempts, "the detention group commander ordered a shakedown of all the cells. He was going through each of the cells looking for contraband, looking for pills. He found some, throughout the day. He found some hidden around the toilet area; he found some hidden in the bindings of the Holy Quran." (Each detainee receives a personal Quran in his native language, which non-Muslim guards are forbidden to touch.)

Early in the evening, the search reached Camp 4, the least restrictive of the detention areas. Unlike in the other camps, detainees in Camp 4 are not confined to individual cells but bunk communally and congregate in fenced yards. This is where the detainees live who are most compliant with camp rules. But on that day in May, their cooperation came to an end.

A guard noticed a detainee who appeared to be trying to hang himself. "The detainee had put a sheet in the ceiling around the lights and built what looked like a noose and was putting his head toward that noose," Adm. Harris says. "The quick-reaction force rushed into that [cell] block to save the life of the individual they thought was trying to kill himself. When they got in there, the detainees had slickened the floor with feces, urine and soapy water," making it hard for the guards to keep their footing.

"They proceeded to attack the guard force. . . . The attack was obviously planned. They managed to get a guard down on the ground. They attacked him with broken light fixtures, with fan blades and with [security] cameras that they had torn off to use as bludgeoning weapons. In that process the NCOIC [noncommissioned officer in charge] made the call -- a gutsy call -- to fire less-than-lethal rounds at the detainees. . . . All that took about three to five minutes. . . . The disturbance was quelled. No one was seriously injured, either the guards or the detainees.

"But at the same time, detainees in two adjacent blocks erupted and tore up their blocks completely -- tore down all the lights, tore up all the fans, tore down all the cameras, and all that kind of stuff. They didn't attack the guards, but they did manage to tear up the blocks." In only one Camp 4 cell block did the detainees not riot: "When the uprising, or whatever you call it, happened, they went back into their block very quietly and stood by the beds," Adm. Harris says. "Today, those are the only residents of Camp 4." When I toured the camp, I saw perhaps eight of them, dressed in white, lolling about their outdoor yard. The other blocks are being repaired and made more secure, at a cost to the taxpayer of about $800,000.

Camp 1 is also unoccupied, undergoing repairs owing to the discovery of another sabotage scheme. Cells in Camp 1 were equipped with spring-operated faucets, and the detainees "managed to figure out how to take that apart and . . . pull the spring out. The spring, when it's fully stretched out, is probably a foot long, and it can be used as a weapon to jab someone in the neck or to jab someone in the eye. They would take that spring and hide it in the waistband of their pants. . . . This is just another indication of the creativity that the detainees have as they plan things against us." * * *

Before Camp 1 closed, three detainees there -- two Saudis and a Yemeni -- succeeded in killing themselves. On the morning of June 10, guards found the trio, all in the same cell block, hanged with clothing and bedsheets.

Domestic foes of the war on terror wasted no time in trying to co-opt the detainees' martyrdom for their own cause. Human Rights Watch claimed that the detainees had suffered from "incredible despair" because they had been "completely cut off from the world." The New York Times editorialized that the suicides were "the inevitable result of creating a netherworld of despair beyond the laws of civilized nations."

Adm. Harris had a different view. "I believe this was not an act of desperation but an act of asymmetrical warfare waged against us," he said at the time -- and he stands by that statement. In response, the Times scolded the admiral for displaying "a profound disassociation from humanity."

His case is the stronger one. The proximity and simultaneity of the suicides argue that they were coordinated rather than spontaneous. Although some detainees suffer from mental illnesses, for which they receive treatment at the camp infirmary, there is no evidence that these three did. "They recently had been given . . . a psychiatric evaluation, and they were all fine," Adm. Harris tells me. It may be hard to comprehend the mentality of one who would kill himself to make a political statement, but to doubt that these men could do so is to test the limits of fatuity. After all, that is exactly what 19 of their comrades did five years ago Monday.

The case against Guantanamo rests on a web of falsehood. Far from being held "beyond the laws of civilized nations" -- laws that terrorists, by definition, reject -- the detainees here enjoy a panoply of procedural protections. All except the 14 recent arrivals have gone before Combatant Status Review Tribunals to re-examine their designation as enemy combatants -- even though these "Article V" hearings are required under international law only if that designation is in doubt, and under the U.S. Supreme Court's 2004 Hamdi v. Rumsfeld ruling if the detainee is a U.S. citizen. (Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told me last week that the newly arrived detainees had not yet received Article V hearings but would.) In addition, each detainee annually goes before an Administrative Review Board, analogous to a parole hearing, which determines whether he can be released without harming U.S. security.

These processes are not mere window dressing. As President Bush noted in a speech last week, some 315 of 770 Guantanamo detainees have been released from U.S. custody, either through one of these proceedings or through informal processes that predated them. More than a dozen of the freed detainees, Mr. Bush added, are known to have returned to the battlefield, suggesting that the procedures are, if anything, too lenient.

Many detainees also have petitioned for habeas corpus since the Supreme Court's 2004 Rasul v. Bush ruling; and of course trials for the four detainees who've been charged with war crimes have been delayed only because Osama bin Laden's bodyguard was able to avail himself of our appellate courts to challenge the legality of the proceedings.

Likewise, it is nonsense to say the detainees are "completely cut off from the world." There is no solitary confinement at Guantanamo; even at maximum-security Camp 5, the cells have outside light and openings in the doors through which detainees can communicate with one another. They have ample contact with the world beyond the camp, too. "Over 40,000 pieces of mail have come in and out of here," Adm. Harris says. "If you chose to write one of them a letter, all you'd need to do is put their name on it, say 'Guantanamo Bay, Cuba,' put our ZIP code on it, and they will get that letter.

"Most of the detainees have lawyers," the admiral adds. "There are over 900 habeas lawyers representing less than 450 detainees," and the lawyers are free to visit their clients. Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross "come down for almost a month at a time, four times a year, and then [for shorter periods] at other times, and they have unfettered access to any detainee they want to see, whenever they want to see them." * * *

When the Supreme Court extended habeas rights to the detainees, it created a loophole in camp security. Guards screen and censor mail to and from the detainees, but communications with their lawyers are privileged and confidential. "We don't look at the envelope, or in the envelope, at all," Adm. Harris says. "I believe that the detainees could have abused that privilege and used it as an informal mail system" by passing notes to other detainees in envelopes from lawyers. Adm. Harris is careful to note that he does not believe the lawyers are complicit in any abuse, and that he has no ability to confirm his suspicions: "If it's written correspondence, and it's in the habeas envelope, then we cannot get to it."

What is clear is that the detainees have brought more-restrictive conditions on themselves, through suicide, sabotage and other disruptive actions. The erstwhile Camp 4 rioters were relocated to higher-security camps, and the opening of Camp 6, a modern facility modeled on a medium-security prison in Michigan, has been delayed so that officials can harden its security.

"There is such a thing as a medium-security prisoner," Adm. Harris says. "I believe there is no such thing as a medium-security terrorist."

Tortured Logic On Terror (NSL)

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), September 16, 2006

No one could ever accuse President Bush of self-doubt. Even as Senate Republicans have bro ken with his administration's position on terrorist detainee trials and interrogation only two months before midterm elections, the president remains defiantly confident of his path.

DOJ_NMG_0064383

Some would call this principled. Others would say it's pig- headed. In this case, the principle -- a president's responsibility to the nation's security -- blinds Bush to the fact that the methods he favors are self-defeating. They compromise rather than ensure Americans' security, and therefore they are indefensible.

In a testy press conference yesterday, Bush disputed Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee -- including Sen. John McCain of Ari zona -- who have sided with Democrats in offering an alternative bill to the White House's proposals for detaining and trying terrorist suspects. The bill, though flawed, is clear in its op position to the White House's views on torture.

Even former Secretary of State Colin Powell, the good soldier, joined the fray. In a letter backing committee Republicans, he argued that Bush's desire to rewrite the Geneva Conventions dealing with prisoner treatment would make the world further doubt "the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

Such views rile the president but don't sway him. That's frightening because the dangers he sees ahead are real. He's mistaken to think dealing with them harshly is the same as dealing with them effectively.

Condoning torture -- or, as the president puts it, "clarifying" the clause of the Geneva Conventions Common Article 3 that prohibits "outrages upon personal dignity" -- virtually as sures further erosion of international support for the U.S. and guarantees that our own soldiers could be endangered.

During his press conference, Bush accurately discussed the likelihood that "the enemy wants to attack us again." He's correct to say intelligence officials need tools for interrogat ing terror suspects. (He's less persuasive when he argues al Qaeda would have been able to strike the U.S. again had it not been for information gathered through means the U.S. Supreme Court has questioned. Interrogators might also have gotten that information without breaking international law. In fact, the Pentagon has determined that torture is ineffective.)

What Bush still doesn't seem to get -- three years after his administration misguidedly, in the name of national secu rity, launched a nearly unilateral effort to unseat Saddam Hussein and fostered the abuses of Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo -- is that while his analysis of the threat might be accurate, his approach hasn't worked. The battle against terrorism and those who favor it should be fought on higher ground.

Gen. John Vessey Jr., a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, summed it up neatly in a letter to McCain in which he noted that while previous enemies have also been vicious and cruel, Americans have always held to their values when fighting them. "We should continue to do so," Ves sey wrote.

Indeed.

Please, Explain, Sen. McCain (WT)

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

President Bush wasted no time yesterday responding to the Senate Armed Services Committee's passage of legislation that could damage the ability of intelligence agencies to obtain information from terrorist detainees. On Thursday, four Republican members of the Senate Armed Services Committee -- Chairman John Warner and John McCain, Lindsey Graham and Susan Collins -- joined the committee's Democrats in passing flawed legislation governing detainee treatment that fails to respond to Mr. Bush's critical request. The lawmakers must clarify what interrogators can and cannot do when interrogating suspected jihadists.

Yesterday, the president suggested that the committee's refusal to define what interrogation methods were permissible under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions could force the CIA to shut down a program that has gained invaluable intelligence about al Qaeda. Mr. Bush noted, for example, that Common Article 3 includes language barring "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment" of someone who is being interrogated. "That's very vague. What does that mean?" the president asked. He warned that intelligence professionals on the front lines of the war could not do their job interrogating detainees if Congress refused "to put clarity in the law." Congress, Mr. Bush added, "has a decision to make" about whether it wanted the program to continue -- something the Senate Armed Services Committee has now put in jeopardy.

Given all that the program has accomplished, it would be difficult to imagine a more irresponsible decision on the part of Congress. As Mr. Bush pointed out in a speech earlier this month, American forces captured Abu Zubaydah -- a top bin laden aide who ran terrorist camps in which some of the September 11 hijackers trained -- several months after the September 11 attacks. Zubaydah, who was wounded on the battlefield, survived only because of medical treatment from the CIA, After he recovered, Zubaydah refused to cooperate with U.S. interrogators. So, the CIA, used an unspecified "alternative" set of interrogation methods approved by Justice Department lawyers. Eventually, Zubaydah cracked and provided information that enabled the military to prevent an al Qaeda terrorist attack inside the United States.

Zubaydah also provided information that lead to the capture of Khalid Sheikh Mohammad and Ramzi Binalshibh, who helped organize the September 11 attacks. They also led authorities to the capture of the leader al Qaeda's south Asian affiliate,

Hambali, and 17 operatives. When he learned that his terror cell had been broken up, Hambali acknowledged that the terrorists were being prepared for new attacks on the United States, probably using airplanes, Mr. Bush added.

This is just a partial listing of what the CIA has learned as a result of the CIA program that the Senate Armed Services Committee has put at risk.

But the concerns expressed by Mr. Bush and CIA Director Michael Hayden have failed to budge Mr. McCain. On Thursday, the Arizona Republican disparaged Mr. Hayden's legitimate concerns about the Senate bill as an attempt to "protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation." It's a cheap shot. Mr. McCain should explain why he is endangering a vital interrogation program that has saved many American lives.

Europe, US Deadlocked On Air Security (FT)

By Jimmy Burns In London, Andrew Bounds In Brussels And Doug Cameron In Chicago

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Attempts to find transatlantic agreement on counter-terror measures for the airline industry are floundering as governments and aviation experts argue about which security rules would be most effective.

UK airline and airport authorities on Friday revealed there was still no agreement on what measures could best ease the disruption and economic costs to the industry while keeping passengers safe from terrorist attacks.

The UK and the US have maintained stricter airline security regimes than most European states since British police foiled an alleged plot to blow up transatlantic jets with liquid explosives.

One leading London-based international transport security adviser warned on Friday that the UK department of transport would leave passengers vulnerable to terrorist attack if it went ahead with announced plans to relax restrictions on the size of hand baggage next week.

Sally Leivesley, a scientific adviser on emergency planning, told the Financial Times: “Size does matter because the technology does not exist commercially to screen adequately potentially lethal liquids in hand baggage. We risk once again offering a potential tool to a suicide bomber when the terrorist threat to the airline industry remains high.”

Meanwhile, Brussels’ top negotiator on Friday warned that transatlantic travellers faced chaos next month unless the US dropped its demands for greater access to airline passenger data from the European Union.

The EU and the US have struggled to forge a new agreement on sharing passenger data after the European Court of Justice struck down the accord and ordered that it expire on September 30.

Jonathan Faull, who runs the justice and home affairs department of the European Commission, said: “We hope to persuade the Americans in the next couple of weeks to conclude an understanding that is the same as the one we had. If we don’t get an agreement by the end of the month, what is likely to happen is, I’m afraid, chaos.”

US officials indicated they did not plan to drop demands for wider access to EU passenger data.

Passenger pre-screening and improved backround information remain the main planks of the US Transport Security Administration’s policy. The US aviation industry is still on a heightened Orange alert status. A ban on liquids and gels – introduced on August 10 – remains in place.

But, without a legal framework, any individual could lodge a legal challenge against an airline that sent details of their passport, address, dietary requirements and other information to the US authorities.

The prospect of last-minute haggling leaves airlines with much uncertainty.

Tapes Roll On Sting's Details (ALBANYTU)

Mosque leader heard to warn FBI informant on apparent support of terrorist group

ALBANY -- The spiritual leader of an Albany mosque warned an undercover FBI informant that he needed to be careful and quiet about his support of terrorists who were purported to be planning to kill the president of Pakistan, according to government transcripts of their secretly recorded conversations.

The statements were part of a series of conversations that took place as the FBI listened in while their informant baited two Albany men with cash he said came from the sale of shoulder-fired missiles to terrorists in New York City.

For eight months beginning in late 2003, the informant gave the pair thousands in cash that was paid back to him through checks written out to his business by Mohammed Hossain. The pizza shop owner is charged in the case along with Yassin Aref, the jailed imam of a Central Avenue mosque.

Aref, 36, and Hossain, 51, face up to 400 years in prison if convicted of the charges. They are accused of helping launder the proceeds from the fictitious plot, in which the informant said he made money selling Chinese-made missile launchers to terrorists.

Their attorneys have disputed the allegations, contending the men were unwitting participants in the scheme who believed they were only taking a loan and not supportive of the informant's terrorist dealings.

No part of the plot was real, but it was based on an actual terrorist organization, Jaish-e-Mohammed, an Islamic extremist group based in Pakistan that had been threatening to kill that country's president, Pervez Musharraf. The informant claimed to be dealing arms to terrorists from that group who were plotting to kill a Pakistani ambassador near the United Nations in Manhattan.

Aref told the informant he was not familiar with that organization, except for what little he had learned of their background watching television. He never told the informant that he supported the group, their cause, or, wanted them to succeed. Mostly, Aref spoke to the informant about Islamic beliefs and their context in relation to Middle East conflicts.

The FBI's informant, a Pakistani immigrant who is expected to testify next week, had been arrested years earlier in a case involving fraudulent driver's licenses. He agreed to cooperate in order to gain leniency.

On Friday, the federal jury at their trial listened to hours of tapes recorded during the sting. In one instance, Aref did not dissuade the informant from supporting terrorism.

"I say if you believe they are doing right and working for Allah and you help them for Allah, go ahead," Yassin Aref, in broken English, told the informant during a meeting in January 2004. "But, of course, you should to be careful and ... you should to know they looking for any person they have any kind of link with that group. And if they find any link between you and that group, you should to know, you are going to be in the trouble."

The statements were included in more than 50 hours of tape recordings made by the FBI during the year-long sting operation targeting Aref, a Kurdish refugee who moved to the United States seven years ago.

Hossain is not accused of harboring sympathies for terrorists. Rather, the case against him is built on a government theory that he embraced the informant's illicit arms dealing because he was desperate for money, never walking away even when the informant pulled out a shoulder-fired missile during one of their early meetings in December 2003. For his part, authorities said, Hossain was to receive $5,000 cash, authorities said.

Aref is not accused of profiting in the scheme. Rather, federal prosecutors contend he was brought in to witness the deal.

Kassim Shaar, an acquaintance of Aref's who now lives in Michigan, took the stand briefly Friday and recounted having dinner at Aref's house in February 2004. He said that afternoon the informant, whom he had never met, arrived with Hossain and the three other men began exchanging money and papers.

Suddenly, Shaar said, the informant blurted out something that unsettled him greatly.

"He said there was an attack coming to New York City ... a missile attack," Shaar said.

Aref appeared startled by the abrupt disclosure and patted the informant's body looking for a recording device, which he was wearing but was not discovered.

U.S. District Judge Thomas J. McAvoy declined to allow prosecutors to press Shaar on what happened next, when he allegedly wanted to call the police but was stopped by Aref, who assured him the man had been joking.

"You thought he was joking, didn't you?" asked Aref's attorney, Terence L. Kindlon. "Right," Shaar replied.

Federal authorities have admitted that Aref, whom they contend was aligned with terrorist figures overseas, was the "ultimate target" of their investigation. Their interest stemmed from allegations that his name and address were found in suspected terrorist encampments during the invasion of Iraq.

While that information sparked the FBI's investigation, the federal judge in the case has prohibited prosecutors from putting forth testimony about the terrorist camps during the trial, in part because the information is not relevant to the sting case.

Hossain is not alleged to have overseas ties to terrorists.

Following his arrest on August 5, 2004, Hossain allegedly denied knowing the missile was a weapon and told an FBI agent that he believed it was a "plumbing supply," according to testimony Friday. But an undercover videotape of that meeting, which took place in November 2003, clearly shows the informant hoisting the missile launcher onto his shoulder as he tells Hossain that it's headed for New York City.

Special Agent Timothy Coll, who headed the investigation, testified Friday that Hossain told him he thought the informant "was joking."

Aref was also questioned following his arrest and told agents that the money transactions were a loan and that "his role was a witness," Coll said.

Coll, who testified for several hours on Friday, is scheduled to be cross-examined by defense attorneys when the trial resumes Monday.

Yemeni Man Accused Of Terrorist Links (AP-Y)

By Olivia Munoz

AP, September 16, 2006

A California man accused of trying to supply stolen U.S. military equipment and defense secrets to Yemen was denied bail Friday after a prosecutor said he had ties to a terrorist financier who plotted to help al-Qaida and Hamas.

The allegations emerged at a hearing for Amen Ahmed Ali, 56.

Defense attorney David A. Torres said his client was surprised by the charges.

"But he's also strong. He looks forward to his day in court," Torres said.

In pressing to keep Ali behind bars, prosecutors said that a search of Ali's house turned up contact information for Sheik Mohammed Ali Hassan al-Moayad in Ali's address book.

Al-Moayad, a Yemeni cleric serving a 75-year prison sentence, was convicted in New York last year of conspiring to support and attempting to support al-Qaida and the Palestinian extremist group Hamas, and of actually supporting Hamas.

Ali was arrested Sept. 7 at his cigarette shop in Bakersfield. He and two other men, all Yemeni-born U.S. citizens, were charged in the case.

Prosecutors said Ali planned to send chemical suits and body armor to Yemen without State Department authorization.

Ali pleaded not guilty last week to conspiracy to possess and transmit defense information, unlawfully export defense articles, possess stolen government property and attempted unlawful export of defense articles. If convicted on all counts, he faces up to 30 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

Man Linked To Terrorist Financier Is Denied Bail (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

A California man accused of trying to supply stolen U.S. military equipment and defense secrets to Yemen was denied bail Friday after a prosecutor said the man had ties to a terrorist financier who plotted to help Al Qaeda and Hamas.

The allegations emerged at a hearing for Amen Ahmed Ali, 56.

Suspect Linked To Terrorist (BFLDC)

By Stacey Shepard, Californian staff writer

The Bakersfield Californian, September 16, 2006

FRESNO — A federal judge ordered Amen Ahmed Ali to remain in custody Friday after hearing of his alleged ties to a convicted terrorist financier who funneled money and weapons to al-Qaida and Hamas.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller said in court that Ali's address book contained the name of Sheikh Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad, a Yemeni cleric. Al-Moayad was convicted in 2005 of providing material support to terrorist organizations and is serving a 75-year sentence in a Colorado prison.

Faller also told the court Ali may face an additional charge of espionage after evidence found in a search of his home last week indicated he may have been working as an undercover agent for the Yemen government.

Faller said it was clear that despite being a naturalized U.S. citizen, Ali, 56, has "a very close tie and allegiance to Yemen," his native country.

Ali was arrested Sept. 7 on suspicion of conspiring to acquire and sell U.S. defense secrets and stolen military equipment to someone in Yemen. Two other men are also charged in the case.

Defense attorney David Torres said he did not have access to the information Faller presented in court prior to the hearing.

Friends and relatives of Ali who live around Bakersfield were willing to put up five pieces of property worth a total of $550,000 to secure Ali's release, Torres said.

However, Judge Lawrence J. O'Neill said the decision to keep Ali in custody was based on Ali's numerous links to Yemen and his alleged connection to Al-Moayad.

New details emerge

Al-Moayad's name was found in Ali's address book in 2004 when Ali was questioned by officials upon arriving at Los Angeles International Airport, Faller said.

In addition, Ali's name and two phone numbers for him starting with the area code 661 were found in an address book owned by Al-Moayad, following his arrest in Germany in 2003.

Faller declined to comment on whether there was any contact between the two.

The court also heard allegations by the prosecutor that Ali may have been acting as a spy for Yemen.

DOJ_NMG_0064387

Faller said official Yemen government forms that appeared to be visa and travel authorizations were found in a search of Ali's home the day he was arrested.

The documents, Faller said, allow someone to enter Yemen without doing anything more than completing the forms.

In audio- and videotaped surveillance during the government's two-year investigation, Ali allegedly told an undercover U.S. agent that he was a former officer in the Yemen military, Faller said. Ali also said he had ways of getting stolen U.S. military equipment into Yemen without American intelligence agents there discovering it.

Regarding Ali's ties to Yemen, Faller said the investigation also shows:

· Ali's Yemen ID card has a different name and birth date than his U.S. documents. On the Yemen card, his name is listed as Amen Ali Al-Hajj Al-Rouhani. His U.S. documents say he was born in 1950; his Yemeni documents say 1955.

· Ali tried to paint himself as a humble businessman, but that he had access to thousands of dollars. He allegedly had five bank accounts that would contain as much as $25,000 each at times, and then would be emptied. It is unknown where the money went.

· Ali was paid $30,000 last year by a Bay Area travel agency called Palm Air that specializes in discount flights to the Middle East. He could order plane tickets in anyone's name as part of his job, Faller said.

In issuing his ruling, O'Neill also noted that a pretrial services report indicated Ali had taken frequent trips to Yemen, has six siblings living there and owns land in the country.

Yemeni community reacts

Friends of Ali who attended the hearing disputed the evidence presented against him.

Ali had official Yemen documents in his home because he was recently nominated by the local Yemeni Association to be the organization's representative to the Yemen Consulate in San Francisco, according to Abdul Jobah and Nashwan Alrowhani, members of the Yemeni community and close friends of Ali.

They also said it was widely known that Ali worked for Palm Air. He made money by referring members of the local community to the company, they said.

"Every reservation I made was through him. He referred a lot of business to them because he was looked at like a leader to the community," Jobah said. "He'd go out of the way getting the ticket and (bring) it to my house, all for a lousy $50."

Jobah said Ali's arrest was only done to win votes and justify anti-terrorism efforts five years after 9/11.

"Amen is a victim of the 9/11 anniversary and voting time," he said. "He's a victim of timing."

Jobah and Alrowhani said Ali had come to Bakersfield 36 years ago, around the same time others from Yemen were settling here to farm. He was a fatherlike figure to many of the younger Yemeni men who migrated here in later years, helping them settle in the area. Ali also served as president of the local Yemeni Association.

"You can't live here until you're almost 60 an then commit a crime like this," Jobah said of Ali.

Following Ali's arrest last week, the FBI searched the homes of at least 15 members of the Bakersfield Yemeni community, the men said. Defense attorney Torres said many in the Yemeni community felt the FBI were coming down hard on them.

Alrowhani said FBI agents searched his home, froze his bank account and took his passport. His account was released and his passport returned, he said.

He was questioned for six hours by agents about his connection to Ali and presented with transcribed conversations he had with Ali over the phone, he said.

The FBI could not be reached to comment on the searches late Friday.

Jobah and Alrowhani feel their phones continue to be tapped. The situation is causing many here to consider moving back to the Middle East, the men said.

"I used to tell my wife, forget about Yemen. This is our life, our country," Alrowhani said. "Now I'm thinking differently."

Australia Denies Army Chief Visited Philippines In Hunt For Bali Bombers (AFP)

AFP, September 16, 2006

Australia's defence ministry has denied its army chief is on a secret visit to the southern Philippines this week to be briefed on a hunt for two suspects in the 2002 Bali bombings that left 200 people dead.

Contradicting Filipino military officials, Canberra's Defence Department said Lieutenant General Peter Leahy's trip to the Philippines was instead part of scheduled exchange of visits.

"The chief of the army is visiting the Philippines on a counterpart visit with the Philippine Army, that is all," a Defence Department spokesman told AFP, declining however to offer any details of Leahy's movements.

The denial came after Philippine military officials said Leahy flew Thursday to Zamboanga on the southern island of Mindanao where he was updated on the hunt for two fugitive members of the Jemaah Islamiyah (JI) extremist group.

DOJ_NMG_0064388

The pair, Umar Patek and Dulmatin, are wanted for their involvement in the 2002 bombings on the popular Indonesian resort island of Bali in which 88 Australians were among the dead.

According the to Philippines military, Leahy was told that Filipino troops, backed up by US intelligence, had the militants surrounded in dense jungle on the nearby island of Jolo but is meeting strong resistance.

Regional military chief Major General Eugenio Cedo told Leahy that the JI militants were being sheltered by Abu Sayyaf, a local Muslim extremist group, in the jungle, the Philippine military said.

"Australia is concerned about the hunt for the two JI terrorists," said military spokesman Major Eugene Batara, adding that the country had offered to train Philippine special forces and help establish "riverine" units which were used during the Vietnam War to patrol waterways.

Philippines Defence Secretary Avelino Cruz said last March that Australia would donate 30 river boats to help hunt down JI suspects in the Mindanao marshways.

Australia's special forces commander Major-General Mike Hindmarsh visited Zamboanga last October but refused to speak to the press during his trip.

Yemen Foils Attacks On Oil Facilities (FT)

By Heba Saleh

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Yemen said on Friday it had foiled two attempts to blow up oil facilities in different parts of the country, days after al-Qaeda urged Muslims to target western interests in the Gulf.

Only 35 minutes apart, one attack targeted a Canadian-Yemeni oil storage facility in Dubba port in Hadramawt province and the other an oil refinery in Marib in the north east of the country.

The Yemeni Interior Ministry said security men succeeded in exploding the bombers' cars, killing the four suicide bombers before they could do any damage. One guard was killed.

In the first attack, the ministry said that two cars were driven at great speed towards storage tanks filled with huge quantities of oil in the port of Dubba, but security men fired at the vehicles blowing them up before they could reach their target.

In Marib, security men also blew up two white cars similar to those driven by workers in the facility. The ministry said a spark from the exploding car strated a fire but that was brought under control.

The attacks come just days after Ayman Al Zawahiri, al-Qaeda's second-in-command, urged supporters to target oil installations in the Gulf region.

Yemen has been trying to shed its image as a haven for Islamic militants since 9/11, but the escape in February of 23 al-Qaeda operatives from a high-security jail in the country raised doubts in the United States about its commitment to the war against terrorism. Some of the escapees have since been recaptured but 14 remain at large.

They include a man convicted of involvement in both the bombing of the American warship, the USS Cole in 2000, and the attack against a French oil tanker two years later.

The attempts to blow up the oil facilties come amidst heightened security because of presidential and local elections due to be held on Wednesday.

President Ali Abdullah Saleh, already in office for 28 years, is seeking another term. He is facing a serious challenge from Fiasal bin Shamlan, a former oil minister backed by an alliance of the main opposition parties.

Suicide Attacks Foiled At 2 Oil Sites, Yemen Says (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Sept. 15 — Security officials in Yemen said they thwarted two suicide bombings of oil installations in the southern and central regions of the country early Friday. The four attackers and a security guard were killed, Yemen's Interior Ministry said in a statement.

Yemeni officials said an investigation was under way to determine who was behind the attacks, which came days after one of Al Qaeda's top leaders, Ayman al-Zawahri, threatened strikes against oil facilities in the Middle East that he blamed for "stealing Muslim oil." By late Friday, no group had claimed responsibility.

In the first attack, about 5:15 a.m., two cars sped toward an oil storage site near the Hadhramaut region, one driven by a man wearing a uniform similar to those worn by workers there, and the other by a man in a military uniform, the Yemeni authorities said. Guards opened fire on both cars, blowing them up outside the site. In addition to the drivers, a security guard was killed.

DOJ_NMG_0064389

Shrapnel from the explosions sparked a small fire in one of the storage tanks, but it was quickly extinguished, the statement said.

About 30 minutes later, security guards at an oil refinery in Marib opened fire on two other cars that were carrying explosives and marked to look like vehicles used there. Both drivers were killed.

The attacks occurred just days before voters are to cast ballots in a hotly contested election pitting President Ali Abdullah Saleh against four challengers. Political analysts accused the government on Friday evening of capitalizing on the incidents to help Mr. Saleh's standing.

Yemen, a close ally of the United States in the campaign against terrorism, has long been a hotbed of extremist activity and recruitment. In February, 23 prisoners suspected of links to Al Qaeda escaped from a maximum-security prison in Sana, the capital. Fourteen of the fugitives remain at large. It was not immediately clear on Friday whether any of them were connected to the attack.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. Still In The Dark On Tracking Of Foreign Visitors (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - After spending $900 million to set up a database to track foreign travelers arriving in America, the government still doesn't know how many of them stay in the country illegally because the system is incomplete and snarled by controversy.

The US-VISIT system screens up to 2 million foreigners a month as they arrive at all international airports and seaports and at most border crossings. Visitors' personal information, fingerprints and photographs are logged electronically into a computer database and their names are checked against criminal records and terrorist watch lists.

But 10 years after Congress first ordered the system, the Department of Homeland Security hasn't set up a way for the same visa-holders to check out when they leave the country. Instead, the agency continues to test it at 14 airports and two seaports.

DHS officials said they didn't know when the checkout system would be launched nationwide because of the difficulty of creating a fast and effective method that travelers could use when they left the country.

"We're not ready," said Robert Mocny, the acting director of US-VISIT. "We're going to make sure before we put any exit system in place that we get it right."

With the program still up in the air, some DHS officials question whether the agency should spend millions more on a system that may lead to much longer delays at airports and border crossings without detecting a single terrorist.

"We need to have exit control but I'm not sure US-VISIT is the solution," said Jayson Ahern, who oversees the 322 U.S. ports of entry for Customs and Border Protection. "We need to find that right balance of something that provides the high level of security we need but at the same time allows us to move legitimate travelers."

Critics said the exit program might never be completed the way Congress originally envisioned it because of the lack of consensus within the agency and opposition from the travel industry and border communities.

"No government official is going to say publicly that they've given up on it because it's embarrassing," said Margaret Stock, an immigration attorney and lieutenant colonel for the Army's military police. "But the fact is, Congress mandated them to do this and they still haven't done it."

Congress ordered immigration authorities to set up a system to track foreigners in 1996 after the first terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, but the program never received enough money to get off the ground.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Congress renewed its mandate and promised the newly created Department of Homeland Security enough money to set up an entry-exit system.

Since US-VISIT launched three years ago, authorities have recorded 64 million visits in their database. They credit the new screening process with helping them to detect and turn back more than 1,300 criminals.

But Congress never set a deadline for a checkout system. The agency has spent $900 million so far, mostly on setting up new fingerprinting machines for arriving foreigners.

It's testing hand-held machines or kiosk checkouts for departing travelers, but officials said they wouldn't have a plan for a nationwide exit system until at least next year.

Mocny said his agency faced major challenges because U.S. airport and border crossings had never had the staff or resources to process people as they left the country.

DOJ_NMG_0064390

"I think that's why Congress didn't give us a deadline," he said. "They told us to come up with a plan and that's what we're doing."

To determine whether a visa-holder has left the country, federal authorities rely on random checks of electronic passenger records or visa forms, known as I-94's.

A separate database tracks whether foreign students show up to register for classes. Recently, the student system alerted authorities when 11 Egyptians didn't enroll in their colleges as required by their visas.

But experts said the only reliable way to know how many people overstayed their visas and remained in the country illegally would be to require visa-holders to check out.

"Right now we really just have an expensive super-duper, high-tech entry system that doesn't make much sense to have," Stock said.

The gap in information helps fuel criticism of the Bush administration's proposed foreign guest-worker program. Opponents question how authorities would keep tabs on perhaps millions of new temporary workers if they can't keep track of tourists, students and business executives.

"An exit system is a very critical piece of having an effective immigration policy," said Jessica Vaughan, a senior policy analyst for the Center for Immigration Studies, a research center that advocates tougher immigration enforcement. "No matter what anybody feels about immigration, I think most people would agree that we should have a sense of who is authorized to be in the country and who isn't."

The ID Chip You Don't Want In Your Passport (WP)

By Bruce Schneier

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

If you have a passport, now is the time to renew it -- even if it's not set to expire anytime soon. If you don't have a passport and think you might need one, now is the time to get it. In many countries, including the United States, passports will soon be equipped with RFID chips. And you don't want one of these chips in your passport.

RFID stands for "radio-frequency identification." Passports with RFID chips store an electronic copy of the passport information: your name, a digitized picture, etc. And in the future, the chip might store fingerprints or digital visas from various countries.

By itself, this is no problem. But RFID chips don't have to be plugged in to a reader to operate. Like the chips used for automatic toll collection on roads or automatic fare collection on subways, these chips operate via proximity. The risk to you is the possibility of surreptitious access: Your passport information might be read without your knowledge or consent by a government trying to track your movements, a criminal trying to steal your identity or someone just curious about your citizenship.

At first the State Department belittled those risks, but in response to criticism from experts it has implemented some security features. Passports will come with a shielded cover, making it much harder to read the chip when the passport is closed. And there are now access-control and encryption mechanisms, making it much harder for an unauthorized reader to collect, understand and alter the data.

Although those measures help, they don't go far enough. The shielding does no good when the passport is open. Travel abroad and you'll notice how often you have to show your passport: at hotels, banks, Internet cafes. Anyone intent on harvesting passport data could set up a reader at one of those places. And although the State Department insists that the chip can be read only by a reader that is inches away, the chips have been read from many feet away.

The other security mechanisms are also vulnerable, and several security researchers have already discovered flaws. One found that he could identify individual chips via unique characteristics of the radio transmissions. Another successfully cloned a chip. The State Department called this a "meaningless stunt," pointing out that the researcher could not read or change the data. But the researcher spent only two weeks trying; the security of your passport has to be strong enough to last 10 years.

This is perhaps the greatest risk. The security mechanisms on your passport chip have to last the lifetime of your passport. It is as ridiculous to think that passport security will remain secure for that long as it would be to think that you won't see another security update for Microsoft Windows in that time. Improvements in antenna technology will certainly increase the distance at which they can be read and might even allow unauthorized readers to penetrate the shielding.

Whatever happens, if you have a passport with an RFID chip, you're stuck. Although popping your passport in the microwave will disable the chip, the shielding will cause all kinds of sparking. And although the United States has said that a nonworking chip will not invalidate a passport, it is unclear if one with a deliberately damaged chip will be honored.

The Colorado passport office is already issuing RFID passports, and the State Department expects all U.S. passport offices to be doing so by the end of the year. Many other countries are in the process of changing over. So get a passport before it's too late. With your new passport you can wait another 10 years for an RFID passport, when the technology will be more mature, when we will have a better understanding of the security risks and when there will be other technologies we can use to cut the risks. You don't want to be a guinea pig on this one.

Congressional Plan Would Bolster Disaster Agency (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — Congressional negotiators agreed Friday on a plan to restructure the Federal Emergency Management Agency that would give it somewhat more clout and responsibility, but still not as much as it had during the Clinton administration.

The compromise effectively ends the campaign by some in Congress to separate FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security and re-establish it as an independent agency reporting directly to the president.

Several alternatives to revamp the agency had been considered since its universally criticized performance after Hurricane Katrina.

Under the agreement, which will be inserted into a budget bill that Congress is scheduled to vote on this month, the FEMA director would still report to the secretary of homeland security, as he has since FEMA lost its independent status in 2003.

But the director, now R. David Paulison, would also be the principal adviser to the president for emergency management, a new role modeled on the relationship between the president and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who also report to the defense secretary. In a major disaster, the president could designate the FEMA director as a cabinet-level official.

“It is crucial that we strengthen FEMA and provide it with the resources and tools necessary to help us be better prepared,” said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and chairwoman of the homeland security committee.

FEMA, under the plan, would be in charge of preparing for disasters and responding to them. It would take back the agencies at the Department of Homeland Security that were removed from it last year and set up in a separate agency dedicated to preparedness.

The plan also calls for creating a National Operations Center to better coordinate response to catastrophes.

It would allow FEMA, with the permission of the president, to use “cost-effective semipermanent housing” for people left homeless in a disaster, instead of trailers.

And the plan would double the amount of money communities would be eligible for to protect against future disasters — like moving homes away from a river that often floods — to 15 percent of federal disaster relief. This so-called mitigation financing would be capped at $3 billion for one disaster.

Congress Agrees On Expanding FEMA (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

The Federal Emergency Management Agency would be expanded within the Department of Homeland Security, and FEMA's chief could obtain direct access to the president in a crisis, under terms of a compromise overhaul of the troubled agency announced last night by congressional negotiators.

Reached one year after Hurricane Katrina triggered a catastrophe on the Gulf Coast and a governmental emergency in Washington, the tentative deal would give the 2,500-worker agency more power to prepare for and respond to future disasters.

But the pact does not clarify whether FEMA would get more money to implement the scores of changes recommended by several post-Katrina reviews.

"It is crucial that we strengthen FEMA and provide it with the resources and tools necessary to help us be better prepared for the next hurricane or disaster. This agreement will move this legislation forward," Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said in announcing the deal with Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.).

The compromise now moves to a House-Senate panel that this month is hammering out a must-pass $33 billion Homeland Security spending bill.

The deal proposes increasing FEMA's $2.4 billion budget by 10 percent a year for three years, Collins's spokeswoman said. It also would increase emergency planning grants, now at $185 million, and boost funds for emergency medical and search-and-rescue teams, now $30 million and $20 million, respectively.

But there is no guarantee that budget writers will include the money, and congressional aides said the deal leaves out $3.1 billion to help the nation's 60,000 police and fire agencies communicate in emergencies.

"By refusing to provide desperately needed funds for interoperable communications, House Republicans and the White House have shamefully sold out our nation's first responders in an effort to score political points just weeks before the upcoming election," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.), a leading House Democrat involved in the talks.

Responding to flaws highlighted by Katrina, the deal would expand FEMA regional offices, reunite preparedness and response functions severed during the creation of DHS, set qualification requirements for its director, and protect it from department reorganizations by making it semi-independent, like the Coast Guard and Secret Service.

Immigration Reduces Big Backlog (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

The immigration service has nearly achieved its goal of processing immigration applications within an average of six months and will make an October deadline for eliminating the backlog, agency Director Emilio T. Gonzalez said yesterday.

"We're on track to get where we need to be, where we want to be," Mr. Gonzalez, the head of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS), which is part of the Homeland Security Department, told reporters yesterday.

The backlog elimination has been a major test for the agency that would have to administer any future guest-worker program, and members of Congress have been watching the effort's progress closely.

However, the goal will be reached in part because the agency no longer counts cases that are outside its control, such as those awaiting an FBI check.

With the former Immigration and Naturalization Service facing a backlog in the millions, Congress demanded in 2000 that the agency reduce processing time to six months.

In 2001, President Bush and Congress approved a $500 million package to pay for reducing the backlog. That allowed USCIS to shift employees and hire temporary employees to help.

"We have every expectation we'll be able to make the president a very happy person," Mr. Gonzalez said yesterday.

The backlog is defined as applications where the average processing time is more than six months.

In January 2004 the backlog reached 3.8 million applications. That has been whittled down to 1.1 million, and of that total just 139,000 are being delayed by factors under USCIS control.

USCIS officials call that smaller number the "net backlog," and that is the number the agency says it will eliminate by October.

In the case of applications for naturalization, for example, the average processing time dropped from 14 months in February 2004 to five months now.

A group of House and Senate members, mostly Democrats, wrote a letter last month calling on Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to rehire the temporary employees that helped reduce the backlog. The lawmakers said letting the temporary employees go would just cause the backlog to return, and said keeping the employees would make it easier to implement a guest-worker program.

"The Senate has already passed a comprehensive bipartisan immigration reform that has the support of President Bush. Passage of this legislation would make retaining these term employees particularly important, and we urge you to do so now," the lawmakers wrote.

The term employees were capped to a maximum of four years' work.

Mr. Gonzalez said the agency has hired many of them as permanent staffers, but he said he doesn't have the authority to keep them as term employees or the money to hire them all permanently.

The director also said officials are conducting a wide-ranging review of fees that will help restructure the agency so they can hire the employees needed to process applications in a timely manner.

Some members of Congress, and the Government Accountability Office in a report last year, have questioned how USCIS defines the backlog.

But Mr. Gonzalez said it makes no sense to blame the agency for a backlog in cases where the problem lies with another agency or when the applicant hasn't submitted all the information.

Of the about 1 million backlogged applications that are outside of USCIS control, 64 percent are for applications where a visa simply isn't available yet; 17 percent are for applications that are still lacking information; and 11 percent are awaiting an FBI name check. Another 8 percent have other issues.

Mr. Gonzalez also took issue with press reports that questioned bonuses the agency plans to give to most employees this month. Some employees have said they knew of other employees who cut corners to try to meet processing goals and earn the bonuses.

But the director said the bonuses are a way to reward solid work for the backlog reduction, and said the awards -- $500 for adjudicators who met production goals, were not disciplined and didn't "compromise process or program integrity" -- are a small token.

"Everything we've done is what every other federal agency does here," he said.

Illegal Immigrants Frequently Denied Compensation (MCT)

By Liz Chandler

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

CORAL SPRINGS, Fla. - Jose Hernandez was good with a machete. So he was the top choice when his boss needed someone to chop down young trees that were choking parts of Florida's Everglades.

On one trip to the swamps, the workers flew in by helicopter and quickly cut a stand of sprouting trees. But when they took off again, something went wrong: The chopper lurched left, then plunged into murky water.

A broken rotor blade slashed through Hernandez's left thigh.

Doctors saved his life, but couldn't save his leg.

To pay for his costly medical care, Hernandez filed a workers' compensation claim, which covered some of his bills.

Then, the insurance carrier, Florida Citrus, Business & Industries Fund, discovered that Hernandez was in America illegally, without work papers or permission from federal immigration officials. It halted all payments and left Hernandez to languish in a low-income Florida nursing home, unable to work to support his wife and four children in Mexico.

Thousands of illegal workers like Hernandez are hurt on the job every year in America, but don't get the compensation that's promised by law in every state.

Bosses often fire them, threaten them with deportation and commit an array of other misdeeds to avoid responsibility for workers' injuries. Some insurers refuse to pay their claims, citing reasons related to their illegal status.

As a result, injured workers often go without medical care or go to emergency rooms for treatment - and taxpayers get stuck with the bills.

"It's a violation of the American spirit," said Florida lawyer Gerry Rosenthal, who represents Hernandez. "Employers are hiring these people and pushing them hard to make a profit for the company, but when a worker gets hurt, they abandon him."

From field hands to garment workers to poultry processors to construction crews, injuries abound in industries that rely on an estimated 7 million undocumented workers, often to do dirty and dangerous jobs. Yet those who are undocumented are frequently cheated out of benefits that American workers have taken for granted for nearly a century, a McClatchy Newspapers investigation has found.

Federal labor officials haven't studied whether undocumented workers are wrongfully being denied compensation. But the exploitation is rampant, according to interviews with scores of illegal workers, employers, workers' comp lawyers, health care providers and workplace experts, and a review of lawsuits and workers' comp claims.

In one national study, university researchers surveyed 2,660 day laborers, most of them working illegally. One in five said he'd suffered a work injury. Among those who were hurt in the last year, 54 percent said they didn't receive the medical care they needed, and only 6 percent got workers' comp benefits.

Employers in at least 20 states, arguing that their employees shouldn't receive injury benefits because they're illegal immigrants, have fought and lost in courts and review boards. Among those employees were a California laborer who hurt his back lifting sacks of coffee, an Arizona auto mechanic who was hit in the eye by flying debris, a Maryland carpenter who cut his hand on a saw, and a North Carolina construction worker who suffered a brain injury when he fell 30 feet onto a concrete floor.

Juan Palacios, a 27-year-old husband and father from Guatemala, was working on the roof of a Florida home in March when a coworker accidentally splashed hot tar on him. Palacios fell 12 feet and smashed through a glass table and onto a tile floor. He was hospitalized for a week.

During that time, he heard nothing from his boss at Sunrise Roofing.

"They don't care about me," Palacios said. "I feel bad because I can't work. ... That's why I'm here."

Sunrise confirmed that it had employed Palacios, but its insurance carrier, the Insurance Company of the Americas of Bradenton, Fla., has refused to pay. It won't discuss the denial but said in documents that "there is no employee/employer" relationship.

Palacios remains out of work. He's scarred and in need of skin grafts, he said. He relies on his roommates to feed and care for him, and he's received nothing from Sunrise.

The U.S. Department of Labor tracks workplace deaths and injuries, but officials haven't assessed how undocumented workers fare. The only hint is the climbing and disproportionate number of workplace deaths among Hispanic and foreign-born workers, which includes many of those who are working illegally.

DOJ_NMG_0064394

Workplace safety programs also are failing these workers, as the number of inspections and the staffers to do them has declined. The nation's 2,300 inspectors check 1 percent of 7 million employers each year, and critics say fines are so low that risky operators consider them a cost of doing business.

"The regulators are rooted in paralysis," said insurance analyst Peter Rousmaniere, who's studied abuses of undocumented workers in a dozen states. "They don't want to acknowledge these workers exist - so, in effect, they are allowing them to be abused."

Workers' compensation is regulated by the states, but most simply offer review boards to settle disputes. Few states look for abuses of undocumented workers, and some adopt regulations that freeze illegal workers out of injury benefits.

Florida recently rejected hundreds of workers' comp claims because they didn't include Social Security numbers, a procedure the state Supreme Court halted last year because the requirement violated privacy laws.

A few states - Florida, Michigan and Kansas - allow employers to limit benefits or fine injured workers who use phony Social Security numbers.

"What you have is 20th century legal principles trying to catch up with the 21st century reality of a global workforce," said Bill Beardall, a lawyer and professor at the University of Texas at Austin.

"It takes time - and persistent injustice - for us to figure out that the old rules don't fit." WORKERS' COMPENSATION

Workers' compensation is intended to protect labor and management.

The deal is employers pay for injured workers' medical treatment, partial wages, disabilities and deaths, and employees can't sue if they get hurt.

Every state requires such benefits, except Texas, which last year passed California to lead the country in workplace deaths of Hispanics. Workers comp is optional in Texas, but companies must cover all employees - legal and illegal - if they opt for the insurance.

While some states exempt tiny businesses and certain agricultural and domestic workers, almost all other workers are promised protection.

But employers have incentives to cover up injuries. Accidents drive up insurance costs and can attract investigators. And intimidation tactics work best against employees who speak little English, don't know their rights and fear the threat of deportation.

"They are terrified of getting fired or being deported," said Nan Lashuay, an assistant clinical professor and occupational health expert at the University of California, San Francisco. "There's a lot of pressure. Some of them have families who are literally on the verge of starvation. ... You can make here in a day what you make in a week in Mexico. And if you're deported, it can be extremely difficult to get back into the U.S."

Examples of abuse are widespread.

In Boston, when a Brazilian restaurant worker stabbed his hand with a knife, his supervisor, acting as translator, told doctors the injury happened at home, legal advocates said.

At a Mississippi poultry plant, bosses questioned the immigration status - then fired - an undocumented employee after he sought medical treatment for injuries to both arms, according to the worker and his case manager.

In Florida, a 15-year-old Guatemalan boy picking peppers was run over by a truck in the field, then dumped at a hospital 25 miles away with no name or contact information for his employer.

It's not unusual for bosses, known to workers only by nicknames and cell phone numbers, to abandon injured workers in unfamiliar areas without fear of reprisals.

"It's an ugly secret, and it's going on nationwide," said Texas lawyer Richard Pena, the chairman of the American Bar Association's immigration committee. "The employers and insurance companies profit ... (while) immigrant workers often go back to their home countries broken and in pain."

Insurers say they don't track how many illegal workers file for injury benefits or how many workers' families seek payment for deaths on the job. Most American companies take care of injured workers, employers say. They understand that the best way to keep productivity up and insurance premiums down is to run safe, responsible workplaces.

When someone is hurt, insurers say, they generally pay the claims, and immigration status doesn't arise. When it does, they interpret state injury laws conservatively.

"Most accept that illegal aliens should be compensated. That doesn't mean everybody is necessarily enthusiastic about it," said Eric Oxfeld, a Washington, D.C., lobbyist for businesses.

If injuries aren't reported, he said, "it has little to do with the employer, and everything to do with the workers' fear that he might be sent home."

SOME COMPANIES DISAGREE Some companies, however, continue to argue that undocumented workers shouldn't receive injury benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0064395

Insurers may pay medical bills but refuse to cover workers' lost wages and retraining costs, arguing that the workers can't legally hold jobs and earn wages in the United States anyway.

"There are not across-the-board denials. My guess is that many thousands of illegal immigrants have been injured and treated through workers' comp," said Bob Hartwig, the chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute. "The problem is that many don't get to the door. ... Many of these people are intimidated in variety of ways by employers."

Some companies - particularly in competitive and dangerous industries - seek to gain an edge by hiring illegal workers and then cheating them on pay and injury benefits.

"It's a toxic cocktail," said insurance analyst Rousmaniere. "You have employers who have great incentive to cheat workers, and you have large numbers of illegal workers who will accept lower labor standards. It's causing our safety standards to erode - and that hurts legal workers, too."

One employers' trick is to go without workers' comp insurance.

Investigators say that kind of fraud is far more common than the much-publicized cases of workers who fake injuries. Offenders typically are small companies in high-risk pursuits, in which annual insurance premiums can cost 50 percent or more of a company's payroll. On average, companies pay about 1 percent of payroll toward premiums.

Employers also lie on payroll records - understating their size and job risks - to keep insurance costs down, which can leave workers without injury coverage.

Then there are more subtle tactics, such as the treatment an undocumented immigrant from South America got at a Mississippi poultry plant.

The worker slipped on a floor slick with chicken fat and landed hard, suffering two fractures in his back and a spinal dislocation.

The company-recommended doctor found no injury in his X-rays and cleared him to return to work, according to the worker and his legal advocates. He spent time sitting in a break room, too pained to work but prohibited from going home during work hours so the company wouldn't have to report the injury.

As the pain in the worker's leg grew, an orthopedic specialist finally examined the earlier X-rays and found the fractures, which required surgery.

"I can't work as I did before. I'm going to have pain for all my life," said the father of five, who asked not to be identified for fear of being fired.

He walks with a limp now. He gave up his $500-a-week job cutting bones from chicken thighs because he can't stand up for long periods. But he still works at the poultry plant, where he now makes $300 a week mopping floors.

"When you're cutting up chickens and working on a line where speed is everything, workers get cuts, broken fingers, repetitive motion injuries, or they get their hands caught in machines," said Anita Grabowski, who coordinates the Mississippi Poultry Workers Center near Jackson, Miss., which gets a steady flow of immigrant workers injured in area plants.

"They may see a company doctor or nurse, but many times they're given an aspirin or some cream and sent right back to the line that day. Their injuries are never reported, and they don't get the treatment they need," she said.

It was the insurance company, not the boss, that blocked benefits for Jose Hernandez. Adjusters for Florida Citrus, Business & Industries Fund began digging into his background on the day he lost his leg to the helicopter blade.

They quizzed his employer, Linda Rojas.

What's his history?

What kind of employee was he?

What documents had he provided when he was hired?

"They kind of hounded me to say things about him that weren't up to par," Rojas recalled. But "I wasn't going to say anything bad. ... He was an excellent employee."

Within a week, adjusters phoned Rojas with a decision: "We feel like he's an illegal alien, and we're going to use that to deny his claim," Rojas remembers the agent saying.

She didn't argue.

Rojas said she had mixed feelings. Hernandez deserved compensation because he was maimed for life, but she wasn't sure that an illegal worker should be entitled to benefits. So she left things to her insurer.

Florida Citrus declined to discuss the case, but in its denial, the insurer charged that Hernandez violated state law by making "false" or "fraudulent" statements about his identity.

When Rojas hired him, Hernandez presented a Social Security card he bought in North Carolina. He'd picked strawberries there, and before that, he'd planted shrubs in Kansas City, cut pines in Washington state and picked grapes in California, living and working in the United States periodically for more than a decade.

DOJ_NMG_0064396

"The `false' statements Jose Hernandez made to get a job have nothing to do with his injury," said lawyer Rosenthal, of West Palm Beach. "This man was almost killed working for an American company. Isn't it right to compensate him?"

Florida Citrus settled the case for an undisclosed amount, but Hernandez remains in the Florida nursing home getting treatment, waiting to return to Mexico. His girls are 3 and 6 now, the boys 10 and 12. He hasn't seen them in three years.

"The important thing is that some money is there to take care of us," said Hernandez, 36. "I can't walk, but I'll keep trying to go forward. Thank God it didn't get my arm - with my hands I can do anything."

Rojas said she wasn't surprised when her insurer "dropped us like a hot rock" after Hernandez's injury. She paid double for a new policy and expects a price increase again this year.

She's not sure whether her company, Rojas Brothers Grove Service, can afford to stay open or can continue to find workers willing to wade into swamps to chop trees.

"Not everybody wants to do this kind of work," she said. "They're going into swampy areas where you've got snakes and alligators. ... It's rough work."

WAR NEWS:

Iraqis Plan To Ring Baghdad With Trenches (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 15 — The Iraqi government plans to seal off Baghdad within weeks by ringing it with a series of trenches and setting up dozens of traffic checkpoints to control movement in and out of the violent city of seven million people, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Friday.

The effort is one of the most ambitious security projects this year, with cars expected to be funneled through 28 checkpoints along the main arteries snaking out from the capital. Smaller roads would be closed. The trenches would run across farmland or other open areas to prevent cars from evading checkpoints, said the ministry spokesman, Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf.

“We’re going to build a trench around Baghdad so we can control the exits and entrances so people will be searched properly,” he said in a telephone interview. “The idea is to get the cars to go through the 28 checkpoints that we set up.”

American officials said the military had approved of the plan, which has been in the works for weeks. General Khalaf said he did not know how much the construction would cost or how many laborers would be employed.

There has been a surge in the number of Iraqis killed execution-style in the last few days, with scores of bodies found across the city despite an aggressive security plan begun last month. The Baghdad morgue has reported that at least 1,535 Iraqi civilians died violently in the capital in August, a 17 percent drop from July but still much higher than virtually all other months.

American military officials have disputed the morgue’s numbers, saying military data shows that what they refer to as the murder rate dropped by 52 percent from July to August. But American officials have acknowledged that that count does not include deaths from bombings and rocket or mortar attacks.

American commanders have made securing Baghdad their top priority. They have shifted troops to Baghdad to try to contain the sectarian conflict raging in the capital, which threatens to plunge Iraq into all-out civil war. A security plan promoted in June by American officials and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki involved setting up traffic checkpoints throughout Baghdad, but failed to quell the Sunni-Shiite sectarian violence, which reached a peak in July.

Last month, the Americans and the Iraqi government began a new tactic, flooding troubled neighborhoods with thousands of troops and doing searches block by block, then leaving battalions behind to try and win the confidence of residents.

That offensive began in southern and western Baghdad and is now moving into eastern neighborhoods controlled by the Mahdi Army, a powerful militia that answers to Moktada al-Sadr, a Shiite cleric.

It is unclear whether Baghdad can really be sealed off, given the city’s circumference of about 60 miles. With so much terrain, guerrillas might find areas that are unconstrained by the trenches and checkpoints. On the main roads, traffic could be snarled for miles, especially in the final days of Ramadan, when people travel to celebrate with their families.

Studies are still being conducted to determine how traffic patterns will be affected. If the outer perimeter proves effective, then perhaps some checkpoints now being operated inside the city could be taken down, easing the traffic, officials said.

President Bush said at a news conference on Friday that the Iraqis were “building a berm around the city to make it harder for people to come in with explosive devices, for example.” Military officials said the Iraqis had considered such a project earlier, but decided to go with trenches instead.

DOJ_NMG_0064397

The wide cordon to be erected around the city is critical to the new security plan and will be completed within weeks, General Khalaf said. American and Iraqi officials have long said the capital is easily infiltrated because it abuts restive areas such as Anbar Province and the region to the south known as the Triangle of Death. Without a ring of security around Baghdad, insurgents and militiamen outside could return to areas cleared during sweeps, General Khalaf said.

Similar perimeters have been set up around troubled cities that are much smaller than the capital.

The most prominent example is Falluja, the insurgent stronghold in western Iraq that had 300,000 residents before a Marine-led siege in November 2004. Since then, the American military and Iraqi security forces have run the city as a mini police state, with people who want to enter required to show identification cards at checkpoints.

The American military built dirt berms with limited entry points around Samarra in the north and Rawah in the western desert.

The second-ranking American commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, stressed in an interview the importance of securing Baghdad. "I'll be perfectly clear with you, our main effort right now is Baghdad," he said. "It's our focus."

There are few quiet days in the capital.

Seven bodies were found in four different parts of Baghdad on Friday, an Interior Ministry official said. An American soldier was killed by a roadside bomb south of Baghdad, and another was killed Thursday night by a bomb northwest of Baghdad, the military said. A soldier was missing after an attack in Baghdad on Thursday in which a suicide car bomber killed two soldiers and wounded 30 others. In Anbar Province, a marine died in combat.

On the political front, a senior Shiite cleric rejected any immediate move to create autonomous regions in Iraq, further threatening a proposal by a Shiite politician to establish a legal process for partition.

The cleric, Ayatollah Muhammad al-Yacoubi, a fundamentalist Shiite, said that he believed in "maintaining the unity of the country" and that autonomous regions could not be formed without "preparing the proper conditions," according to a statement released Thursday by his office in Najaf.

The strong stand against autonomy by Ayatollah Yacoubi further calls into question the viability of a proposal for a mechanism to carve up Iraq that Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Parliament's Shiite bloc, tried to put to the Parliament earlier this month. Mr. Hakim has long been a strong proponent of creating a nine-province autonomous region in the south that would be ruled by religious Shiites and would include the country's main oil fields.

He called for Parliament to vote on a proposed mechanism much sooner than virtually anyone had expected.

Sunni Arabs generally oppose dividing Iraq because their provinces have little oil.

The bloc answering to Mr. Sadr, the Shiite cleric, later opposed any immediate move toward autonomy. Mr. Sadr and Mr. Hakim are bitter rivals, both struggling for dominance in the new Iraq, and both commanders of powerful militias that have skirmished several times since the American invasion.

Ayatollah Yacoubi is close to Mr. Sadr, and their united stand could be enough to block any serious consideration of autonomy for now.

Basim Sharif, an official in the ayatollah's Fadhila Party, said the ayatollah could decide to support the legislation if it included language saying that Iraq would not break up into autonomous regions anytime soon.

Security Ring For Baghdad Underway (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 15 -- U.S. military and Iraqi security forces have begun a massive effort to seal off Baghdad with a ring of reinforced checkpoints, berms, trenches, barriers and fences in an attempt to clamp down on insurgents, officials said Friday.

A few dozen checkpoints will be placed along key arteries in and out of Baghdad to ensure that people move through "predictable paths" that can be controlled, Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman, said late Friday night. Iraqi forces will man the checkpoints and patrol the terrain, with support from U.S. troops.

"We know there's a flow in and out of the city of those who are responsible for the violence," Johnson said. "The intent is to control Baghdad city."

The plans were announced on a day when officials said 52 bound and tortured corpses were found across Baghdad over a 24-hour period. Baghdad's body count has surged in recent days, despite a month-old push by thousands of U.S. and Iraqi forces to tame some of the capital's roughest neighborhoods.

The construction of a ring around Baghdad would be the most ambitious security endeavor yet for the U.S. military and its Iraqi allies as they try to block militias, death squads and insurgents from funneling in weapons, explosives, funding and recruits from outside the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0064398

"The enemy is changing tactics, and we're adapting," President Bush said Friday in Washington. "The enemy moves, and we will help the Iraqis move. And so they're building a berm around the city to make it harder for people to come in with explosive devices, for example. . . . They got a clear-build-and-hold strategy."

The project is underway as sectarian violence is emerging as the biggest challenge to U.S. and Iraqi forces engaged in what some U.S. officials have called the Battle for Baghdad, a confrontation that might strongly influence the future path of Iraq.

"We're trying to knock down sectarian violence and go after those folks, those death squads that have caused this new form of violence, that if left unchecked could lead to civil war," said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. military officer in Iraq.

The effort to wrap Baghdad in a protective bubble is not a new tactic. In Fallujah, U.S. and Iraqi forces have controlled entry and exit since an assault by U.S. forces in November 2004. In the volatile town of Samarra, where the bombing of a Shiite shrine in February triggered the sectarian violence now ravaging Baghdad, the U.S. military has erected berms around the town. The dirt ridges, a few feet high, serve largely to channel traffic.

Johnson, the U.S. military spokesman, said the Baghdad project has been underway for a few weeks and that building has begun. The plan is to use the natural terrain where possible and reinforce existing barriers, "complementing them with trenches, in other places berms, and other types of fencing."

Such efforts are among the methods that counterinsurgency experts recommend to gain control over population movements. Yet some analysts also say that the United States has never taken what many of them contend is an essential first step: conducting a thorough census, then issuing identity cards and requiring all people to carry them at all times.

It is unclear whether the planned complex of berms, trenches and checkpoints will be effective in Baghdad, a megalopolis of 81 square miles that includes vast stretches of farmland and open terrain. Insurgents and members of private militias might still be able to avoid the checkpoints, and even if they don't, U.S. and Iraqi forces still face the problem of identifying them.

The Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which begins in October, is likely to increase the flow of people in and out of Baghdad. The Iraqi government, Johnson said, is trying to determine how the plan to seal Baghdad will affect the flow of vehicles in a city already clogged with heavy traffic.

The grisly discoveries of more bodies around the capital illustrated how serious the ongoing sectarian strife has become. According to Iraqi police officials, some of the corpses had disfigured faces. Most were shot in the head. All bore marks of torture. Some were found near a railroad track, others near a bus station. Five were beheaded. All were young men, in civilian clothes, between the ages of 20 and 35.

The bodies were dumped in both Shiite Muslim and Sunni Muslim neighborhoods, east, west and south of the Tigris River, which weaves through the heart of the city. In total, 114 bullet-riddled and tortured corpses have turned up since Tuesday.

Meanwhile, on Friday, five U.S. soldiers were reported killed. Military officials said they included two who were killed Thursday in a suicide bombing that also wounded 30 Americans west of Baghdad. Another American soldier died in combat in Anbar province on Friday, and two more were killed by roadside bombs -- one on Thursday in northwest Baghdad, the other in south Baghdad on Friday.

In the northern city of Mosul, a car bomb that targeted a U.S. patrol killed nine civilians, said Brig. Gen. Saed Jubury, a police spokesman.

In the political arena, a revered Shiite cleric indicated that he would not support a proposal to create a controversial autonomous Shiite region that many Sunnis and some Shiites fear could partition Iraq.

After a meeting with senior Shiite leaders, Ayatollah Mohammad Yaqoubi's office released a statement saying that Yaqoubi stressed "the maintenance of Iraq's unity and expressed his upset over the discord among the political parties and their preference for their factious interests over the public interests of the people."

The statement delivered another blow to efforts by Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, to pass a draft bill that would carve Iraq into a three-part federal system, including a separate Shiite region.

Sunni Arab political parties have accused their Shiite counterparts of trying to break apart Iraq and have threatened to boycott parliament. Both the Kurdish-populated north and the Shiite south are oil-rich, while most Sunni Arabs live around Baghdad or in Iraq's resource-poor western provinces.

Iraq To Dig Trenches Around Baghdad (AP)

By Rebecca Santana, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064399

Iraqi security forces will dig trenches around Baghdad and set up checkpoints along all roads leading into the city to reduce some of the violence plaguing the capital, the Interior Ministry said Friday.

To help halt that bloodshed, more U.S. troops have been shifted to Baghdad from the insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, a senior U.S. commander said.

Meanwhile, a U.S. Marine was killed Friday in Anbar province, and an American soldier was killed Thursday evening by a roadside bomb northwest of Baghdad, the military said. Five American soldiers died Thursday, making it an especially bloody day for U.S. forces.

A U.S. soldier is missing from a suicide bombing 30 miles west of Baghdad that killed two of those soldiers, U.S. military officials said.

The soldier "has been reported as Duty Status Whereabouts Unknown," the military said, without elaborating.

Neither U.S. military officials in Iraq nor in Washington would say whether they believed the soldier had been abducted or whether he may have been killed in the attack, and his remains had not been recovered.

An Iraqi civilian was killed and five others were wounded when a gunman on top of an abandoned building opened fire in a Sunni Arab neighborhood in central Baghdad, said police Lt. Ahmed Mohammed Ali.

A spokesman for a prominent Sunni Arab political party was shot and killed by gunmen, said a party official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he fears for his life.

Sheik Muhanad al-Gharairi was a spokesman for the Conference of People of Iraq, a Sunni Arab party headed by Adnan al-Dulaimi. He was also an imam at a mosque in Baghdad and was on his way to conduct prayers at a different mosque in Garma, 19 miles outside of Baghdad when he was killed.

The plan to dig trenches around Baghdad will be implemented in coming weeks, Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Kareem Khalaf told The Associated Press.

It comes as more than 130 people were slain in two days — either killed in attacks or tortured and dumped in rivers or on the city's streets.

"Trenches will be dug around Baghdad in the coming weeks when the third part of the Baghdad security plan is implemented," Khalaf said. Metropolitan Baghdad has a circumference of about 60 miles.

The security plan, known as Operation Together Forward, began June 15 and is being implemented in three phases. The first phase included setting up random checkpoints around the city, phase two began Aug. 7 and focused on the most violence-prone areas of Baghdad — mostly the Sunni Arab southern districts. Phase three reportedly includes cordoning off and searching other parts of Baghdad, including predominantly Shiite areas.

Khalaf said that except for the trenches, vehicle and pedestrian traffic would be restricted to just 28 entry points with manned checkpoints.

"We will leave only 28 inlets to Baghdad while all other inlets will be blocked. Supports will be added to the trenches to hinder the movements of people and vehicles. The trenches will be under our watch," he said.

He did not have any details, but did say that there would be no concrete walls or razor wire. Khalaf also did not know how deep or wide the trenches would be.

"They will surround Baghdad," he said of the trenches.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, a senior U.S. commander, said U.S. troops were shifted from Anbar province to Baghdad because quelling sectarian violence in the capital is a higher priority.

"The main effort is Baghdad, and we must ensure that we weight the main effort," Chiarelli said, using military terminology for drawing on available troops elsewhere in order to bolster the military effort in Baghdad.

In addition to extending the combat tour of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade and sending it from northern Iraq to Baghdad, a smaller unit was moved this summer from near Rawah, in Anbar province, to the capital. The 172nd was replaced by another Stryker brigade in the north, but the unit in Rawah was not.

Chiarelli said Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is "totally focused on ensuring that we keep what we need in Baghdad to do the job that we need to have done." He added that he believes that efforts to stabilize Anbar, which stretches west from Baghdad to the Syrian and Jordanian borders, are "moving in the right direction."

Both the Bush administration and military have said sectarian killings and violence are surging around Iraq and in the capital, although the military has said the attacks are limited to parts of Baghdad not yet included in the security operation.

A reduction in violence Friday was directly attributed to a vehicle ban went into effect around Baghdad to prevent suicide car bombers and others attacking worshippers during prayers. The ban is implemented every Friday.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, told the Security Council on Thursday that the average number of weekly attacks increased 15 percent and Iraqi casualties increased by 51 percent, compared with the previous three months.

DOJ_NMG_0064400

One of the few positive developments for the U.S.-led coalition and the national unity government was the reported killing of a senior member of al-Qaida in Iraq and the capture of another al-Qaida leader.

The Interior Ministry said Abu Jaafar al-Liby, who it described as either the second or third most important figure in al-Qaida in Iraq, was killed by police earlier this week.

Four other insurgents were killed and two were arrested in the raid, a ministry spokesman, Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, told the AP.

Al-Liby was in charge of the Baghdad sector of al-Qaida in Iraq, Khalaf said. He said two letters were found on his body — one addressed to Osama bin Laden and the other to Abu Ayyoub al-Masri, who is thought to be al-Qaida in Iraq's leader. Both letters pledged loyalty and promised more attacks, Khalaf said.

The U.S. military also said it captured a senior al-Qaida figure and personal associate of the group's new leader during a Sept. 12 raid.

The man, who was not identified, led assassination, kidnapping and bomb-making cells in Baghdad, and played a key role in al-Qaida's activities in Fallujah before it was attacked by U.S. troops in November 2004, Caldwell said.

Shiite politicians, meanwhile, said they had made progress in trying to break a deadlock over legislation to establish autonomous regions as part of a federated Iraq. Sunni Arabs oppose the bill, fearing it could split Iraq into three sectarian and ethnic cantons. The proposed legislation, which could be introduced next week.

U.S. Frustrated By Pace Of Change In Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Officials praise many of Prime Minister Maliki's goals, including quelling militias. But his political ties make it difficult for him to pursue that aim.

WASHINGTON — Four months after Iraq's new government took office, U.S. officials are growing impatient with leaders in Baghdad and pushing them to move more quickly on the difficult agenda confronting them.

The top U.S. goal in Iraq is to help the regime led by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to suppress sectarian violence, strengthen the fragile government and economy and move toward national reconciliation, senior officials say. One of those officials, in a recent interview, praised goals Maliki had set in several of those areas, but suggested more could be done.

"The rhetoric has to be matched by concrete action," said the official, who asked to remain unidentified, citing the sensitivity of the subject. The Iraqi government "needs to begin acting, on the ground, on its own behalf."

Though the administration has confidence in the new prime minister, U.S. officials "are frustrated … there is a little bit of impatience," another senior U.S. official said.

President Bush has voiced similar sentiments, stressing U.S. patience and pledging continued support in an Aug. 31 speech, "as long as the new government continues to make the hard decisions necessary to advance a unified, democratic and peaceful Iraq."

U.S. officials maintained that the election of a full-term government last December would finally enable Shiite Muslims, Sunni Arabs and Kurds to agree on political accords, opening the way to peace and stability. So far, however, the Iraqi government continues to be divided by factional quarrels, and sectarian violence is spiraling.

More than 30 bodies of victims slain execution-style were found Friday. Over the last five days, 142 such killings have been reported. In addition, two U.S. troops — a Marine in Al Anbar province and a soldier in Baghdad — were reported killed. The U.S. military also announced a soldier had been missing since Thursday, when a bomb exploded west of Baghdad and killed at least two troops.

U.S. and Iraqi officials announced a new effort Friday to cut off the flow of weapons and bombs into Baghdad. The plan, announced by Bush during a White House news conference and confirmed by Iraqi officials, is to dig a series of trenches that would form a perimeter of about 60 miles around the city. Checkpoints on every road leading in would restrict entry into the capital, Interior Ministry officials said.

Overall, Iraqi government services have not improved and the most contentious decisions lie ahead.

Maliki, whose government was installed May 20, succeeded Ibrahim Jafari, another Shiite leader for whom the Bush administration at first had high hopes. But Jafari failed to deliver essential services, and it became clear that he had only vague plans for leading the country out of its predicament. U.S. officials lost confidence in him.

Should a second government fail, it would not only raise questions about Maliki's effectiveness but might indicate that anyone would have difficulty leading Iraq. Few in the U.S. government so far have suggested anything as drastic as another change in the leadership, although some, frustrated by the lack of progress, have voiced a private view in recent weeks that Iraq might be better off under a traditional Middle Eastern strongman.

"But that's not the policy," said the second senior U.S. official, discussing the idea of changing governments again. "The policy is to prevent that from happening by making this government succeed."

A key element in Maliki's program is the effort to reconcile the country's warring sects, tribes and militias. Committees have been formed and some tribal meetings have been convened. Yet the program remains in its early stages nearly three months after Maliki unveiled it.

The first senior U.S. official said that reconciliation was "a tough issue, but progress has got to be made." He said places such as Northern Ireland, Liberia and Ivory Coast had faced much the same challenge.

"Without a reconciliation deal, without a package which deals decisively and comprehensively with nongovernmental armed groups … you don't bring an end to any conflict anywhere in the world," the official said.

The Bush administration disagrees with the Iraqi prime minister on some issues, including Maliki's condemnation of Israel's July invasion of Lebanon to confront the Shiite militia Hezbollah. Maliki also disagrees with the U.S. military's efforts to strike at the paramilitary forces of Shiite leader Muqtada Sadr, who is one source of Maliki's political support. And this week, Maliki visited Iran, whose long-strained relations with Washington have grown increasingly acrimonious.

Despite their growing desire for action, U.S. officials say they recognize the difficulty Maliki faces in trying to lead a fractious government with only the narrowest base of public support. For example, though a top goal of both the Bush administration and the Maliki government is suppressing sectarian violence, it is difficult for the prime minister to try to bring pressure on groups associated with Sadr.

"People here recognize that it's a political reality that he depends on the votes of groups which, while not all dirty, have some ties to Shia death squads," the second senior official said. "He's a decent man, a serious person, but there are realities."

In addition to action to stem sectarian violence, U.S. officials want the Maliki government to move on a new investment law to bolster the economy as well as legislation to restructure the state oil company and set new rules for investing in Iraq's petroleum industry.

In an appearance at the Brookings Institution's Saban Center in Washington this week, Deputy Iraqi Prime Minister Barham Salih said the government had imposed a "very tough timetable" on itself for action on the legislative agenda.

He said parliament should pass the investment law this month, and next month should vote on a law to allow former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party to return to government and society. In December, the government will introduce its proposal for managing its petroleum reserves and adopt a law on the disarmament and re-integration of former anti-government militants, Salih said.

Analysts say the issues all are divisive and that action will be difficult. "There's no secret about what needs to be done, in broad terms, to put Iraq back together, in a national consensus," said Nathan Brown, a specialist in Arab politics at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "The question is, can it be done? The American frustration is only natural."

Another regional specialist said the Americans may have domestic reasons for publicly pushing the Iraqi government to move faster. "The goal here may be, 'Don't blame us — blame them,' " said Juan R. Cole, a veteran observer of Iraq at the University of Michigan.

U.S. officials say that also at the top of their agenda for Iraq is a renewed effort to draw financial and political support from regional governments and major world powers.

American government officials and their Iraqi counterparts have been frustrated by the reluctance of other countries to help what they see as the weak government of a troubled land.

The first U.S. official said that neighbors "have been very slow to move" to give political support, direct aid or even debt forgiveness. "That needs to change," he said.

A Time Of Killing, And Little Time For Why (LAT)

By Solomon Moore And Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Nearly 150 bodies have surfaced in Iraq this week, officials say. The toll is too heavy, the suspects too many, to bother with inquiries.

BAGHDAD — Some are largely intact — the flesh torn only where the bullets entered. Others are perforated by drill holes or slashed into ragged pieces. They lie in dusty ravines and pools of sewage, deserted roads and abandoned torture chambers.

DOJ_NMG_0064402

Under normal circumstances, the bodies that appear every day in Iraq — 142 over the last five days, including more than 30 on Friday, Interior Ministry officials said — might be examined for clues by someone interested in solving the crimes. There is no shortage of potential evidence: handcuffs pulling the inert shoulders taut, blindfolds, a crowd of witnesses who saw the victim before masked assailants gunned him down in the street or stuffed him into a police car.

But in Iraq, there seems to be neither interest nor time for that. There are too many bodies and too many killers with too many ties to the nation's warring political factions.

Usually, the best anyone can do is point to a vague culprit — Shiite militias, Sunni insurgents, criminals and gunmen. The murderers are often as nameless as the victims.

A senior American official said U.S. personnel were investigating sites where corpses were recently found. U.S. officials are concerned that the killings may have been committed by Shiite-dominated government security forces in areas already secured by U.S. and Iraqi troops — inside jobs, in effect.

As part of a Baghdad offensive that started this summer, about 8,000 U.S. troops have stepped up patrols with Iraqi forces in an effort to bring order to the city's neighborhoods. But the Iraqi forces, particularly those controlled by the Interior Ministry, which include police and paramilitary units, are deeply intertwined with Shiite militias that have been linked to scores of extrajudicial killings.

The investigation has uncovered scant information, the U.S. official said. Victims are often found far from where they were kidnapped or killed, and forensic capability in Iraq is virtually nonexistent.

Iraqis have expressed skepticism about the security plan. And few seem to believe that investigations are necessary to unmask the killers. Many here seem to have a theory about who they are and why the violence increased last week. Generally, those theories support their political views.

Maj. Gen. Ali Hussein Kamal, intelligence chief of the Interior Ministry, said Sunni Arab terrorists and Baathists were to blame.

Ammar Wajeeh, a Sunni Arab political party member, blamed Shiite militias. "The militias are still terrorizing southern and northern Baghdad," he said.

Sheik Abdul Zahra Swaidi, a representative of the anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr, blamed Americans. "The occupiers are inventing the crisis," he said. "They are behind many explosions; we have proof of that. They are doing this to stay in Iraq."

The U.S. commander in charge of day-to-day operations in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, said Friday that he believed some of the body counts coming from Iraqi officials in recent days had been exaggerated. Chiarelli acknowledged an increase of violence, but said the stepped-up security effort in Baghdad had brought down the overall number of deaths in the capital.

"Some of the numbers that I've seen reported, and what happened in Baghdad yesterday … I cannot prove those numbers are correct, and again, they seem inflated, from my standpoint," Chiarelli said at a news briefing at the Pentagon.

"For some, I'm sure that there are agendas that are being worked, and I understand that," he said.

Iraq's Health Ministry, which oversees the Baghdad morgue, is largely controlled by officials loyal to Sadr, and American officials have suggested that the ministry is elevating death totals to undermine confidence in the U.S. security plan.

Iraqis also disagree with one another, and with American officials, over why the violence jumped so noticeably in recent days.

Some U.S. officials believe that Sunni Arab extremists have increased attacks to send a message to American and Iraqi troops that no matter how much security is bolstered, the insurgency will thrive.

Iraqi national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie said the killing of leaders of the group Al Qaeda in Iraq had hurt the organization, but might also have inspired it to ratchet up operations to prove it remained powerful.

"We believe that Al Qaeda every now and then tries to create a spectacular attack with a psychological impact to prove that they're still around and able to fight," Rubaie said.

But Suha Azzawi, a member of Iraq's parliament, said she suspected the death toll was being driven up by Shiite militias killing detainees to cover their tracks. Over the last year, several secret prisons run by militias have been uncovered.

"I think the most reasonable justification is the recent security sweeps in different areas of Baghdad, like Sadr City, Adhamiya and elsewhere, forced those who are detaining abducted Iraqis to kill them to avoid being captured," she said.

Whoever is behind the deaths and whatever their motives, they clearly have had an effect on U.S. policy. In a White House news conference Friday, President Bush acknowledged that violence in Iraq had dashed his hopes of being able to reduce the number of U.S. troops there. Troop levels now stand at 147,000, up about 20,000 from early in the summer.

"The unity government's intact. It's working forward. They're making tough decisions," Bush said. But, he added, the violence had prevented Gen. George Casey, the overall U.S. commander in Iraq, from recommending troop cuts.

"Hopefully, Casey would come and say, 'You know, Mr. President, there's a chance to have fewer troops there,' " Bush said. "It looked like that might be the case until the violence started rising in Baghdad."

U.S. Soldier Missing In Iraq After Blast (AP)

By Rebecca Santana, Associated Press Writer
AP, September 16, 2006

A U.S. soldier was missing Friday, a day after a suicide truck bombing killed two soldiers and wounded another 30 west of Baghdad, U.S. military officials said.

The soldier "has been reported as Duty Status Whereabouts Unknown," the military said, without elaborating.

Neither U.S. military officials in Iraq nor in Washington would say whether they believed the soldier had been abducted or whether he may have been killed in the attack, and his remains had not been recovered.

"I'm sorry to add that we now have a soldier that we are counting as missing," Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli said in a video news conference from Baghdad with reporters at the Pentagon.

The attack occurred Thursday, when a truck driven by a suicide bomber exploded near an Iraqi power substation about 12 miles west of Baghdad, in an area where the U.S. troops were.

The soldiers had been guarding the power substation, U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said, adding that the blast occurred near concrete barriers, causing debris and shrapnel to be scattered across the area and inflicting many of the wounds.

Johnson could not comment on what type of explosives were used, whether there was more than one suicide bomber or whether the U.S. soldiers took any action against the vehicle before it exploded.

"The whole incident remains under investigation to determine how this happened and why," Johnson said.

Of those wounded in the attack Thursday, one was listed as very seriously injured and one as seriously injured, the military statement said. Eleven returned to duty, and 17 were slightly wounded, it said.

A total of five American soldiers died Thursday, making it an especially bloody day for U.S. forces. On Friday, a U.S. Marine was killed in Anbar province.

At least 2,678 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

U.S. Won't Abandon Fight In Anbar, Commander Says (NYT)

By Thom Shanker
The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — The American military in Iraq will not abandon the fight against insurgents in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province despite a shift of troops toward Baghdad for a major operation to stifle sectarian violence in the capital, the second-ranking commander in Iraq said Friday.

The commander, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, of the Army, describing the Baghdad security mission as "our main effort," said he had ordered reinforcements to the capital from other parts of Iraq.

"Armies that don't weight the main effort really don't ever have a main effort," General Chiarelli told Pentagon reporters via videolink from his headquarters outside Baghdad. "And that's not the case with this force."

Even so, General Chiarelli stressed that the American military has not forsaken Anbar Province, a Sunni area stretching from west of the capital to the Syrian border that has been a haven for homegrown insurgents and foreign terrorists.

"We are not looking to walk away from that province. That is just flat wrong," said General Chiarelli, who is commander of day-to-day military operations in Iraq. "We are committed to the people of Al Anbar and will remain committed to the people of Al Anbar and do everything possible to make their life better."

General Chiarelli spoke at the end of a week in which it was revealed that a classified Marine Corps intelligence report on Anbar Province said security there would continue to deteriorate absent an infusion of money and an additional division's worth of troops.

After the report's contents were disclosed, the senior Marine Corps commander in Iraq, Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, said his force levels "are about right" for a mission that he described as primarily training Iraqi troops to take over the security effort.

General Chiarelli said the intelligence report's assessments of the problems in Anbar were "right on target." But he insisted that more troops would not guarantee success.

"I don't believe there is any military strategy alone, any kinetic operations that we can run alone, that will create the conditions for victory which we must have," General Chiarelli said. "The real heart" of the intelligence report, he added, was "that there are economic and political conditions that have to improve out at Al Anbar, as they do everywhere in Iraq, for us to be successful."

General Chiarelli also sought to erase any perception that a heightened emphasis on training Iraqi security forces to take over the mission from Americans meant that United States military forces had abandoned the goal of defeating the insurgency.

"We are fighting to win," he said. "But we understand that winning is a combination of a whole bunch of things in this insurgency we're fighting, and as I've indicated time and time again, this is different than any other fight I believe the United States of America has ever found itself in."

Iraq is not in a civil war, General Chiarelli said, but the threat has shifted from terrorist and insurgent violence to battling bombings and murders driven by sectarian tensions — although at times it is difficult to separate the motivation behind any single attack, he added.

As for whether Iraq is in a civil war, he said, "I state emphatically I do not believe it is, but I do believe sectarian violence is something we've got to get a handle on."

The general recounted conversations with local Iraqi officials across the country who told him the best route to lowering the level of violence is, "Find jobs for the angry young men."

To achieve economic progress, he said, "We need help, and we've got commitment from the Iraqi government for help. And as quick as we can get that help out there to start working those economic conditions, I think that that is, in fact, a strategy for victory."

U.S. Shifting Troops In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns, Ap Military Writer

U.S. officials say they have not written off Iraq's troubled Anbar province — the country's largest, and one of its most violent — but neither are they sending more U.S. troops there to battle the insurgents.

In fact, they have shifted some troops from Anbar to Baghdad this summer, not because security conditions are improving in the western province but because they are deteriorating even more in the capital area. The Pentagon told Congress two weeks ago that Baghdad has some of the makings of an all-out civil war.

Anbar suddenly drew attention at the highest levels of the Pentagon this week with the disclosure in news reports of a remarkably pessimistic, secret assessment by the intelligence chief for Marines operating in Anbar. The assessment by Col. Pete Devlin said, in essence, that U.S. and Iraqi forces have battled to a stalemate with the insurgents in Anbar, and that economic and political breakthroughs are urgently needed.

Speaking to reporters at the Pentagon on Friday from his headquarters in Baghdad, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who oversees U.S. military operations throughout Iraq, said he agrees with Devlin's conclusions — but apparently not with Devlin's view that the situation cannot be rescued without an infusion of more U.S. troops.

"That's Pete's opinion," Chiarelli said when a reporter noted that Devlin called for adding thousands more troops.

When placed in the broader context of what's happening elsewhere in Iraq — namely the threat of civil war in Baghdad — U.S. commanders generally agree that Baghdad has to be a higher priority than Anbar, Chiarelli indicated. Therefore, the effort in Anbar should be seen as supporting, or secondary to, the Baghdad effort.

"That's what we're doing right now, and we're going to continue to do that until we get the conditions in Baghdad where they need to be," Chiarelli said.

The future of Anbar is in doubt, but Chiarelli strongly denied that U.S. officials consider it a lost cause.

"We are not, and I repeat we are not, looking to walk away from that province," he said.

In a telephone interview on Tuesday, the top U.S. commander in Anbar, Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, told reporters that U.S.-led forces were "stifling" the insurgency there but are not strong enough to defeat it. He said his main mission is not to defeat the insurgency but to train Iraqi soldiers and police.

"Now, if that mission statement changes — if there is a larger role seen for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight — then that is going to change the metrics of what we need out here" in terms of U.S. troop levels, Zilmer said.

Asked about that comment, Chiarelli said no one should doubt that the U.S. goal in Anbar is to prevail against the insurgents.

"It is our job to win, but winning is a combination of not only what U.S. forces do on the ground, but our Iraqi counterparts," Chiarelli said, adding that the government in Baghdad needs to follow through on promises to provide more resources for Anbar to revive the economy and get jobs for young men who are otherwise attracted to joining the insurgents, who offer higher pay than either the Iraqi army or police.

Barham Saleh, the deputy Iraqi prime minister, said Thursday during a Pentagon visit that he met recently with the governor of Anbar and promised to release "a lot of funds" to improve security and the economy.

"It's not just a matter of security operations," Saleh said. "People need to see reconstruction and they need jobs being made and so on."

Anbar has been an uphill struggle for U.S. forces since the war began in March 2003. It is populated mainly by Sunni Arabs, whose lost their grip on power to the majority Shiites when Saddam Hussein was toppled that April. The Sunnis have been the driving force behind the insurgency, whose main strongholds have been Fallujah and, more recently, Ramadi, the provincial capital.

In a Sept. 1 report to Congress on conditions in Iraq, the Pentagon said that from May 20, when the new Iraqi government was seated, through Aug. 6 there was an average of more than 30 attacks a day in Anbar — more than any other province in the country and slightly more than in Baghdad.

Of the 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, about 30,000 are in Anbar.

General Says Suppressing Violence In Baghdad Is Top Priority In Iraq (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Although U.S. military forces aren't giving up on defeating the insurgency in Iraq's Anbar province, their primary effort has shifted to quelling violence in Baghdad, the No. 2 American general in Iraq said Friday.

Lt. Gen. Pete Chiarelli acknowledged that a leaked classified intelligence report recommended that another division, about 10,000 to 15,000 troops, was needed to stabilize Anbar province, but he said the main effort now was to secure Baghdad. Some U.S. forces have been moved out of Anbar and other parts of Iraq and sent to Baghdad.

"That's what we're doing right now. We're going to continue to do that till we get the conditions in Baghdad where they need to be," Chiarelli said, speaking by teleconference from Iraq to reporters at the Pentagon.

Anbar province, which stretches west of Baghdad to the borders of Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, has long been a stronghold for the Sunni-led insurgency and al-Qaida fighters. The classified report, which was leaked this week, reportedly said that the political and security situation in the province had deteriorated so much that only more aid and another troop division could turn things around.

The commanding general of coalition forces in Anbar, Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, said Tuesday that he had enough troops for his main mission, which was training and recruiting Iraqi forces, but would need more to win against the insurgency.

His comments and the classified report were among the first acknowledgements that more troops would be needed to defeat the insurgency in Anbar.

President Bush brought up Anbar on Friday in response to a reporter's question about whether Iraq was in a civil war. He said Anbar hadn't been lost, adding, "That's not what our commanders think."

"No question it's a dangerous place," the president said. "It's a place where al-Qaida is really trying to root themselves."

A U.S. Marine was killed in Anbar province Friday, and two soldiers were killed near Baghdad by a roadside bomb. Five U.S. troops were reported killed in Iraq on Thursday.

In its quarterly report to Congress earlier this month, the Pentagon said that although the struggle between Sunni and Shiite extremists seeking to control Baghdad was now the greatest threat to security in Iraq, the Sunni-led insurgency against coalition forces remained "potent and viable."

Chiarelli expressed dismay over the leak of the report, which was written by Marine Col. Pete Devlin, but he said its findings that more political and economic support were needed in the province were "right on target."

He said he didn't believe "there is any military strategy alone . . . that will create the conditions for victory which we must have."

Chiarelli said that when he asks governors and local officials what would help most to reduce the violence, "their number one answer, the thing they always tell us is, `Find jobs for the angry young men.'

"As quick as we can get that help out there to start working those economic conditions, I think that is, in fact, a strategy for victory," he said.

U.S. forces "will remain committed to the people of al Anbar and do everything possible to make their life better," he added.

Chiarelli said coalition forces had seen a 35 percent decrease in sectarian violence in the targeted Baghdad neighborhoods since security was tightened more than a month ago.

DOJ_NMG_0064406

"I've been into every one of those areas," he said. "I've talked with the people. I've seen markets open up. I've seen people on the streets at times when there used not to be anyone on the streets."

Iraq's Ministry of Health reported earlier this month that more than 1,500 bodies were delivered to the Baghdad morgue in August, compared with 1,855 bodies that were reported delivered in July, an all-time high.

Coalition officials said their new figure, which shows the 35 percent decrease, didn't include victims from car bombings, mortar attacks or other mass-casualty violence.

Chiarelli said that opinions differ over what constitutes sectarian violence.

General Says Quelling Baghdad Violence Priority (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

U.S. troops were shifted from Iraq's Anbar province, where the insurgency is still strong, to Baghdad because quelling sectarian violence in the capital is a higher priority, a senior U.S. commander said yesterday.

"The main effort is Baghdad, and we must ensure that we weight the main effort," said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, using military terminology for drawing on available troops elsewhere in order to bolster the military effort in Baghdad.

Gen. Chiarelli, who is responsible for U.S. military operations throughout the country, said he may see Anbar through "a different lens" than even the U.S. commander in charge of the province.

In addition to extending the combat tour of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade and sending it from northern Iraq to Baghdad, a smaller unit was moved this summer from near Rawah, in Anbar province, to the capital. The 172nd was replaced by another Stryker brigade in the north, but the unit in Rawah was not.

Gen. Chiarelli said Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is "totally focused on ensuring that we keep what we need in Baghdad to do the job that we need to have done." He added that he thinks that efforts to stabilize Anbar, which stretches west from Baghdad to the Syrian and Jordanian borders, are "moving in the right direction."

"The forces that were taken out of al-Anbar and moved to support the Baghdad security plan were part of the process that I talked about, of winning the main effort," he said, adding that they were moved from a location that is "nowhere near any of the locations that you would commonly look at for increased violence in al-Anbar."

In a Sept. 1 report to Congress on conditions in Iraq, the Pentagon said that from May 20, when the new Iraqi government was seated, through Aug. 6 there was an average of more than 30 attacks a day in Anbar -- more than any other province in the country and slightly more than in Baghdad.

Of the approximately 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, about 30,000 are in Anbar.

On Tuesday, the commander of U.S. forces in Anbar, Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, told reporters his main mission is to train Iraqi security forces, not to defeat the insurgency. "Now, if that mission statement changes -- if there is seen a larger role for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight," then it might require an infusion of U.S. troops, Gen. Zilmer said.

Gen. Chiarelli, however, said no one should doubt that the goal in Anbar is to win.

"We are fighting to win, but we understand that winning is a combination of a whole bunch of things in this insurgency we are fighting," he said, mentioning a requirement for more economic and political progress. Local Iraqi leaders in Anbar tell him, Gen. Chiarelli said, that their top need is "jobs for the angry young men."

Gen. Chiarelli also said he agrees with the central conclusions of a recent intelligence assessment by the top Marine intelligence officer in Anbar, Col. Pete Devlin, who wrote that more economic and political progress must be made to break what amounts to a military stalemate with the Sunni Arab-led insurgency there.

Gen. Chiarelli called on the Iraqi national government to do more to improve economic conditions in Anbar.

"Commitments have been made out in al-Anbar; I hope that those commitments come through and come through sooner rather than later," he said. "And when they do they will go a long way to our combined goal of winning in al-Anbar."

Anbar Called Secondary To U.S. Efforts In Baghdad (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

American troops face "significant challenges" in western Iraq's volatile Anbar region -- the deadliest province for U.S. forces -- but military efforts there are secondary to the priority of quelling sectarian unrest in Baghdad, the second-ranking U.S. commander in Iraq said yesterday.

"Al Anbar today is a supporting effort to what we're doing in Baghdad," Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, commander of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said in a videoconference with Pentagon reporters. "Baghdad is our main effort right now," he said, explaining why a battalion of U.S. troops was recently moved from Anbar to Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0064407

On a day of sober talk about Iraq, Chiarelli also issued a dire warning on the risks of pulling out U.S. troops and allowing the country to slide into civil war, drawing an analogy from the 1980s Iran-Iraq war to suggest the loss of life from such a conflict could be staggering.

President Bush acknowledged serious problems in both Anbar and Baghdad yesterday, revealing that U.S. and Iraqi forces are constructing an earthen berm around the capital city of 5 million people and reinforcing checkpoints to try to stop the inflow of insurgent bombs.

Bush said he had hoped U.S. commanders would be able to reduce U.S. troop levels in Iraq, currently at about 140,000, until violence surged in Baghdad in June and July.

Anbar, Bush said, is "a dangerous place . . . a place where al-Qaeda is really trying to root themselves." But he rejected any suggestion that U.S. military had failed in the Sunni Arab insurgent stronghold. "This business about . . . 'Anbar is lost' is just not the case," Bush said.

Implicit in Chiarelli's remarks on Anbar was the idea that, given limited overall troop numbers in Iraq, American commanders must make difficult trade-offs as they concentrate forces in one troubled region at a time. "There's not a commander in the world who wouldn't say he could use more forces," he said.

Anbar has emerged as Iraq's most violent province, followed by the far smaller but more densely populated province of Baghdad. More than 30 percent of all attacks in Iraq from May to early August took place in Anbar, slightly more than in Baghdad, which ranked second for daily attacks, according to a Pentagon report released this month. More than 900 U.S. troops have been killed in Anbar since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, compared with more than 600 in Baghdad, according to the Web site iCasualties.org.

Chiarelli said he agreed with a classified intelligence report on Anbar that surfaced in the media this week, which concluded U.S. forces had fought to a military stalemate in Anbar as political and economic conditions there deteriorated. The report, by Col. Pete Devlin, intelligence officer for the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, is "right on target," he said.

"I don't believe there is any military strategy alone . . . that will create the conditions for victory," Chiarelli said. "We need the political support. We need economic support in al-Anbar," especially jobs for disgruntled young men, he said. The U.S. military will not abandon Anbar and is working to step up recruiting of Iraqi security forces there and improve their literacy, he said.

But asked for his reaction to the report's conclusion that another full U.S. ground division -- about 10,000 troops -- is needed to achieve success in Anbar, Chiarelli stated: "That's Pete's opinion." Troop levels in Anbar are appropriate, he said, "given conditions in Baghdad."

U.S. and Iraqi military operations reduced sectarian attacks in August in Baghdad neighborhoods, Chiarelli said, although he did not provide any statistics. Among the biggest problems, he said, are car bombs or other spectacular attacks that then prompt Shiite death squads to torture and execute Iraqis who are "picked off the streets, sometimes from lists."

Yet he warned that if a U.S. withdrawal led to civil war, the casualties would be far worse.

"If we're not successful . . . and Iraq would descend into civil war, the lens we look at and think about the casualties that could occur in that civil war may be totally different," he said, recalling his visit Thursday to an Iran-Iraq war battlefield on Iraq's southeastern border, where by official counts a million people perished in the 1980s.

One More Time, A Mission To Iraq (PHI)

By Edward Colimore

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 16, 2006

Three years ago, they were called up to serve in Iraq, in dangerous places such as Mosul and Hilla, south of Baghdad. Many of them came under sniper fire in convoys and were attacked by mortar rounds and rockets in their camps. Some were wounded. One was killed by a car bomb.

Now, members of the Army's Norristown-based 358th Civil Affairs Brigade are among the relatively few reservists heading back for a second tour of duty. Amid increasing violence, they will help restore electricity and water supplies, and reestablish hospitals, schools and law enforcement.

Post Your Comment

About 10 percent of reserve units across the country have been returned to Iraq, and that percentage is likely to increase if the American military presence continues, Pentagon officials said.

"My family is not happy about it, but they support me," said Maj. Christopher Lewis, 38, a 358th member and Coatesville resident who is married and has two children, 6 and 3. "I just got back, but I'm going over for another year.

"The kids don't understand; they just know I'm going away for a long time."

Under the present system, reserve units can be called back to Iraq a year after they have returned from a tour of duty, but the vast majority have not, said Pentagon spokesman and Army Reserve Maj. Nathan Banks.

DOJ_NMG_0064408

The Defense Department hopes to create a six-year cycle that would require a unit that has served overseas to rest for two years, train for two years and have two years during which it can be mobilized, Banks said.

"We're trying not to overuse the soldier and his family," said Banks, 42, a Blackwood resident who also will be heading to Iraq this fall. "We're not there yet, but that's our future plan. That way, when you join a unit, you know its status."

About 20 percent of the National Guard force across the country have volunteered to return to Iraq, said National Guard Bureau spokesman Emanuel Pacheco. Troops trained as military police or engineers have been especially in demand.

National Guard troops normally are under control of the states, but they can be federalized by the Pentagon for national military service such as duty in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The military reserves are federal troops.

Active-duty members of the Marine Corps, who are usually more involved in combat roles, have seen three or more tours of duty, according to Banks.

This week, the troops in the 358th Civil Affairs Brigade were training at Fort Dix for their return. Among them were teachers, doctors, engineers, lawyers and environmental experts who spent Tuesday morning in a classroom learning how to tow a disabled humvee out of the "kill zone" without stopping - and without holding up a convoy.

They spent the afternoon getting hands-on instruction from Sgt. Steven Pyluck, 38, of Hightstown, N.J., who demonstrated a tow with humvees in an open field. They also practiced convoy and "aggressive" driving maneuvers that could help save their lives.

On Wednesday, the troops ran convoys through mock battles in which they came under attack by Iraqi role-players. They are scheduled to leave next Saturday for Fort Bragg, N.C., where they will undergo six weeks more of training before heading to Kuwait, then on to assignments in Iraq.

Col. Chuck Steinmetz, 49, of Drexel Hill, said about 20 percent of the more than 125 members of the 358th heading to Iraq served there in 2003 and 2004. The rest are new to the unit.

"Civil Affairs is a small community of reservists," he said. "It's like being in a family; they take care of one another. Many feel a duty to go back. Morale is high."

The last time Lewis, of Coatesville, was in Iraq, he helped coordinate operations and went on about 10 convoys, never coming under fire.

Others were not so lucky. A member of the 416th Battalion of the 358th was manning a gun turret of an armored humvee when a sniper shot him in the chest. He survived because of a bulletproof vest, with only the wind knocked out of him.

Col. Chuck Hutt, 48, of Langhorne, who helped train the troops this week, wanted the other soldiers to see the result of the shooting, and displayed the vest with an AK-47 round embedded in it.

Lt. Col. Paul Dougherty, 45, a Philadelphia native living in Exton, said he and other troops came under attack from rocket and mortar fire fairly regularly when they were in Iraq the first time.

"One of my buddies and another [soldier] were killed when a car bomb slammed into his [convoy] vehicle in Mosul in 2004," he said, referring to the death of Lt. Col. Mark Phelan of Green Lane.

One way of avoiding casualties is constantly training. "There are new lessons to learn," said Lewis. "The emphasis is on force protection. They brought in a trainer who just got back from Iraq to tell us about the latest tactics of the enemy."

While ducking bullets, the unit will be trying to rebuild Iraq and bring in humanitarian relief. The 358th "identifies the critical infrastructure needs," said Dougherty, a special-education teacher who plans to marry when he returns. "It means getting things turned on, whether it's electricity, water purification or a sewage system. It may mean getting a hospital or university going."

On his second tour, Sgt. Ryan Wildermuth, 23, of Coatesville, hopes to continue rebuilding the police department and local government.

"I worked on the public safety team with [Iraqi] firefighters, police and prison guards," said Wildermuth, who wants someday to join a police force or the Secret Service. "We were training and equipping the Iraqis, and you should have seen their faces when they got new equipment, things as simple as handcuffs and nightsticks. I'm proud to be going back."

Another member of the unit, Lt. Col. Kathy Brill of Philadelphia's Overbrook Park section, is also looking forward to the rebuilding mission. She has served Bosnia and Afghanistan and "is married to the Army."

"We don't know what they need until we get there," she said. "But we're trained to do all civil-affairs missions and work with the people and communities."

Col. Kevin McAleese, the 358th's spokesman, who lives in Philadelphia's Fairmount section, said that part of the mission for him in 2004 involved working with U.S. corporations and Kuwaiti officials to provide donated items such as sneakers, school supplies, medical equipment and computers.

As the training progressed at Fort Dix this week, Col. Toby Pennels, commander of the 358th, said he had "seen things over the past five days that I didn't anticipate - new tactics and procedures.

"I'm never above learning," said Pennels, a Portland, Maine, resident who leaves a wife and children for his second tour. "Everybody has got to know everything. The key is repetition."

In the back of everyone's mind, though, was family.

"My family is concerned but supportive," said Maj. Steven Hart, 44, a Plymouth Meeting resident who is married and has a 9-year-old daughter and 7-year-old son.

"But I tell them what they do is harder than what I'm doing. I'm trained well and confident."

Second Tour of Iraq

About 10 percent of federal military reserve units across the country have been returned to Iraq.

About 20 percent of state National Guard forces across the country have volunteered to return to Iraq.

In Pennsylvania, 500 of the 15,000 members of Army National Guard and 10 of the 4,000 Air National Guard have chosen to go back.

In New Jersey, 2 percent to 5 percent of the Army National Guard's 6,000 members and about 20 percent of Air National Guard's 2,300 have volunteered to return.

Twenty percent of the more than 125 members of the 358th Civil Affairs Brigade served in Iraq three years ago and are heading back.

Iraqi Ambassador Accuses U.S. Of Stonewalling In Cousin's Death (FREEP/AP)

By Sarah Karush

Detroit Free Press/AP, September 16, 2006

SOUTHFIELD, Mich. (AP) -- Iraq's ambassador to Washington on Friday accused U.S. officials of stonewalling him in his efforts to find out what happened to his cousin, who was killed by the military near Haditha.

The military announced in July that it had completed an investigation of the incident and determined that a U.S. Marine acted in self-defense.

Ambassador Samir Sumaidaie said he learned of the investigation's result in March or April from Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq. He said he was promised a copy of the military's report on the case, but has not received it.

Sumaidaie called the delay "unsatisfactory."

"It sounds to me very much like bureaucratic stonewalling," he told The Associated Press in an interview in suburban Detroit, where he was meeting with members of the area's large Iraqi community.

A request for comment was left with the Defense Department press office.

The cousin, a 21-year-old engineering student named Mohammed Sumaidaie, was killed during a search of his family's home near Haditha on June 25, 2005.

Ambassador Sumaidaie, who at the time was Iraq's representative to the United Nations, has said his cousin was killed after he escorted Marines to a bedroom to show them where a rifle that had no live ammunition was kept.

In July, Maj. Douglas Powell, a military spokesman, said the Marine "acted properly in self-defense in response to unexpectedly encountering a man pointing an AK-47 at him."

Sumaidaie said Friday that he found the self-defense conclusion "incredible."

Mystery Deepens In Case Of Missing Colorado Marine (NYT)

By Mindy Sink

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

BOULDER, Colo., Sept. 12 — The story was compelling. A marine home on leave from his first tour of duty in Iraq was injured in a fall while hiking down a mountain with a friend and vanished after the friend went to call for help.

As one of the largest search and rescue operations in state history was under way, speculation ran high that the marine, Lance Cpl. Lance Hering, 21, might have lost his memory or become disoriented as a result of his head injury or that a mountain lion or bear had attacked him.

On the second day of the search, investigators began to have their suspicions and have since said that it was all probably a hoax and that the marine might be on the run.

“The mystery has gotten deeper,” said Lloyd Hering, the corporal’s father.

What is known is that Corporal Hering left his parents’ house on Aug. 29 to hike with a high school buddy, Steve Powers, 20.

The search for him lasted five days, using helicopters, dogs and hundreds of volunteers, before it was called off.

DOJ_NMG_0064410

"It is certainly disappointing for that have all to have been a waste and unnecessary exercise," said Kevin Harner of the Rocky Mountain Rescue Group.

In the first days of the search, Corporal Hering's mother, Elynne, wore a T-shirt with the Marine motto "Semper Fi" as she combed the mountains. She later collapsed from dehydration and exhaustion.

Mr. Powers also joined the searchers, with many risking their lives.

Days after the search ended, Mr. Powers confessed to detectives that it had all been a set-up to help Corporal Hering avoid returning to Iraq. Mr. Powers, a student at the University of Colorado here, was charged with false reporting, a misdemeanor.

Calls to Mr. Powers's lawyer were not returned, and his father, answering a call to his house, said his son was not answering questions.

Corporal Hering's parents now say that they do not know what to believe and that they fear that their son may be a victim of foul play.

"There is no shred of evidence at all to confirm this man's new story," Mr. Hering said of Mr. Powers's confession. "It may be as completely false as the lies he told us all for 10 days."

Lloyd Hering is a Vietnam veteran, and the corporal's brother Brendan, 23, who flew in to join the search, is in the Air Force. The family has repeatedly said that Corporal Hering, who is due back at Camp Pendleton, Calif., on Monday, is a proud marine who would not flee.

"His parents have one perspective," the Boulder County sheriff's commander of detectives, Phil West, said. "A couple of people have come forward saying that Lance thought it would be cool to stage his own death and go live in a foreign country under an assumed name."

Commander West said Corporal Hering's access to $2,000 that he owed his parents and his criminal record were red flags. In 2004, Corporal Hering and Mr. Powers were caught trying to break into a store. They were given deferred sentences for the felony charges, but they have now violated their probation.

Commander West said the authorities would seek restitution for the more than $10,000 that the search cost.

Corporal Hering could face legal trouble with the Marines on charges of lying on his application — he did not mention his arrest — and desertion if he does not return to his base on time.

On Tuesday, Corporal Hering's parents returned to the rocks and rushing river of Eldorado Canyon to ask the public to help find their son.

"Our heartfelt thanks to the hundreds of volunteers," Lloyd Hering said. "We now know lots of places where Lance is not."

Iraqi President Travels To Colorado (AP)

AP, September 16, 2006

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani spent Friday in this posh mountain resort as part of an annual conference sponsored by a New York investment company, The Associated Press has learned.

Talabani's participation was confirmed by a U.S. State Department official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to make statements about the president's schedule. His arrival was first reported by the Aspen Daily News and KREX-TV in Grand Junction.

Talabani was expected to travel to New York this weekend and then to Washington for a private meeting with Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice next week, Assistant Secretary Kristen Silverberg said in Washington.

Talabani arrived late Thursday so he could attend the closed-door conference sponsored by Forstmann Little Co., the Daily News said. A spokeswoman at Forstmann Little said she could not comment, though the upscale resort 100 miles west of Denver often attracts political and corporate leaders for conferences.

Talabani, a Kurd who once took up arms against ousted dictator Saddam Hussein, was elected president last year. Earlier this month, Talabani said he expected fighting in Iraq to slow by the end of 2007 and that Iraqi forces will be able to handle any remaining violence.

Born in 1933 in the village of Kelkan, Talabani attended law school and in 1975 founded the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan. He led armed resistance against Saddam until 1988, when the Iraqi leader expelled Kurds from strategic areas in the north and gassed Kurdish towns near the Iranian border, killing tens of thousands of people.

After the 1991 Gulf War, Talabani and Kurdish Democratic Party leader Massoud Barzani began fighting over control of the north. A U.S.-sponsored truce was signed in 1998 and the two formed a Kurdish alliance.

Talabani's PUK also worked with the CIA in the months before the March 2003 invasion of Iraq.

NATO Chief: More Troops For Afghanistan (AP)

By Paul Ames

AP, September 16, 2006

NATO's top commander renewed an appeal Friday for allies to urgently provide up to 2,500 troops for the battle with Taliban insurgents in southern Afghanistan, but officials said it likely would take two weeks before governments reply.

Gen. James L. Jones told a closed meeting of ambassadors from the 26 NATO allies that Poland's welcome offer of 900 troops in February had not diminished the immediate need for more troops, planes and helicopters, according to officials at NATO headquarters.

Diplomats said they expected the call for more troops to feature at a meeting of allied foreign ministers Thursday in New York, but said decisions likely will have to wait until defense ministers gather Sept. 28-29 in Slovenia.

They said governments needed time to assess what forces they could make available, to test political support for deployment and to find funding for such a mission.

Officials spoke on condition of anonymity because the meeting was closed.

Canada announced Friday that it was sending tanks and about 200 more soldiers to Afghanistan, bringing its total commitment to 2,500 troops.

Last week, Jones said the reinforcements were needed to pursue the Taliban before the onset of winter enabled them to take refuge in the hills.

Allies have been reluctant to commit forces, as they already are stretched by other international missions and are worried about the risk of high casualties from the tough Taliban resistance.

Although key allies such as Spain, Italy and Turkey have said they would not send combat troops, NATO commanders said they were confident of eventually getting the reinforcements. The delay, however, meant they had less time to be effective before the snows set in.

NATO has about 20,000 troops in Afghanistan. Most are engaged in peacekeeping and reconstruction efforts in the north and west, but since July about 8,000 troops — mostly from Britain, Canada, the Netherlands and the United States — have pushed into the Taliban's southern heartland.

They have been surprised by the ferocity of Taliban resistance and have sustained more than 30 deaths. NATO has said, however, that enemy casualties run into hundreds, and Jones told the ambassadors that an ongoing campaign to push the Taliban out of two key districts west of Kandahar was going well.

NATO Secretary Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said the possibility of speeding up the Polish deployment was being negotiated. Diplomats said funding from other allies could help facilitate an earlier deployment, and perhaps encourage other financially strapped eastern European nations to participate.

Canada's Defense Department said the reinforcements it was sending include an infantry company, a squadron of about 15 Leopard tanks, some military engineers to bolster Canada's provincial reconstruction team and a special anti-mortar unit.

The Canadian infantry will help protect the provincial reconstruction team while the tanks will provide some heavy-hitting combat support.

Danish Defense Minister Soeren Gade said his country may send special forces to support a separate U.S.-led counterterrorism operation in eastern Afghanistan. Denmark already has about 300 soldiers in southern Afghanistan with the NATO force.

Norwegian Deputy Defense Minister Espen Barth Eide also said his country's government is discussing whether to send more troops. He said no troops would be sent immediately. Norway's three-party coalition government is split on the issue.

Tensions Overshadow Gains In Afghanistan (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 15 -- Despite scattered gains by international troops fighting Taliban insurgents in the country's south, Afghan and foreign analysts here have voiced concern that a recent peace initiative is backfiring and that lapsed Afghan militias could be drawn into the conflict unless it is quickly quelled and replaced by aid and protection.

DOJ_NMG_0064412

NATO and U.S. military officials here said this week that an intensive two-week operation against Taliban fighters in Kandahar province had been a tactical success, killing more than 500 insurgents and forcing others to retreat. Afghan and foreign forces also retook a district in neighboring Helmand province that had been seized twice by the Taliban.

But these pockets of progress on the battlefield are part of a larger, murkier political map. As other Afghan militias begin defensively rearming, ethnic tensions have risen, raising the specter of the kind of civil conflict that devastated the country in the early 1990s.

A call for additional troops by NATO's senior commander has so far drawn only one positive response, Poland's offer of 1,000 personnel. Military officials here say pro-government forces need to win key areas soon and to begin delivering aid and security if they are to halt the slide in public support.

"We can't just keep fighting endless battles without having something to offer the next day," a senior Western military official said. "We have killed a lot of Taliban, but they are not running out of foot soldiers, and for every one we kill, we create new families that hate us."

On Sept. 5, Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, announced a peace pact with domestic Taliban forces operating in the tribal areas of Pakistan along the Afghan border. The next day, he traveled here to promote the agreement and to try to ease tensions with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, saying the two leaders should work together to fight the Taliban and terrorism.

Under the peace deal, Taliban groups in Pakistan pledged not to cross the border to attack in Afghanistan. But since Sept. 5, assaults on Afghan and foreign forces near the Pakistani frontier have continued.

Musharraf, meanwhile, infuriated Afghan officials by making comments in Europe this week that equated members of the Taliban with Pashtuns, the largest Afghan ethnic group, and suggested they were more dangerous than al-Qaeda.

"Associating the Pashtuns with the Taliban is an affront to a community who is eager to establish security and sustainable stability all over Afghanistan," the Afghan Ministry of Foreign Affairs said in a statement. The ministry expressed "profound regret over Pres. Musharraf's attempt to attribute a murderous group and the enemy of peace to one of the ethnic groups living on the both sides of the Durand line."

The Durand Line, arbitrarily drawn by the British in 1893 to separate Afghanistan from what is now Pakistan, is a perennial irritant for both countries. It divides Pashtun tribal lands and is not accepted by many Afghans.

Many Afghans say they suspect that Musharraf's deal with Taliban forces in his own country is an attempt to wash his hands of a domestic problem and push it across the border into Afghanistan. At the same time, they say, he has gratuitously insulted a neighbor that had hosted him just days before.

Musharraf has stood by his pact and denied intending to give offense. He and Karzai are scheduled to meet separately with President Bush in Washington this month. The Bush administration strongly backs both rulers and is eager to patch up their tense relations. Since the overthrow of Afghanistan's Taliban rulers in late 2001, the United States has made a major investment in troops and money in an effort to bring stable and democratic rule to the region as an antidote to Islamic extremism.

Inside Afghanistan, persistent and widening attacks by anti-government insurgents have provided ethnic militia leaders in both the north and south with an excuse to regroup and potentially rearm their forces, many of which were disbanded after 2001 under an ambitious, U.N.-sponsored program.

In the Pashtun south, where Afghan army and police forces are underpaid, poorly equipped and scattered thinly across the conflict zone, the government has authorized local police forces to form auxiliary contingents, most likely drawing on idle former militiamen. In some cases, tribal leaders have threatened to form their own defense forces.

In the north and west, dominated by the Tajik and Uzbek ethnic groups, former Islamic militia figures who fought Soviet troops in the 1980s are said to virtually control daily life in many areas. Despite a new program to disarm and pacify the region, Afghan and foreign observers said some commanders appear to be gaining further strength as the Taliban threat draws closer and villagers seek powerful patrons to protect them.

"In the north, they ask how they can be expected to disarm if the south is arming itself," said one Western diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity. Ethnic divisions are so deep in Afghanistan, the diplomat added, that if the Karzai government were to fall, civil conflict might resume almost immediately.

"Five years ago, the Taliban were very weak and the warlords had all fled the country," said Sayed Daud, director of the Afghan Media Resource Center, a nonprofit research agency. "Now the Taliban are back and the warlords are back. They have made a lot of money, they have weapons, and the government can't touch them."

The insurgency continues to spread beyond the south. In the past week, fresh attacks have taken place as far apart as Ghazni province in the east, where Taliban and NATO forces have been battling over several villages, and Farah province in the far west, where 150 Taliban fighters stormed the provincial capital and others shot and killed an Afghan U.N. employee.

But the most urgent need, military officials and diplomats said, is to contain the southern conflict, defeat the insurgents in key districts of Kandahar and Helmand, and begin providing support to civilians there.

British and Canadian troops have fought intensely and suffered numerous casualties since NATO took over command of the southern front from the U.S.-led coalition on July 31. But military and diplomatic observers cited concern that forces from other NATO countries, operating under narrower mandates laid down by edgy governments, will not shoulder enough of the burden.

"A great deal is at stake here for NATO. It's their first operation outside Europe and an important test case," said one foreign observer. "If the fighting worsens, some members may ask whether it is worth the risk, and some may ask why they should put their soldiers in harm's way while others are sitting in easy places."

Even more is at stake for Afghans, who felt abandoned by their Western supporters after Soviet troops withdrew in 1989 and now fear the same could happen again. NATO and U.S. military officials reiterated this week that their commitment is long-term, but they also said time is running short.

"It took us four years to learn how to operate here. NATO doesn't have four years," a U.S. military official said. "It's not enough to kill Taliban. We're trying to help build a government that is weak and still fighting off the competition. That's the really hard part."

4 Taliban Militants Die In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, September 16, 2006

About 60 suspected Taliban militants attacked a police checkpoint in southern Afghanistan, starting a battle in which four militants died, police said Saturday.

The clash occurred Friday in the Khas Uruzgan district of southern Uruzgan province, said Mohammad Zahir, the district police chief.

The militants attacked a checkpoint near the district police headquarters, and NATO and Afghan soldiers came to the aid of the police, Zahir said. He said there were no casualties among the Afghan security forces or NATO.

Police recovered the bodies of the four suspected Taliban, Zahir said.

NATO has about 20,000 troops in Afghanistan. Most are engaged in peacekeeping and reconstruction efforts in the north and west, but since July about 8,000 troops — mostly from Britain, Canada, the Netherlands and the United States — have pushed into the Taliban's southern heartland.

They have been surprised by the ferocity of Taliban resistance and have sustained more than 30 deaths. NATO has said enemy casualties run into hundreds.

Afghanistan Body Count Raises Skepticism (APY)

By Matthew Pennington

AP, September 16, 2006

NATO's estimate of Taliban killed this month has created skepticism and worry in Afghanistan, with local officials saying that either the militant force has grown bigger than imagined — or too many innocent Afghans are being killed.

NATO says its forces, backed by the Afghan army, have killed more than 500 Taliban militants near Afghanistan's main southern city of Kandahar in Operation Medusa, a sweep launched Sept. 2.

The figures, if accurate, make it the deadliest battle since U.S. warplanes bombed the extremist militia, host of Osama bin Laden, out of power in late 2001.

"If they kill that many, the Taliban must have thousands of fighters on that front," said Mohammed Arbil, a former Northern Alliance commander. In the recent past, Taliban units have been described in terms of dozens or hundreds at most.

But NATO has stood by its battle assessments as solid, even conservative.

One official with the military command, called the International Security Assistance Force, said internally circulated estimates of militant dead were more than double the tally released to journalists.

"We'd rather have a lower figure that we can back up than a higher one that stretches your willingness to trust us," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

NATO says the high toll is due to its superior firepower, including fighter jets and artillery, compared to the Taliban militia's roadside bombs and assault rifles. It says it avoids civilian casualties by warning residents to evacuate.

The inability of journalists to reach the area has made it virtually impossible to check the figures.

Hundreds of families displaced from the war zone, in the Panjwayi district, are also in the dark, and don't even know if their homes are still standing.

DOJ_NMG_0064414

The onslaught has dispelled any doubts that NATO, which recently took over in southern Afghanistan, is willing to use overwhelming military force. But Afghans, while eager for the Taliban uprising to end, have mixed feelings.

In the capital Kabul, there's disbelief that so many guerrillas could be killed and citizens escape unscathed. In Kandahar city, closer to the battle, there's dismay over the intensity of the fighting, and calls for peace talks.

"Who are these Taliban? They are Afghans," said Mira Jan, a displaced 42-year-old grape farmer from Panjwayi. "NATO and the government must convene a ulema (Muslim clerics') council with tribal elders and convince the Taliban to stop fighting."

By all measures, the Taliban have stepped up their attacks this year. NATO forces that took charge of security in the south last month expected hit-and-run guerrilla tactics, but instead have often faced well-organized militant forces that stand and fight.

Nowhere has that been more apparent that in Panjwayi, a rural district of dried-mud houses scattered among orchards where hundreds of Taliban militants had massed, posing a threat to Kandahar city, the former stronghold of the hard-line Islamic regime, just 15 miles away.

NATO launched Operation Medusa to wipe out the militants.

When NATO announced by the second day of the offensive that its artillery and airstrikes had killed more than 200 militants, skeptical journalists without access to the action — following a government warning that anyone straying off the main road could be shot as suspected Taliban — pressed for details: where were the bodies and how are they counted?

"Your know what you can see through a telescope? We have those kind of capabilities all over the battle field," said NATO spokesman Maj. Scott Lundy. "We are reliant on every soldier on the battlefield to feed up the information that they have, from what they have seen through weapons' sights and with other surveillance assets. It all gets thrown into the mix."

Lundy said such estimates are "imprecise," but stressed that NATO makes every effort to make them as accurate as possible and usually goes with a conservative number. "We would be quite happy to speak about military success without going into the detail, but it's what the media want," he said.

To date, NATO has reported at least 517 militants dead compared to 20 from its force, 14 of them in an accidental plane crash.

The Taliban has denied suffering such high casualties. Neither side has offered details about how many militants have been wounded.

According to an Associated Press count based on reports from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials, 2,800 people have died so far this year in violence nationwide, including militants and civilians — about 1,300 more than the toll for all of 2005.

Andrew Krepinevich, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington, said that given the circumstances in which the Taliban had massed in one place, the figures given by NATO were plausible and could well be an underestimation, because of the effort the Islamic militia makes to bury their dead quickly.

He also said that given NATO's aim to create secure zones, they had little incentive to inflate the death toll.

"I have no suspicion they are trying to widely inflate the casualty numbers. They are not trying to measure success that way anyway," Krepinevich said in a telephone interview.

"They would be trying to measure success in terms of the population feeling secure, is reconstruction proceeding, is commerce growing."

Insecurity has clearly prevented any progress on those counts. And the alliance's success in battle has induced little optimism among Afghans that NATO — struggling to marshal enough forces for its mission — is close to defeating the resurgent Taliban.

"All these bombardments leave behind a bad name for the international community for killing Afghans," said Taj Mohammed Wardak, a former Afghan interior minister. "It will only create more motivation for revenge."

Top Arrests Soon To Cut Off Afghan Drugs Trade: US Official (AFP-Y)

AFP, September 16, 2006

Some of the key players behind Afghanistan's record-high opium trade are expected to be brought before court over the next year, a top US counternarcotics official said.

The arrests would be vital to a strategy to stem the increasingly sophisticated narcotics trade before links between insurgents and drug traffickers become entrenched, Thomas A. Schweich said on Friday.

"I think you are going to see some big people being prosecuted over the season ... over the next 12 months," the US deputy assistant secretary for international narcotics told reporters in Kabul.

There have been doubts about the will of the authorities to round up the kingpins of the trade, as some of them are allegedly in top positions in government.

Afghanistan's opium production soared to a record 6,100 tonnes this year, a nearly 50 percent jump on the previous year. This was despite Afghan and international efforts costing millions of dollars to cut output.

DOJ_NMG_0064415

Schweich said there had been a "very slow start" to a two-year-old strategy to fight the drugs trade, but he was confident the plan was the correct one and would pay off if implemented more aggressively.

The "carrots" of the strategy, such as development help for areas that cut production, and the "sticks" -- eradication, interdiction and prosecution -- had not been as effective as they could have been, he said.

And in the southern province of Helmand, which produces more opium than any other province in Afghanistan, top officials "practically encouraged poppy growth," he said.

But there had been small improvements: interdiction of drugs had doubled over the past year to two percent of the volume, and about four times more of the crop was eradicated, although this only came to a low 16,000 hectares (39,500 acres).

The total area under cultivation was 165,000 hectares.

"We don't need to change the fundamental strategy, I think it will work given enough time," Schweich said.

The official said the United States had "no doubts" that insurgents were getting money through the narcotics trade.

It was important that this relationship be stopped before the financial ties between them became too strong, entrenching unrest, he said.

And while heroin production was also increasing inside Afghanistan, the narco-industry was not as sophisticated as in countries like Colombia, he said.

"There is a window of opportunity here in Afghanistan to prevent that level of sophistication ... but we have to act very quickly," Schweich said.

Afghanistan's Catch-22 (WSJ)

By Dana White

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

"Hong Kong harbor? Well, that's not all that different from my view here in Kabul," quips Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the commander of U.S.-led coalition forces in Afghanistan, as we begin our telephone interview. The three-star general is chipper, given how far he is from the creature comforts of our last encounter -- a black-tie affair at Washington, D.C.'s Ritz-Carlton.

It was inside the Beltway that I noticed the general's striking resemblance -- both physically and intellectually -- to Gen. Douglas MacArthur, the military man who rebuilt Japan six decades earlier. A fluent Mandarin Chinese speaker and a Harvard and Stanford graduate, Gen. Eikenberry, like MacArthur, is a brainy soldier. And like MacArthur, he's trying to come to grips with "an unprecedented undertaking," as he puts it: the reconstruction of an entire country, from scratch.

From an armchair in Washington or Brussels or Tokyo, it's hard to grasp the magnitude of the security problems that U.S. forces, and the NATO troops operating separately from the U.S.-led coalition, are facing. Modern-day Afghanistan has rarely existed in this, its current form. It was a notional nation -- bound more by kinship and ethnic tribalism, than nationality or rule of law. After the Soviets withdrew and the country fell into civil war, the country was ripe for the Taliban to settle in, but they, too, couldn't tame the rugged Afghan outback and provincial warlords and strongmen.

"In my 33 years in the military, I have never seen tougher terrain than here," says the general, who adds that the "vast majority of the country" is now secure. "There are about five or six provinces that have significant security challenges and they are primarily in rural areas." Translation: Kabul and major cities are calm, but in the southern and eastern provinces, where the government hasn't established its authority, violence prevails.

In some regions, peace admittedly won't come easily, if at all. Take the border with Pakistan, which is roughly twice as long as California -- and twice as mountainous. Gen. Eikenberry says the area can't physically be secured, no matter how many boots are planted on the ground. True, Pakistan has committed nearly 80,000 troops to the effort, but the general -- while lauding the cooperation between the Pakistani and Afghan forces, which are old foes -- avoids questions about why Taliban insurgents are still finding safe haven in Pakistan.

Other areas, however, could be secured, and haven't been -- particularly the southern provinces. In recent months, Taliban fighters seized on the transfer of control from U.S. to NATO forces and engaged in pitched battles. NATO's top commander said last week that he needs 15% more troops to effectively roll back the Taliban threat. They may not get there before the Afghan winter sets in and the Taliban retreats into well-fortified caves.

"The insurgents are better equipped and better trained than they were a year ago," Gen. Eikenberry says. "People often fail to understand the full complexity of the violence here. There are several causes for violence in these provinces, including land disputes, tribal feuds and property titles. Taliban fighters often capitalize on these existing divisions to garner support in local communities."

Gen. Eikenberry understands the root of the problem. And it's a big one. In 2005, Afghanistan earned $2.7 billion in opium exports, or 52% of its GDP -- plenty of cash to support an insurgency. That fighting has, in turn, basically halted all of the infrastructure build-out that was meant to provide Afghan farmers and other rural residents alternatives to growing poppy.

"In traveling around the country, the top concern of Afghans is unemployment, education and irrigation," Gen. Eikenberry confirms. But to address these issues -- and here's the catch-22 -- violence in rural Afghanistan must first be quelled. If it isn't, the infrastructure that will facilitate trade cannot be built.

It's not the military's job to tackle the drug trade head on, Gen. Eikenberry explains. He argues that it's a police matter that should be handled by Afghanistan's police force (which is not nearly as well-trained as the army). Rather, the U.S.-led coalition forces assist local law enforcement with intelligence gathering, training, medical assistance and some combat power, he explains.

But even with military assistance, Afghanistan's law enforcement is woefully ill-prepared to uproot the firmly entrenched drug enterprise. NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer reiterated last week that NATO forces wouldn't take a leading role in combating the Afghan drug trade. But calls for change are growing: This week even the United Nations called on NATO to take up the fight.

Afghans have been growing opium for centuries, and without a practical alternative, they will continue to grow the cash crop. Despite the Karzai government's effort to eradicate the plant, and $780 million in U.S. aid to promote crop replacement, old habits die hard. In many rural areas, there are no schools or hospitals, and water is scarce. The population is largely illiterate. It will be hard for Kabul's democratic methods to take root as long as the violence continues, and no roads or schools are built. "It's going to take education. And it will take a long-term international commitment. It was never going to be easy." Gen. Eikenberry says. "There are some fundamental problems that have no easy answers."

Since NATO relieved U.S. forces in southern Afghanistan in July, more than 500 suspected Taliban fighters have been killed. "The insurgents are no match for the forces here and can be managed," Gen. Eikenberry says. While the general is confident the military can suppress the insurgency, it's unclear whether the violence can stop long enough for the government to provide viable alternatives to Afghans. That's not a question for the general, but for the politicians.

Alternative Futures (WT)

By Paul Greenberg

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

I knew Jay Rockefeller was a U.S. senator from West Virginia, but before now I had no idea what a seer the man is.

Not only can Mr. Rockefeller peer into the future and confidently tell us how it turns out, he can turn the clock back to the past, specifically March 2003, and, like a projectionist putting in an alternate reel, show us the better future that might have been. If only the United States and its allies had not invaded Iraq, Swami Rockefeller explains, the world would be a better place today -- even if Saddam Hussein were still in power.

How does he figure that? Well, Saddam "wasn't going to attack us. He would've been isolated there. He would have been in control of that country, but we wouldn't have depleted our resources." It's all right there, in the senator's crystal ball.

But two can play at this purely speculative game. Turn the clock back to 1936 and ask what would have happened if the West, instead of appeasing Adolf Hitler when he started his aggression by remilitarizing the Rhineland, had stood up to him.

Suppose an Allied expeditionary force had crossed the Rhine early on and deposed Der Fuehrer in a blitzkrieg of its own -- but then found itself bogged down in a guerrilla war, having to fend off suicide bombings, improvised explosive devices, and attacks on the freely elected government that had replaced the Brownshirts. Who knows what would have happened?

But surely this is certain: Some isolationist senator with Mr. Rockefeller's gift for second-guessing would have explained how much safer the world would have been if only we had let Hitler stay in power, obnoxious little irritant that he might be. After all, "He wasn't going to attack us. He would've been isolated there. He would have been in control of that country but we wouldn't have depleted our resources."

But as it happens, the Free World did appease Herr Hitler. Again and again, until it was almost too late. And we all know the result: the most disastrous war in the history of the world.

Back in the present, the president of the United States continues to speak out for his strategy in this war on terror, or whatever History in its wisdom/hindsight, will call it.

Was the president's address from the Oval Office this week political? He was accorded the airtime on the major networks because it wasn't supposed to be political -- and in the narrow, partisan sense, it may not have been.

But it was certainly a political speech in the broader sense, laying out the president's grand strategy in this contentious conflict. In particular, his address to the nation emphasized his faith in freedom as the best defense against a fanatical enemy, one as devoted to violence and tyranny over others as the fascist movements of the last century.

Reasonable men may agree or disagree with the president's policy, but fair-minded Americans will recognize his sincerity. For there is no reason other than honest belief for this president to pursue a course that has imperiled his popularity and divided the country.

George W. Bush could have laid back, temporized just as his immediate predecessors did, and allowed Saddam to remain in power in Iraq and the Taliban in Afghanistan. He could have treated terrorism, even on a September 11, 2001, scale, as a matter of law enforcement rather than war. Instead, he has moved boldly against a great and growing threat.

Mr. Bush's presidency could turn out as tragically as Lyndon Johnson's or Woodrow Wilson's, other presidential idealists. Much depends on the patience and perseverance of the American people. Or he may yet prove as farsighted as Franklin Roosevelt or Ronald Reagan in understanding the threat to the Free World in their time.

But this president continues to plead his case, and his refusal to swerve from its basic justification, even in difficult times and as the leader of an increasingly divided nation, testifies to his honest convictions. One need not share those convictions to recognize that the man has some, and will fight for them.

Winners And Losers Five Years After 9/11 (FT)

By Jurek Martin

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

I am not sure there are many words left to say after a week like this. But perhaps it is worth thinking about the winners, big and small, of that awful day five years ago rather than dwelling on the losers, of whom there are far more.

At a personal, insignificant level, I confess 9/11 was good for me. I was in a kind of male, menopausal funk, writing too little, spinning my wheels, generally uninspired. Even the golf game was bad.

At ten that morning, as I was glued to the TV, the phone rang. It was Johannesburg, amazingly, on the line, Caroline Southey, a dear friend and former colleague then editing South Africa's best magazine. She had five hours to press time. "Give me all you can," she ordered.

I did, 4,000 words in all. I don't really know if they were good, bad or indifferent but I was back doing what I had done for 35 years, writing hard and fast to a deadline. Another old friend told me later that week: "Think how miserable you'd have been if this happened and you had nobody to write for."

The funk disappeared just like that.

Moving up the cosmic scale, my wife benefited from 9/11, though she first feared the worst. The think-tank she had co-founded, the Migration Policy Institute (MPI), had opened its doors on 3/11, with just enough backing from foundations to get going.

When the stock markets reopened and lost an immediate bundle, cutting into foundation endowments, she thought MPI would be virtually stillborn. But suddenly the world wanted to know more about immigration and national security. They rushed out a paper on the subject within two weeks – and haven't looked back since.

At the national and global level, Paul Wolfowitz also seized the moment. (I invoke his name as the symbol of the neo-conservative movement.) Then deputy secretary of defence and now head of the World Bank, he talked about toppling Saddam Hussein as early as 9/12, at Camp David, with the president.

As the world now knows to its cost, the neo-cons, using 9/11 as their pretext, hijacked American foreign policy and still have not lost full control of it. They did not even have to tell the truth to justify their goals. (Wolfowitz himself had admitted that weapons of mass destruction were little more than a convenient rationalisation.) Intelligence was manipulated to prove their point.

And when Iraq went sour, Wolfowitz had no compunction in blaming a cowardly press that didn't have the guts to go out and report the good news. I will never forgive him for that. This was the man who never set foot outside Baghdad's Green Zone without protection from battalions of American troops.

But it is all part of the piece. Mendacity and exaggeration have profited enormously from 9/11. Just this week the ABC "docu-drama" The Path to 9/11, seemed to imply that if Bill Clinton had not been dallying with an intern Osama Bin Laden would be six feet under. It was unadulterated CSI vs al-Qaeda rubbish, much more fiction than fact.

But we keep reading that more and more Americans believe, courtesy of internet babble, that the US government somehow took down the twin towers on 9/11 and that the plane hijacks never happened. Surely not even Michael Moore would concede the Bushies are good enough to pull that one off.

It is almost as if FDR's great dictum "we have nothing to fear but fear itself" has been taken to exactly the opposite extremes he intended. Fear has unleashed the xenophobia that powers anti-immigrant sentiments in America; fatuously, it gave us "freedom fries" in the US Congress.

It also made beneficiaries of non-American universities, only too happy to accommodate the foreign students who used to come here in droves but found short-sighted national security considerations putting obstacles in their way. This will hurt America over the longer term.

DOJ_NMG_0064418

Others have come out ahead of the game, too. As John Tierney wound up his New York Times column a week ago, "the terrorist threat is still small; it's the terrorism industry that got big." It is one of those comments, saying it all, which I would give my eye teeth to have written.

It is an industry that is all around us, when we board planes or watch "experts" pontificating on TV when they are not writing books without number that raise the fear factor further. Government deficits soar as the industry grabs even more of the federal and state dollar.

Fear even frames the national debate or will be seen to have done if the president and his Republican strategists succeed in turning back the tide that ought, objectively, to engulf them in the November mid-term elections.

After all, it worked in 2002 and 2004.

But mostly the biggest winners were those who found a voice, even in, or because of, their own losses. It was the widows of 9/11 who forced a secretive government to form an independent commission to investigate what happened and why. It may not have found all the answers but it surely increased national awareness – and that is a blessing in these fear-ridden times.

Turkey's Iraq Problem (WP)

By Lenore G. Martin

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Although the world is paying more attention to Hezbollah and the Iraq insurgency, there's another guerrilla group that poses a severe threat to the stability of the Middle East.

The Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), operating from havens in northern Iraq, has been attacking Turkish security forces in southeastern Anatolia and occasionally civilians elsewhere. Turkey is determined to prevent a repetition of the 1984-99 guerrilla war with the separatist PKK, in which it suffered more than 30,000 deaths. It has mobilized a large force on its Iraqi border and is threatening to invade northern Iraq.

A Turkish invasion would create chaos in that part of Iraq and potentially destabilize the region. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's response -- moving to reinvigorate a tripartite commission made up of the governments of Turkey, Iraq and the United States -- is insufficient. The United States needs to take much firmer action to stop the PKK guerrilla war from undermining its Middle East policy.

In the previous guerrilla war, the PKK operated from Iran, northern Iraq and Syria. Syria also gave sanctuary to Abdullah Ocalan, the PKK leader. Saddam Hussein and then the British and the Americans, under their no-fly zone, permitted Turkey to attack the PKK in northern Iraq. After Turkish troops massed on the Syrian border, the late Syrian leader, Hafez al-Assad, expelled Ocalan, who was eventually captured and imprisoned in Turkey.

The PKK then declared a cease-fire but renounced it in 2004. During the current Iraq war, the United States has prevented Turkish forces from crossing into Iraq, contributing to Turkey's frustration and the current crisis.

If the United States does not oppose a Turkish invasion it will face a more chaotic situation in Iraq and the loss of a long-term relationship with the Iraqi Kurds, who are Washington's best hope for obtaining rights for U.S. bases in the future. If Washington opposes the invasion, it risks further estrangement from Turkey, a state positioned to play a critical strategic role in a region where Iran increasingly challenges the United States for dominance.

Turkey fears Kurdish irredentism coming from an independent Kurdistan. The Iraqi Kurds perceive a Turkish invasion as aimed at controlling oil-rich Kirkuk, thereby denying the Iraqi Kurds an economic base for their independence. Furthermore, Turkish intervention in Iraq would create a terrible precedent for Syrian and Iranian intervention in the Iraqi civil war.

What should the United States, Turkey and the Iraqi Kurds do to avert this crisis?

Difficult as it may be for the Iraqi Kurdish leaders, they must be willing to deny the PKK havens in northern Iraq and prevent PKK leadership from traveling freely throughout the country.

The Turks, for their part, must more assertively address the cultural, political and economic demands of the Kurds in southeast Anatolia, an area suffering from high unemployment and in need of economic development. To its credit, Turkey has already begun the process of increasing Kurdish cultural rights. Encouraged by its European Union accession negotiations, Turkey has passed laws giving Kurds the right to speak and publish in Kurdish and, to a more limited extent, to broadcast and teach Kurdish.

Recognizing minority rights has been a difficult accommodation for a state that is proud of the integration of its Kurds and their full participation in every aspect of society, including parliament and the cabinet. The Turkish state generally views all of its citizens simply as Turks and believes that recognition of ethnic differences would threaten the cohesion of its political life. On the other hand, by increasing Kurdish cultural rights, Turkey will give greater voice in government to its Kurds and dilute the appeal of the separatism advocated by the PKK.

DOJ_NMG_0064419

For its part, the United States needs to avert a Turkish invasion of Iraq. It must throw its full weight behind efforts to eject the PKK from northern Iraq. Furthermore the United States needs to pressure Europe more energetically to block the transfer of funds to the PKK, which it has classified as a terrorist organization. It cannot rely on a tripartite commission to stop the next guerrilla war in the Middle East.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

House Panel Pursues Key Figures At HP (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

The firm's chairwoman and lawyer are asked to testify in the spying flap. A shareholder files suit.

A congressional panel wants to question key figures in the scandal surrounding Hewlett-Packard Co.'s investigation of media leaks, and a shareholder lawsuit was filed in state court accusing the company's top brass of breaching their duties.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee sent letters Friday requesting that HP Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn and General Counsel Ann O. Baskins appear at a Sept. 28 hearing of its oversight and investigations subcommittee.

HP spokesman Mike Moeller declined to say whether either would testify.

"HP is fully cooperating with all ongoing investigations and inquiries, including the one being conducted by the House subcommittee," he said.

Silicon Valley attorney Larry Sonsini, who served as an outside legal advisor to HP during its investigation, was also asked to appear, as was Ronald DeLia, who runs a Boston-area private investigation firm that was hired by HP to conduct the probe.

Calls to Sonsini and DeLia were not immediately returned.

The congressional panel has been conducting an inquiry into "pretexting," the practice of impersonating people to access their personal information.

Dunn has acknowledged that she authorized the probe, in which private investigators hired by HP used Social Security numbers and other personal information to pose as company directors, employees and journalists to gain access to logs of their home and cellular phone calls.

The probe resulted in the resignation of two HP directors and the demotion of a third. George A. Keyworth II quit the board after acknowledging he was a source of the leaks. Thomas Perkins stormed out of a May 18 board meeting in protest of the investigators' tactics. Dunn will step down as chairwoman in January and be replaced by HP Chief Executive Mark Hurd.

As HP's staff attorney, Baskins allegedly oversaw the leak investigation and declared it to be legal.

HP insiders and contractors are likely to invoke their 5th Amendment right against self-incrimination rather than testify before Congress and possibly expose themselves to criminal charges, one legal expert said.

"Though the appearance will be gruesome … to do otherwise might not be prudent," said Ed Harmon, a partner with Thorp Reed & Armstrong in Pittsburgh.

The lawsuit was filed Thursday in Santa Clara County Superior Court by Juliet Worsham on behalf of all HP shareholders. It alleges "substantial expense and damage" to the company from the investigators' use of pretexting and seeks to have Dunn, Baskins, Hurd, DeLia and several members of the HP board found to have breached their fiduciary duties and abused their power.

It asks for the defendants to reimburse Hewlett-Packard for any financial damage suffered by shareholders as a result of the pretexting scandal and to "reform and improve its corporate governance and internal control procedures."

HP spokesman Moeller declined to comment on the suit.

California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer has said HP insiders and the outside investigators are likely to face criminal charges tied to the pretexting scandal. The FBI and the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California are also investigating, as are the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Federal Communications Commission.

Also Friday, Carly Fiorina, ousted as HP's CEO last year, steered clear of the scandal during a speaking engagement at Babson College in Wellesley, Mass. An audience member asked her how she would handle the controversy if she were Dunn, but Fiorina declined to answer.

HP's stock, which has been all but immune to the boardroom scandal, fell 7 cents to $36.18.

A Clubby World Turns Aggressive And Combative (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

The once-clubby atmosphere of the public company boardroom has undergone a makeover during the past several years, as board members become more willing to flex their muscle and aggressively press management for changes.

Since early 2005, directors of some of corporate America's biggest names have pushed out their chief executives. At American International Group Inc. and Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., the board members acted in response to concerns raised by prosecutors. The head of Pfizer Inc. lost his job amid criticism over his $83 million retirement package as the company's share price slumped and the rollout of new drugs lagged.

The unfolding scandal at Hewlett-Packard Co. -- where the company's chairman, who was concerned about leaks, ordered an investigation of directors' phone records that may have been conducted illegally -- offers an extreme example of the new tensions inside some boardrooms.

Legal analysts, governance experts and directors agree that the nature of boardroom politics has changed in the years since Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. collapsed and directors of both companies were held personally liable for investor losses. New stock exchange listing standards that require a majority of directors to be independent of company management, the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law that lays more responsibility on boards and pressure from shareholder activists have combined to change how directors view their jobs.

"It's been a dramatic change in the last five years. It's the era of the empowered independent director," said Richard H. Koppes, former general counsel of Calpers, the California state employees pension plan, who now sits on the boards of two public companies.

Governance experts were quick to note that the situation at Hewlett-Packard is unusual and that its woes seem to stem from a board that was feuding and dysfunctional. They also noted that while the board voted to remove Patricia C. Dunn as chairman, they allowed her to stay in place until January and keep her seat as a director. But the governance experts said the mess should serve as a cautionary tale for newly assertive directors on how not to handle disagreements.

Independent directors now hold 81 percent of board slots at companies on the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, up from 77 percent in 2001, said Julie H. Daum, who heads the board services practice at the search firm Spencer Stuart.

Many of the new outsiders are former regulators and retired executives who have been welcomed by longtime directors and management for their expertise. But board deliberations at some public companies have been complicated by pressure from large activist shareholders -- such as hedge funds and private equity funds -- to add directors who have a specific mandate to push for change.

General Motors Corp., for example, recently added Jerry York to its board under pressure from investor Kirk Kerkorian, who has acquired a nearly 10 percent stake in the automaker. Similarly, Acxiom Corp., an Arkansas data integration firm, headed off a proxy fight with the investment firm ValueAct Capital Partners in August by adding ValueAct managing partner Jeffrey W. Ubben to its board.

In 2001, Ubben's firm took a large stake in Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia Inc., and he joined its board. When the firm's founder and namesake ran into legal trouble, Ubben assumed the chairman's role and helped the company survive Stewart's conviction and imprisonment.

"They're bringing the boardroom back to where it was originally in the 1920s when large shareholders were managing the company," said Charles M. Elson, director of the University of Delaware's Center for Corporate Governance. Management-appointed boards are a more recent phenomenon that sprang up when companies grew too large for single individuals to hold a significant stake, he said.

But the result has been a bit of a culture shock for directors and management accustomed to a less contentious era.

"Compared to a generation ago, boards take longer to reach common agreement because people are more outspoken," said Phil R. Lochner Jr., a former Securities and Exchange commissioner who sits on the board of five public companies. "Older directors often still view things from a management point of view or are more supportive of management. Younger directors who supported Sarbanes-Oxley tend to be more outspoken and more willing to challenge things."

A few boardroom struggles have turned into all-out war. Take, for example, Atmel Corp., a Silicon Valley chipmaker where the five independent directors banded together to fire chief executive George Perlegos, his brother and two other top executives. Perlegos responded by filing a lawsuit arguing that his termination was unlawful because he had already called a shareholder meeting to remove the directors. The lawsuit is pending.

DOJ_NMG_0064421

"Anybody who believes that CEOs are protected by clubby boards hasn't looked around lately," said William J. Holstein, editor in chief of Directorship magazine. "People are beginning to worry whether boards are being too aggressive in pushing out CEOs rather than giving them time to work out a strategy."

Even companies with famously accommodating boards, such as Home Depot Inc., are starting to feel the heat. The home improvement chain recently yielded to shareholder pressure and changed the way directors are elected to require candidates to get a majority of votes cast rather than a simple plurality.

The nature of the boardroom -- confidential and consensus-oriented -- has put some limits on what would-be activists can do, the governance experts said. Though an individual director may want to challenge management, he or she has only one vote and must win the respect and support of the rest of the board to have much impact.

"It's something that has to be done over a period of time. If [a new director] comes in and says, 'I'm new to the board and I think we should break up the company tomorrow,' that's not going to be terribly well received by people who have worked at this for a long time," said Theodore L. Dysart, who heads board practice for the consulting firm Heidrick & Struggles.

Directors also have to keep in mind that they are charged with representing all shareholders, not just a particular group that put them on the board, governance experts said. And just about everyone agreed that leaks -- particularly of market-moving information -- are an absolute no-no.

"If you disapprove of the action that's being taken, then there's not a whole lot you can do except resign," said Charles H. King, head of global board services for Korn/Ferry International.

In Grasso Case, Justice Ramos Rules On Himself (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

His Own Fairness Questioned, He Declines to Step Aside; Interest in Particle Physics

The legal battle over the paycheck of the New York Stock Exchange's former boss -- was he overpaid, or not? -- took an unusual twist this past week: The judge had to make a ruling on his own conduct.

On Thursday, Justice Charles Ramos declined to remove himself from the case, despite an argument by lawyers for Dick Grasso, the NYSE's former chief, that the judge couldn't be fair. One reason: Twice in recent years, Justice Ramos applied for a job on the NYSE's board, which decides what to pay executives at the stock exchange.

Mr. Grasso was paid more than $100 million in 2003, his last year on the job, He's being sued by New York state's attorney general on the grounds that he didn't deserve that much money at the exchange, now owned by the publicly traded NYSE Group Inc.

It's not the first time that the 64-year-old Justice Ramos, of the state Supreme Court (a trial-level court in New York), has played a big role in a controversial case. In 2002, he took the surprising step of trying to cut the $625 million in fees claimed by lawyers involved in a tobacco-related lawsuit, calling the size of the sum "offensive." (He was overruled, and the lawyers did get their fees.) He is also presiding in the high-profile case involving American International Group Inc.'s former chief executive, Maurice R. Greenberg.

In 1990 he was the judge in an unusual court battle over whether the movie "Tie Me Up! Tie Me Down!" deserved an X rating. At that time, Judge Ramos criticized the movie-rating system as a "form of censorship," but he upheld the X rating. And in 1988, he presided at the wedding of Robin Givens to boxer Mike Tyson, the heavyweight champ at the time. (They got divorced the next year.)

After 16 years as a private attorney, Mr. Ramos was appointed to the New York City bench in 1983 and elected in 1985, according to a résumé filed in Mr. Grasso's legal papers. Since 1993, he has served in New York State's commercial division, where he has become known for moving complex cases through the system involving Wall Street, the insurance industry and the entertainment business. According to the résumé Mr. Ramos submitted when applying for the NYSE's board, he enjoys driving race cars and reading and writing about particle physics.

Justice Ramos declined to comment.

Robert E. Rodes Jr., a professor at Notre Dame Law School, said applying for a job and getting turned down "isn't an obvious basis" for a problem.

According to attorneys who have tried cases in his courtroom, he has a reputation for volatility and wit. At times, for instance he compliments lawyers for making persuasive arguments -- moments before denying the motion.

Other times, he's less patient. During settlement discussions in a case last year between the NYSE and some disgruntled investors in the Big Board, he scolded one attorney in chambers for interrupting him. According to two people present at the time, he walked around from behind his desk, and jabbed his finger at the attorney's face, saying that if it happened again, the judge would throw him out of the courtroom.

In another instance, in open court he yelled at an attorney who suggested trying to view an issue in a case in layman's terms. "We have to look at it like lawyers. I am not looking at it like a bricklayer," Justice Ramos shot back.

In the Grasso case, Justice Ramos has ruled against the former NYSE chief in several key pretrial motions: He has denied Mr. Grasso's motion to dismiss parts of the case, and has thrown out Mr. Grasso's lawsuit against former Big Board director H. Carl McCall.

Last month, the judge also ruled that he -- as opposed to a jury -- would decide the crucial question of whether Mr. Grasso's pay was "reasonable" under New York state law governing the pay for executives at not-for-profits. (Until going public earlier this year, the NYSE was technically a not-for-profit, member-owned organization.) New York's attorney general Eliot Spitzer sued Mr. Grasso in May 2004 alleging his pay package was excessive.

Mr. Grasso has fought the case and said he was awarded the money by a board that knew what it was doing.

In his decision Thursday to stay in the case, Justice Ramos said he had "formed no premature opinion" and had no reason to pull away.

A lawyer for Mr. Grasso, Gerson Zweifach of Williams & Connolly LLP, said he was considering a possible appeal.

In his efforts to find a new judge, Mr. Grasso cited two letters, sent by a job recruiter on Judge Ramos's behalf, to the NYSE in October 2002 and October 2003. In the letters, the recruiter, George V. McGough, recommends Justice Ramos for one of the NYSE's directors' spots. Those jobs now pay $75,000 annually.

The judge, whose current salary is $136,700, was considering retirement at the time, but decided to stay on the bench. He didn't get the job either time.

Mr. Grasso's lawyers have known about the letters for more than a year, according to court papers. They didn't make an issue of it until August, when it became clear Justice Ramos planned to rule on part of the case himself, instead of leaving it to a jury.

They also argue that comments made by Justice Ramos last spring also signaled that he might be biased against the former NYSE chief.

According to the motion to remove Justice Ramos, the judge said in a meeting with attorneys that Mr. Grasso received "terrible advice" about his pay. He added that, even though Mr. Grasso may have done nothing wrong, "the number" of his compensation could be a problem, according to the motion.

Justice Ramos didn't address these comments in his Thursday decision to stay on the case. Mr. Spitzer's lawyer on the case, Avi Schick, calls the comments "unremarkable" statements by a judge who was speaking in the context of a possible settlement.

A Former Peregrine Exec Pleads Not Guilty (SDUT)

By Bruce V. Bigelow, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 16, 2006

Extradition to U.S. created stir in Britain

The former European vice president for Peregrine Systems pleaded not guilty to federal fraud and conspiracy charges in San Diego yesterday after he was extradited amid a political rumpus in the United Kingdom.

Jeremy Reeve Crook, 53, became a cause celebre in London this summer because of growing popular opposition to changes in British extradition law that Parliament enacted in 2003.

The changes, which were prompted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, allow U.S. authorities to extradite British citizens and other residents without first establishing a preliminary case against them in British court.

The changes made the extradition process lopsided because British authorities “basically just turn over” anyone wanted by the U.S. Justice Department, said Douglas McNabb, a lawyer in Washington, D.C.

In contrast, British authorities seeking to extradite individuals under current U.S. extradition law have to make a case showing “probable cause” in federal court, McNabb said.

Before the end of the year, the U.S. Senate is expected to vote on changes to relax the current U.S. requirements for extradition, McNabb said. But even if those revisions are approved, McNabb said, the extradition process still will be stiffer in the United States than in the United Kingdom.

Crook became the subject of a U.S. extradition request after he was indicted in October 2004 with 10 others for their alleged roles in the massive accounting fraud at Peregrine Systems, the San Diego software developer now operated by Hewlett-Packard Co.

Prosecutors asked Crook to return voluntarily to the United States to respond to the charges. He declined, and U.S. authorities subsequently sought an extradition order.

Meanwhile, Crook's lawyers in London fueled public indignation over Britain's new extradition law and voiced their doubts about the evidence that U.S. authorities had assembled against their client.

Despite the flap, British authorities ordered Crook's extradition in August.

He appeared in San Diego yesterday morning before U.S. Magistrate Judge Ruben B. Brooks, who ordered Crook to post a cash bond of $250,000 and prohibited his travel beyond the Southern District of California.

The judge also ordered Crook to be monitored by a global positioning satellite system and prohibited any unsupervised contacts with any current or former Peregrine employees, auditors or business associates.

The indictment alleges that from March 1999 through 2002, Crook and others at Peregrine intentionally disseminated false financial reports to investors. Prosecutors contend that the alleged conspirators intended to deceive the public and investment community about Peregrine's true financial performance and condition so they could reap windfall gains from their own shares.

Nine defendants, including Crook, are scheduled for trial April 3, 2007. Eight other defendants have pleaded guilty to felony charges arising out of the conspiracy.

Ex-Enron Official Gets 4 Years Probation, $10,000 Fine For Lying To Credit-rating Agencies (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-A former assistant treasurer at the disgraced Enron Corp. was sentenced Friday to four years probation and a $10,000 (â,¬7,889) fine for lying to credit-rating agencies to make the financial picture at the one-time energy giant appear healthier than it was.

Timothy DeSpain, 41, pleaded guilty nearly two years ago to a single charge of conspiracy to commit securities fraud. At the same time, he agreed to cooperate with federal authorities investigating the company, which toppled into bankruptcy in December 2001, evaporating more than $60 billion (currently â,¬47.3 billion) in market value, almost $2.1 billion (â,¬1.6 billion) in pension plans and, initially, 5,600 jobs.

U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein, who could have imposed up to a five-year prison term and $250,000 (â,¬197,239) fine under federal sentencing guidelines, said he was impressed by DeSpain's level of cooperation with federal prosecutors looking into the Enron debacle and with letters of support from relatives and friends.

"I'd like to apologize," DeSpain said in a brief statement to the judge. "I'd like to go back and change everything if I could."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney To Enter Guilty Plea To Conspiracy (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican, has agreed to plead guilty to conspiracy to defraud the public, becoming the first member of Congress to admit peddling influence for convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Ney, who had repeatedly denied any wrongdoing, admitted illegally receiving expensive trips, sports tickets and casino chips from Abramoff and an unidentified foreign businessman in exchange for trying to win favorable legislative results, according to court papers filed yesterday.

"I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them. I am very sorry for the pain I have caused my family, my constituents in Ohio, and my colleagues," said Ney, 52, a six-term congressman.

He also said he was seeking treatment for alcohol dependency, but that he is not "making any excuses."

Assistant U.S. Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said as part of the plea agreement prosecutors will recommend a 27-month sentence for crimes that could bring Ney 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

Democrats immediately jumped on the election-year conviction and linked the Republican candidate vying to fill Ney's seat to the disgraced congressman.

The Ohio Democratic Party complained that State Sen. Joy Padgett, who won a special Republican primary Thursday, has "extensive ties to" Ney and has been unwilling "to return Ney's past campaign contributions." She will face Democrat Zack Space in the fall.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said it "confirms what we have long said: The Republican culture of corruption has pervaded Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0064424

The California Democrat also said House Republicans "have failed to pass a single substantive reform."

Kevin Madden, spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said Mrs. Pelosi "is delusional to think that her party has even a shred of credibility on the issue of reform."

"Capitol Hill Democrats have either resisted or tried to obstruct every substantive effort of reform in this Congress," Mr. Madden said.

He also noted the top Democrat on the ethics panel, Rep. Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia, had to resign because of ethics questions. Mr. Mollohan is under investigation for reputed misstatements on his financial disclosure forms.

Ney is pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit honest services fraud, violating the one-year lobbying ban on congressional officials and making material false statements, and to one count of making false statements. He will remain free until an Oct. 13 hearing when he officially enters his guilty plea.

Prosecutors said Ney improperly accepted trips to play golf, gamble or vacation in Scotland, New Orleans and New York between August 2002 and August 2003. The total cost of the trips by Ney and others exceeded $170,000, court papers said.

Separately, Ney twice flew to London during 2003 to meet with a foreign businessman who was not identified by name in court papers.

The foreign businessman is Fouad al-Zayat, a Syrian-born partner in FN Aviation of Cyprus, two people close to the investigation told the Associated Press. These people spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the plea agreement. Mr. al-Zayat is known in Britain as a prominent gambler nicknamed "the Fat Man."

The February 2003 meeting with FN Aviation was arranged to discuss U.S. sanctions against the sale of aviation parts to Iran, but those involved did not discuss specific sales or proposals, according to one of the people familiar with the case.

The Justice Department said Ney on those trips accepted thousands of dollars' worth of free casino chips from the foreign businessman and parlayed them into $50,000 in total gambling winnings playing card games.

Mr. al-Zayat could not be reached immediately for comment by the Associated Press.

The Justice Department said the foreign businessman and his partner sought Ney's help in obtaining a travel visa and selling U.S.-made airplanes and parts to a foreign country, and that the businessman's company paid for Ney's trip to London in February 2003.

FN Aviation's former U.S. lobbyists, Roy Coffee and David DiStefano -- a former Ney aide, have said they worked with Ney to seek a special government permit to let FN Aviation sell plane parts to Iran despite U.S. trade sanctions. The permit never was awarded.

Ney's named co-conspirators in the court papers include Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January to mail fraud, former Capitol Hill public relations specialist Michael Scanlon, former lobbyist Tony Rudy, and Ney's former chief of staff, Neil Volz.

Volz left Ney's office in 2002 to join Abramoff's powerful lobbying firm. The charge that Ney violated a one-year ban on lobbying by officials who leave Congress relates to Volz's failure to wait a year before going to work for Abramoff.

In May, Volz pleaded guilty to being part of a conspiracy to provide Ney with the trip to Scotland and other pricey gifts from Abramoff.

Scanlon pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to bribe public officials in connection with lobbying work on behalf of Indian tribes and casino issues. Rudy pleaded guilty in March to conspiring with Abramoff.

Democrats earlier this year focused heavily on Republican ethical problems, especially lambasting former Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican.

Mr. DeLay resigned his majority leader post and then his House seat after being indicted by a Texas prosecutor and seeing some of his aides convicted in the Abramoff scandal.

Prosecutors are looking at whether Mr. DeLay filed false public reports to disguise the source and size of political donations, travel and other gifts he received from special interests, including some with ties to Abramoff.

In a separate Justice Department corruption probe, Rep. William J. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, is being investigated on suspicion he accepted bribes. According to a search warrant affidavit, the FBI videotaped the congressman accepting $100,000 from an informant wearing a concealed microphone.

Lawmaker Pleads Guilty To Corruption (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Ohio Republican Ney admits accepting illegal gifts from lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

WASHINGTON — In court documents, he was known only as "Representative 1," an anonymous member of the House who always seemed to have his hand out when super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff came calling for favors for his clients.

On Friday, the lawmaker, Ohio Republican Bob Ney, officially emerged from the shadows and acknowledged his guilt.

Ending months of denials that he had betrayed the public trust, the politician once known as "the Mayor of Capitol Hill" agreed to plead guilty to federal corruption charges.

Ney, 52, admitted in a plea agreement with federal prosecutors filed in federal court in Washington that he had accepted tens of thousands of dollars in illegal favors from Abramoff and from a Syrian businessman nicknamed "the Fat Man."

The lawmaker said he had agreed to use his clout on behalf of Abramoff clients in return for gifts and other largesse that included nights of casino gambling in London and a lavish golf junket to Scotland. In a statement, he said that alcohol abuse had contributed to a downward spiral in his life, and that he had checked himself into a rehabilitation facility for treatment.

Prosecutors said they would recommend a sentence for Ney of 27 months in prison, although his crimes carry a maximum penalty of up to 10 years. He is expected to formally enter his plea at a hearing in federal district court in Washington on Oct. 13.

The six-term Republican is the first lawmaker to admit to criminal actions as part of the lengthy Justice Department probe of Abramoff, once one of Washington's most influential lobbyists.

The plea agreement also marked the latest fallout from an ongoing Justice Department crackdown on corruption in the capital that has focused attention on members of both parties, including Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), who is being investigated for bribery. That probe, which does not involve Abramoff, gained nationwide notoriety after Jefferson was allegedly caught with cash from an FBI sting in his freezer.

The Abramoff investigation, which mostly involves Republicans, has led to the conviction of several former congressional aides who were in the lobbyist's inner circle. It also was a key factor in the political downfall of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), who once worked closely with Abramoff and who resigned his congressional seat in June.

Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges in January, is continuing to cooperate with authorities. He and his clients lavished tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions on scores of lawmakers.

But aside from the political scandal created by the case, it remained uncertain whether other elected officials would join Ney in facing legal problems from it.

Although Ney has long been viewed as likely to face charges, evidence of possible wrongdoing by some of his colleagues has not seemed as strong. Moreover, his own plea agreement with authorities does not require him to point fingers and cooperate in the investigation.

Democrats seized on Ney's plea agreement to buttress their argument that the Republicans who control Congress have shown themselves unfit to lead.

Ney's guilty plea "confirms what we have long said: The Republican culture of corruption has pervaded" Capitol Hill, said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco).

Republicans said Ney should be held accountable, but that his misdeeds were an isolated matter that should not be used to taint his GOP colleagues.

"Clearly, Bob made mistakes, and he is now feeling the full weight of those mistakes," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Ney, in a statement issued through his lawyers, expressed remorse.

"I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them," he said. "I know that this plea agreement will probably forever change the way people view my public service. I regret this very much."

He said he has gone through a great deal of soul searching recently, and has "come to recognize that a dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me. I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions."

Before becoming ensnared in scandal, Ney headed the House Administration Committee, the post that earned him his nickname. Although the panel rarely makes news, it controls House office budgets — making it vitally important to other lawmakers.

Nudged by GOP leaders, Ney resigned the chairmanship this year. And he announced last month that he would not seek reelection in November.

Ney agreed to plead guilty to two charges, including conspiring with Abramoff and others to commit "honest services fraud," a form of corruption that is considered less serious than bribery. He also admitted that he made false statements in reporting gifts he received.

Prosecutors said that Ney accepted trips to play golf, gamble or vacation in Scotland, New Orleans and upstate New York in 2002 and 2003. Ney also admitted accepting meals and drinks at an Abramoff restaurant, tickets to rock concerts and sporting events, and tens of thousands in campaign contributions from the lobbyist and his clients.

In return, Ney supported legislation that would have allowed a Texas Indian tribe to operate a casino and helped another Abramoff client win a lucrative contract to install wireless telephone service in the House. He also entered remarks in the Congressional Record supporting an attempt by Abramoff to acquire a Florida cruise line.

DOJ_NMG_0064426

Ney also admitted that he had accepted thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips during trips to London in 2003 from a firm that was hoping to win an export license to sell U.S.-made airplanes to Iran. He allegedly parlayed the money into $50,000 playing cards; on the trip home, he gave a staff member $5,000 before passing through U.S. Customs to conceal the amount.

Lobby Scandal Topples U.S. Rep (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, September 16, 2006

U.S. Rep. Bob Ney agreed to plead guilty Friday to charges that he accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in trips, cash and campaign donations for political favors, making the once obscure Ohio Republican the first lawmaker to fall in the probe of a once-powerful lobbyist.

Ney, 52, admitted his involvement in the influence-peddling enterprise run by convicted Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who brought the scandal to South Florida with the fraudulent purchase of a local fleet of gambling ships.

Abramoff, in his plea deal with prosecutors, detailed Ney's role in helping him and his clients in exchange for everything from a golf trip in Scotland to meals in the GOP lobbyist's Washington restaurant.

With November's congressional midterm elections looming, Friday's announcement of Ney's plea agreement reignited Democratic accusations of a Republican "culture of corruption" on Capitol Hill.

Ney had strongly denied wrongdoing even as the investigation closed in around him over the last year.

Now the 12-year veteran of Congress is set to plead guilty on Oct. 13 to charges he conspired to commit fraud and violate federal lobbying laws and that he made false statements. Under federal sentencing guidelines, he faces at least 27 months in prison.

In a statement, Ney apologized -- but said "a dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me." Then he added: ``I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions."

Justice Department officials condemned his misconduct.

"He illegally deceived the public and the House of Representatives about his actions," Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general heading the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said in Washington. ``In doing so, the congressman was acting in his own best interests, and not in the best interests of his constituents."

ASSISTANCE IN MIAMI

Fisher said Justice's public corruption prosecutors received "substantial assistance" from the Miami offices of U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta and the FBI.

Indeed, Ney's downfall began in South Florida, where he had used his congressional influence to sway the sale of SunCruz Casinos to Abramoff and his New York partner Adam Kidan.

The SunCruz case against Abramoff and Kidan gave Justice Department officials the leverage to pressure the lobbyist to turn on other colleagues, congressional aides and politicians early this year.

The charges against Ney are based primarily on his behind-the-scenes work for Abramoff's Indian tribal clients and for a foreign businessman who gave him tens of thousands of dollars in casino chips and cash. But the charges also include the lawmaker's unusual tactics to help the lobbyist purchase the Dania Beach-based SunCruz gambling fleet.

During negotiations in the SunCruz deal, Abramoff asked his lobbying partner, Michael Scanlon, to do him a favor. That's when Ney entered the picture.

Scanlon contacted Ney's chief of staff, Neil Volz, to arrange to have Ney disparage SunCruz owner Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis in the Congressional Record. Scanlon drafted a statement that Ney put into the record in March 2000, calling Boulis "a bad apple" to handicap the seller.

After the deal was completed that September, Ney praised Kidan in the Congressional Record as a businessman with a ``renowned reputation for honesty and integrity."

Law enforcement officials said that just weeks after the controversial SunCruz sale, Abramoff and Kidan took $10,000 from their gambling business and donated the money to the National Republican Congressional Committee on Ney's behalf.

That SunCruz was the actual contributor was first reported by The Miami Herald in late November 2005.

Although Ney did not receive the $10,000 directly, U.S. officials said SunCruz's donation in his name to the GOP campaign committee was improper. The then-unknown Ohio congressman stood to gain stature with the Republican leadership.

Volz, who has already pleaded guilty in the Washington investigation, admitted to participating in the Congressional Record activities. Scanlon, who has also pleaded guilty, was the former communications director for former House Republican leader Tom DeLay of Texas. At the time Scanlon sought Ney's help in early 2000, Scanlon had already left DeLay's office. Scanlon and Volz were close friends on Capitol Hill.

CORRESPONDENCE

After the SunCruz sale in fall 2000, Abramoff and Scanlon exchanged e-mails about the company's $10,000 contribution to the GOP's campaign committee on Ney's behalf, according to law enforcement officials.

Scanlon, who did public relations work for SunCruz, also corresponded with Ney's staff about the Nov. 1, 2000 political contribution.

As lobbying partners, Scanlon and Abramoff would go on to rake in as much as $80 million from their work with Indian tribal clients that owned casinos (none from Florida). Those fees drew the scrutiny of the House Ethics Committee, Senate Indian Affairs Committee and the Justice Department.

As for the former SunCruz owner, Boulis, he was gunned down in Fort Lauderdale in February 2001. Three men -- including one who was a former FBI informant with ties to the Mafia -- have been charged in his slaying.

A year ago, a South Florida federal grand jury indicted Abramoff and Kidan on charges of defrauding lenders of $60 million in the SunCruz sale. Both men pleaded guilty and were sentenced to nearly six years in prison.

Both remain out on bond, while they cooperate with federal authorities.

Several Miami prosecutors have been involved in the SunCruz and Washington investigations: Lawrence LaVecchio, Paul Schwartz, Jeff Sloman, Paul Pelletier and Edward Nucci -- along with FBI agent Susan Sprengel.

Who's The Next Target In The Abramoff Probe? (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin

Time, September 16, 2006

Former Ohio Congressman Bob Ney has admitted his role in Washington's influence-peddling scandal, but prosecutors still have other politicians in their sights

After months of defiant protestations of innocence about his role in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, has pleaded guilty to making false statements, to conspiracy to commit fraud and violating post-employment restrictions for former congressional aides. But the probe into the lobbying scandal is far from wrapped up.

A source close to the investigation told TIME that scores of US prosecutors and FBI agents continue to examine the activities of other sitting members of Congress and prominent individuals who could face prosecution, though not necessarily before the November 7 election. The source confirmed previous public reports that particular scrutiny is being paid to Sen. Conrad Burns, a Montana Republican who faces a tough campaign for reelection.

"A lot of the conduct to which Ney has pleaded guilty is similar to the alleged conduct of Senator Conrad Burns and his staff," points out Melanie Sloan, Executive Director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), a non-profit watch dog group. "Abramoff has said that Burns and his staff used Signatures (Abramoff's restaurant) like their cafeteria. And Burns took a number of legislative actions on Abramoff's behalf, even as members of his staff went on trip to the 2001 Super Bowl on private jet and visited Sun Cruise gambling ships, which were partly owned by Abramoff." Abramoff himself said in an interview earlier this year that, "Every appropriation we wanted (from Burns's committee) we got. Our staffs were as close as they could be. They practically used Signatures as their cafeteria. I mean, it's a little difficult for him to run from that record."

But Erik Iverson, a senior advisor to Sen. Burns campaign in Montana told TIME: "There is no federal investigation. Certainly no one has ever told us there is, or contacted us. And there is absolutely no similarity between what's happening to Mr. Ney and Mr. Burns. That is all just politics." As a matter of policy, the Justice Dept. does not comment on possible targets of its investigations.

Ney, 52, is the first member of Congress to admit wrongdoing in the federal probe. Prosecutors are likely to insist that he spend as much as 27 months in prison, although a judge could impose up to 10 years, though that stiff a sentence is considered unlikely. His plea agreement lacks language that would require him to testify or to cooperate in other federal prosecutions — in contrast to earlier plea agreements of Ney's longtime chief of staff, Neil Volz, as well as Abramoff himself. The absence of such language suggests that Ney was able to provide little information beyond the scope of his own activity.

By the same token, some observers had predicted prosecutors would insist that Ney plead guilty to bribery, which carries a possible 15 year sentence, in part because Abramoff and another defendant admitted bribing a public official who has been identified as Ney. Right up until his guilty plea, Ney had always denied wrongdoing, even after his former chief of staff pleaded guilty in May. That aide, Neil Volz, confessed to conspiring to corrupt the congressman and others. After leaving the congressional payroll Volz went into business with Abramoff.

Court papers detail Ney's acknowledgment of exchanging official acts for benefits, including an August 2002 golf trip to Scotland, paid for by Abramoff and his clients. The junket, which included a White House procurement official as well as Ney's then chief of staff, cost in excess of $160,000, according to the papers.

DOJ_NMG_0064428

Ney also asked for and received trips to Lake George, N.Y. and New Orleans as well food and drink costing thousands of dollars at Abramoff's swanky Washington restaurant, not to mention concert and sports tickets and thousands of dollars more in campaign contributions, the government said.

In return, Ney achnowleded in the plea, he took actions to benefit Abramoff clients. The Congressman also also admitted receiving gambling chips worth thousands of dollars from a foreign businessman.

"Congressman Ney and his co-conspirators engaged in a long-term pattern of defrauding the public of his unbiased, honest services as an elected official," Alice Fisher, assistant attorney general, said in a statement. "Congressman Ney admits that he corruptly solicited and accepted a stream of benefits, valued at tens of thousands of dollars, in exchange for agreement to perform, and performing, a series of official acts. He also admitted deceiving the public and the U.S. House of Representatives about his actions."

Ney occupied a special role as chairman of the committee with jurisdiction over internal workings of the 435-member House of Representatives. But GOP Speaker Dennis Hastert demanded that Ney surrender his chairmanship earlier this year, and Ney then withdrew his candidacy for reelection in his Ohio district. This week, the Congressman's office indicated he had entered residential treatment for alcohol dependence. In a statement, he said, "I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them. I am very sorry for the pain I have caused to my family, my constituents in Ohio and my colleagues."

FBI Assistant Director Chip Burrus, head of the Criminal Investigative Division put the Ney plea deal in context, stressing that it is just part of a much wider federal crackdown on corruption. "The FBI is deeply committed to tackling corruption anywhere we find it—this is our promise to the American people, and corruption is the FBIs top criminal priority," he said. "We have more than 600 agents and dozens of analysts working more than 2200 investigations in all 56 field offices right now. Nationwide indictments are up 40 percent. In the past year alone, we have had over 950 arrests, 700 convictions, over 300 million dollars in restitution and over 15 million dollars in fines. The FBI participates in over 30 public corruption task forces and over 100 public corruption working groups." With that kind of tough talk, no one on Capitol Hill remotely linked to Abramoff will be breathing easy for quite some time.

Rep. Bob Ney Agrees To Plead Guilty (AP-Y)

By Ted Bridis

AP, September 16, 2006

Ohio Rep. Bob Ney admitted improperly accepting tens of thousands of dollars worth of trips, meals, sports tickets and casino chips while trying to win favors for a disgraced Washington lobbyist and a foreign aviation company run by a gambler known as "the Fat Man."

Ney, a six-term Republican, had defiantly denied any wrongdoing for months, but he reversed course and agreed to plead guilty in court papers filed Friday. Prosecutors will recommend he serve 27 months in prison. Ney was expected to formally plead guilty in court Oct. 13.

"I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them," Ney, 52, said in a statement. "I am very sorry for the pain I have caused to my family, my constituents in Ohio and my colleagues." His lawyer said he had begun treatment for alcohol dependency.

Ney became the first lawmaker to admit wrongdoing in the election-year congressional corruption probe spawned by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Ney said he was hopeful "that someday the good I have tried to do will be measured alongside the mistakes I have made."

Ney agreed to plead guilty to making false statements and conspiracy to commit fraud, make other false statements and violate U.S. lobbying restrictions. The charges could carry a prison sentence of up to 10 years and fines of up to $500,000 plus repayment of any improper gifts.

The chairman of Ohio's Republican Party, Bob Bennett, said Ney's apology "rings hollow," and he urged the lawmaker to resign "and begin paying the price for his arrogance and greed."

Ney's attorney, William Lawler, said the congressman, who announced last month he wouldn't seek re-election, has no plans to resign.

"He's taking it one step at a time," Lawler said. "Today was a step, the treatment is a step."

Prosecutors said Ney improperly accepted trips to play golf, gamble or vacation in Scotland, New Orleans and New York between August 2002 and August 2003. The total cost of the trips by Ney and others exceeded $170,000, court papers said. Ney also admitted accepting meals and sports and concert tickets for himself and his staff from Abramoff and his lobbyists.

Separately, Ney twice flew to London during 2003 to meet with a foreign businessman who was not identified by name in court papers. The foreign businessman is Fouad al-Zayat, a Syrian-born partner in FN Aviation of Cyprus, according to two people close to the investigation. These people spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the plea agreement. Al-Zayat is known in Britain as a prominent gambler nicknamed "The Fat Man."

Ney's congressional travel records indicate he and an aide met with al-Zayat's business partner in FN Aviation, Nigel Winfield.

The February 2003 meeting with FN Aviation was arranged to discuss U.S. sanctions against the sale of aviation parts to Iran, but those involved did not discuss specific sales or proposals, according to one of the people familiar with the case.

The Justice Department said Ney on those trips accepted thousands of dollars worth of free casino chips from the foreign businessman and parlayed them into $50,000 in total gambling winnings playing card games. On one occasion, Ney gave $5,000 to a staff member to carry through U.S. Customs so that Ney could report receiving a lesser amount, prosecutors said.

FN Aviation paid the $5,414 cost of the four-day February trip by Ney and an aide, according to Ney's congressional travel records.

Al-Zayat could not be reached immediately for comment by The Associated Press.

The Justice Department said the foreign businessman and his partner sought Ney's help obtaining a travel visa and selling U.S.-made airplanes and parts to a foreign country, and that the businessman's company paid for Ney's trip to London in February 2003.

FN Aviation's former U.S. lobbyists, Roy Coffee and David DiStefano — a former Ney aide — have said they worked with Ney to seek a special government permit to let FN Aviation sell plane parts to Iran despite U.S. trade sanctions. The permit never was awarded.

DiStefano was Ney's chief of staff before becoming a lobbyist and coordinated Ney's first congressional campaign in 1994.

"People must have faith and confidence in their elected officials," said Alice Fisher, who runs the criminal division of the Justice Department. She said Ney had "acted in his own interests, not in the interests of his constituents."

House Majority Leader John Boehner, also from Ohio, described Ney as a skilled lawmaker and good friend. "Clearly Bob made mistakes, and he is now feeling the full weight of those mistakes," Boehner said. "His actions violated the law, and he must be held accountable."

Ney did not participate in any of the 10 roll call votes in the House on Thursday, an indication he was away from the Capitol.

Republican voters in Ney's district selected a replacement candidate Thursday as word of legal developments surfaced. State Sen. Joy Padgett, backed by party leaders, won easily and will face Democrat Zack Space in the fall.

Ney had a unique power perch in the House when the year dawned, as chairman of the committee with jurisdiction over the internal workings of the 435-member chamber. Speaker Dennis Hastert pressured Ney into surrendering his chairmanship earlier this year as concern rippled through the GOP ranks about the Abramoff scandal.

Still, as recently as early summer, Ney said he intended to seek re-election in the sprawling, rural district in eastern Ohio he has represented since 1994. He changed his mind at the prodding of party leaders who feared the loss of his seat in November if he remained on the ballot.

At Abramoff's request, prosecutors said, Ney proposed four amendments in early 2002 that would have helped Abramoff and his lobbying clients. These included proposals to allow commercial gambling by two Indian tribes, help a Russian drink manufacturer and compel the U.S. government to give property to a religious school founded by Abramoff.

None of the amendments succeeded.

Ney had sought to add them to the "Help America Vote Act," a law aimed at election reform.

Rep. Ney Admits Selling Influence (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi And Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) agreed yesterday to plead guilty to corruption charges after admitting to performing a variety of official acts for lobbyists in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel, sports tickets and thousands of dollars in gambling chips. He is the first elected official to face prison time in the ongoing influence-peddling investigation of former GOP lobbying powerhouse Jack Abramoff.

After fiercely proclaiming his innocence for more than a year, Ney signed a two-count plea agreement Wednesday that the Justice Department filed in federal court yesterday. The charges of conspiracy and making a false statement could carry a prison sentence of up to 10 years, but prosecutors plan to seek a term of 27 months. He faces up to $500,000 in fines.

The six-term Republican said in a statement yesterday that he was seeking treatment for alcoholism and was sorry for "serious mistakes" that have brought pain to his family and constituents. He is scheduled to appear in U.S. District Court in Washington on Oct. 13 to formally enter his plea.

Coming just seven weeks before the midterm congressional elections, Ney's admission of guilt was cited yesterday by Democrats as evidence that Congress is beset by a "ring of corruption." But Republicans were quick to note that a Democrat, Rep. William J. Jefferson of Louisiana, is the focus of a separate federal bribery investigation.

At a news conference announcing the acceptance of the plea agreement and the filing of the charging document in court, the chief of the Justice Department's criminal division, Alice S. Fisher, said Ney had breached the public trust. "Congressman Ney and his co-conspirators engaged in a long-term pattern to deprive the public of his honest, unbiased services as an elected official," Fisher said.

Court papers made no mention of any agreement on Ney's part to provide evidence against anyone else in the ongoing probe, unlike in other plea agreements that prosecutors have reached with Abramoff and his former associates. Ney is the eighth person to be indicted or to admit wrongdoing in connection with the Abramoff investigation, under which lobbyists, government officials and other lawmakers continue to be scrutinized.

Ney, once one of the most powerful members of the House, admitted to offering legislation at the behest of Abramoff and his team of lobbyists, which included former Ney chief of staff Neil G. Volz. In exchange, Ney accepted a stream of things of value, such as luxury vacations to Scotland, Lake George, N.Y, and New Orleans; tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions; restaurant meals; and tickets to sporting events, including the use of exclusive stadium suites. Prosecutors valued the trips alone at more than $170,000.

In 2002, Ney sought to insert four amendments into an election-reform bill to benefit Abramoff's clients. He further admitted to helping another Abramoff client win a multimillion-dollar contract to provide wireless communication service to the U.S. Capitol, and to inserting comments into the Congressional Record to help Abramoff purchase a casino cruise line in Florida.

Ney, 52, under legal and political pressure for months because of his connections to Abramoff, announced this summer that he would not seek reelection. Ney has not been seen publicly in the House since he cast a vote Tuesday night, and he missed more than a dozen votes on Wednesday and Thursday. His phones went unanswered in his Washington office. His Chillicothe, Ohio, office released the congressman's statement.

"I have made serious mistakes and am sorry for them," Ney said in the statement. "I am very sorry for the pain I have caused to my family, my constituents in Ohio and my colleagues." He said he recently recognized that "a dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me."

"I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions. Over the years, I have worked to help others, but now I am the one that needs help," Ney's statement said.

As chairman of the House Administration Committee, Ney was known as the mayor of Capitol Hill. The committee oversees the Capitol Police and the administrative functions of Congress.

Ney has been under mounting pressure in the investigation, first with Abramoff's guilty plea and agreement to cooperate in the investigation early this year, and then with the guilty plea in May of his former aide Volz, who admitted to conspiring to corruptly influence the congressman and others. Ney admitted to encouraging Volz to violate the one-year ban on lobbying by staffers who leave Congress.

Ney had resigned his committee post earlier this year. William E. Lawler, an attorney for Ney, declined to say yesterday whether the congressman would now resign his seat. "He is taking things one step at a time," Lawler said.

Lawler said Ney is receiving treatment for "alcohol-dependence issues" but declined to say whether he has entered a rehabilitation facility. Lawler said treatment was the deciding factor in setting the date for next month's court appearance.

Others familiar with the case said that Ney's representatives tried to put off the announcement of the plea deal until then.

Ney will be eligible for a government pension because Congress has not acted on legislation that would ban pensions for convicted lawmakers.

Ney and his attorneys have professed his innocence for more than a year, even as the congressman's legal position deteriorated. Ney himself acknowledged the difficulty in facing down the "tremendous pressure from the government" when his close friend and former aide Volz agreed to testify against him. Tony C. Rudy and Michael Scanlon, onetime lobbyists and aides to former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), are also cooperating witnesses, as is former Abramoff casino business partner Adam Kidan.

Court papers make reference to other lobbyists and staffers with ties to Ney, including one called "Staffer C" in court papers. Public records and sources identify him as William Heaton, who, when he replaced Volz in 2001 at the age of 23, was the youngest chief of staff on Capitol Hill.

Ney admitted, in addition to the Abramoff ties, accepting free airfare, luxury accommodations and thousands of dollars' worth of gambling chips in 2003 from a foreign businessman, who was not identified in the court papers but has previously been identified by Ney attorney Mark H. Tuohey as Fouad al-Zayat, a high-rolling denizen of London's gambling clubs nicknamed "The Fat Man."

Zayat, who has been described in British media as a Syrian-born arms middleman, was seeking Ney's help in getting a visa and an exemption to a U.S. law that bars the sale of airplane parts to another country. The exemption was meant for Zayat's company, FN Aviation, a Cyprus-based aircraft-leasing firm.

Zayat and a partner, Tuohey said in an interview last year, were "offering to play a role or be intermediaries" with Iraq and Iran in the run-up to the war in Iraq. In day-long meetings in London, said Tuohey, Ney talked to the men about "potential transactions that could favorably affect our relations with those countries."

Ney admitted in court documents that he failed to disclose on forms filed with Congress the full amount of his winnings at a London casino -- reporting that he had won $34,000 on a game of chance instead of $50,000.

Ney also failed to disclose other winnings -- $5,000 worth of pound notes that he had handed to a staff member to avoid carrying them through U.S. customs himself.

In the court documents, Ney admitted later contacting the State Department on Zayat's behalf.

In March 2002, Ney -- at the urging of Volz, Abramoff, Rudy and Scanlon -- agreed to sponsor legislation that would reopen a shuttered casino for a Texas Indian tribe that the lobbyists represented. The Tigua tribe's casino had been shut down at the urging of state officials. Abramoff had secretly agitated for the closing, then signed the tribe up as a client, promising he could help get the casino reopened.

After Ney agreed to sponsor the legislation, Scanlon e-mailed Abramoff in one of the more memorable exchanges to become public in the lobbying scandal: "Just met with Ney!!! We're f'ing gold!!!! He's going to do Tigua."

Six days later, Abramoff directed tribal officials to make three contributions totaling $32,000 to Ney's campaign and political action committees.

Ney, at the urging of Volz and the other lobbyists, also pushed through a 2002 license for an Israeli telecommunications company to install cellphone antennas for the House. The company, Foxcom Wireless, now known as MobileAccess and based in Vienna, Va., later paid Abramoff $280,000 for lobbying, according to disclosure forms.

The Washington Post reported in 2004 that the wireless firm had donated $50,000 to the Capital Athletic Foundation, a charity that Abramoff sometimes used to secretly pay for lobbying activities. In the summer of 2002, Abramoff had the foundation pay for a golfing trip to Scotland for Ney and others.

"The whole thing was just nauseating," said John Spindler, vice president of LGC Wireless, the company that lost the House contract to Abramoff's client. "You know these kind of things are going on, but when you get embroiled in it, you go, my God, how could this go on?"

Lawmaker Admits He Took Illegal Gifts (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — Representative Bob Ney of Ohio admitted Friday that he had effectively put his office up for sale to corrupt Washington lobbyists and a foreign businessman in exchange for illegal gifts that included lavish overseas trips, the use of skyboxes at sports arenas in the Washington area and thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips from London casinos.

In a plea agreement announced by the Justice Department, Mr. Ney, a six-term Republican who once seemed poised to rise far in the House leadership, admitted to a wide-ranging criminal conspiracy and to making false statements about the gifts.

With the agreement, Mr. Ney became the first member of Congress to acknowledge criminal acts in the investigation of the former superlobbyist Jack Abramoff, an inquiry that threatens to ensnare other Republican lawmakers and dim the party's hopes in the November elections.

Although Mr. Ney could face up to 10 years in prison, federal prosecutors said they would recommend a 27-month sentence for the lawmaker, who announced last month that he was abandoning his campaign for another term. He could also face up to $500,000 in fines.

Mr. Abramoff, once a leading fund-raiser for the Republican Party, pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials, including Mr. Ney.

In a statement released by his lawyers, Mr. Ney, 52, suggested that his criminal acts were related to alcoholism.

"I have come to recognize that a dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me," said Mr. Ney, who friends say entered an in-patient alcohol-treatment facility this week. "I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions."

He said the plea agreement "will enable me to accept responsibility for what I have done, to start repairing the damage I have caused and to start healing my family."

DOJ_NMG_0064432

After several months with little public activity in the two-year-old investigation into Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation, Mr. Ney's plea agreement offered new ammunition to Democratic political strategists hoping to end Republican control of the House and Senate this fall.

The House Democratic leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, said Mr. Ney's plea agreement was proof of "what we have long said: the Republican culture of corruption has pervaded Congress." Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, said, "The illegal behavior that Congressman Bob Ney has admitted doing was unacceptable."

In the plea agreement, Mr. Ney admitted that he had "corruptly solicited and accepted a stream of things of value" from Mr. Abramoff and his lobbying partners. Those partners included Neil G. Volz, Mr. Ney's former chief of staff, who pleaded guilty to similar conspiracy charges in May.

The list of illegal gifts accepted by Mr. Ney from Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation was long: an all-expense-paid golfing trip to Scotland in 2002; a gambling vacation in New Orleans in 2003; meals and drinks at restaurants in and around Washington, mostly at one owned by Mr. Abramoff on Pennsylvania Avenue; and large campaign contributions "from Abramoff's clients for whom Ney had agreed to perform official acts."

The official acts, the Justice Department said, included Mr. Ney's efforts to insert language in House bills to aid Mr. Abramoff and his clients, as well as to place statements in the Congressional Record on their behalf.

The plea agreement suggests that Mr. Ney may have done his most important favor to Mr. Abramoff in 2001 and 2002 when he helped direct a multimillion-dollar Congressional contract to one of Mr. Abramoff's lobbying clients, a technology company that was contracted to install the infrastructure for wireless telephone service in the House.

In 2002, Mr. Ney admitted, he introduced an amendment in the House to allow a "foreign-beverage-distiller client of Abramoff's lobbying firm" to label its alcohol as "made in Russia" when in fact it was to be distilled in a former Soviet Republic outside of Russia.

Mr. Ney also admitted accepting thousands of dollars in gambling chips from a foreign businessman who was not named in the court papers but had previously been identified by government officials as Fouad al-Zayat, the Syrian-born owner of an aviation company in Cyprus that sought Mr. Ney's help in Washington.

In its court papers, the Justice Department said Mr. Ney traveled twice to London — in February and August 2003 — to meet with the businessman, who wanted Mr. Ney's help in easing an American embargo that barred the sale of airplanes and aviation parts "in a foreign country," previously identified as Iran; he also wanted Mr. Ney's help in obtaining an American visa.

During both trips, prosecutors said, Mr. Ney received thousands of dollars worth of chips from London casinos that the lawmaker then parlayed, through his gambling, into an estimated $50,000 — most of it, $47,000, on the August trip.

On returning home in August, the plea agreement said, Mr. Ney gave about $5,000 to a staff member to carry so the lawmaker "could carry and report a lower dollar amount to Customs Services officials upon re-entry into the United States." On his customs form, Mr. Ney reported that he was bringing only $32,000 into the country. The court papers did not explain the $10,000 discrepancy.

Representative No. 1: Guilty (WP)

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Meanwhile, Congress doesn't even fiddle with lobbying reform.

HOW SORDID does it have to get before Congress does something to tighten the rules governing lobbyists and lawmakers, all-expenses-paid trips, and lavish dinners? Former representative Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), once a leader in the Republican hierarchy, pleaded guilty yesterday to selling his office in exchange for golf trips and gambling junkets, marking another milestone in a year of congressional disgrace. Yet lawmakers are poised to go home and explain to voters how they failed to act despite vows earlier in the year to fix the badly broken system.

On Thursday, the House of Representatives passed a fig leaf of a change in earmarking rules that will simply require lawmakers, in some cases, to attach their names to special-interest projects that they sponsor. We'll offer a more detailed analysis of this faux reform another time, but the most disturbing point is this: Apparently, that's it for lobbying reform this session. There will be no action to limit the free trips that lawmakers and staff members can take, beef up the broken system of ethics enforcement, slow the revolving door between public service and K Street riches, or improve disclosure of lobbying activities.

It was striking, then, that yesterday, the day after the House's non-action action, the court documents were replete with disgusting details about the rapaciously unethical behavior of Mr. Ney and his staff -- scooping up thousands of dollars in free gambling chips from a Syrian-born arms merchant nicknamed "The Fat Man," who was seeking the congressman's help to sell airplanes and obtain a visa; Mr. Ney

having a staffer carry back $5,000 worth of British pounds from a London gambling junket to hide his winnings from U.S. Customs officials; Mr. Ney taking thousands of dollars in free meals and skybox tickets from lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In return, Mr. Ney inserted amendments into legislation to help the clients of those who helped the congressman. In his role as chairman of the House Administration Committee, he issued a multimillion-dollar wireless telephone contract to one of Mr. Abramoff's clients. He lobbied executive branch officials at the behest of Mr. Abramoff and his other benefactors.

The tightest lobbying rules in the world can't halt a lawmaker bent on corruption. Mr. Ney lied on his financial disclosure forms, his travel forms and his customs reports. He knowingly helped his former chief of staff violate the one-year prohibition against lobbying former colleagues -- not only encouraging the former staff member, Neil G. Volz, to violate the lobbying ban but also helping Mr. Volz set up a client list even before he left Mr. Ney's staff.

Still, a combination of tighter rules, increased disclosure and more-effective enforcement could help deter and detect criminality on the grand scale practiced by Mr. Ney. It could lessen the small-bore, run-of-the-mill corruption that has become a seamy fact of life in the halls of the Capitol. But that won't happen. At least not from this Congress.

In Case Against Politician, A Tale Of Friendship, Ambition And Betrayal (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — In July 2005, Vernon L. Jackson returned home to Louisville from Washington, where he had just met with Representative William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat who had been helping promote his fledgling digital-technology company. David Harper, a lawyer for the company, said he had never seen Mr. Jackson so demoralized.

For nearly five years, the inventor and the congressman had carried the message that Mr. Jackson's company, iGate, could help close the "digital divide" by delivering high-speed Internet access to poor blacks around the world.

They had flown to Africa to seek business opportunities, and they had talked up iGate to potential partners at the Kentucky Derby and the United States Open tennis tournament in New York.

But now, with iGate starved for cash, Mr. Jackson was convinced that Mr. Jefferson, his "friend on the Hill," was about to betray him, Mr. Harper recalled.

Over breakfast at the Grand Hyatt Hotel, the congressman had made a proposal that, in Mr. Jackson's view, was tantamount to theft: in return for a quick infusion of cash, Mr. Harper said, Mr. Jefferson and his investors would take control of iGate and its promising broadband patents while easing Mr. Jackson aside and cutting off most of the company's creditors.

Unbeknownst to the two men, the Federal Bureau of Investigation had been monitoring their dealings. Less than three weeks later, agents raided Mr. Jefferson's homes, in Washington and in New Orleans, and found stacks of cash stuffed in a freezer.

Mr. Jackson, 54, has pleaded guilty to paying more than $400,000 in bribes for Mr. Jefferson's help; on Sept. 8, he was sentenced to seven years in prison. An F.B.I. search of the congressman's office last May set off a showdown between Congress and the Justice Department. Mr. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing and remains under investigation.

In recent months, the outlines of the case have emerged in court filings and news reports. But an examination of court records and dozens of internal iGate documents, as well as interviews with a number of Mr. Jackson's associates, offers a far clearer picture of the relationship between the two men, and of how Mr. Jefferson went from helping a small company to trying to take it over for his family's benefit.

Mr. Jefferson, 59, grew up poor on a cotton farm yet became one of the most prominent black members of Congress, with a seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee. He developed a reputation for nurturing black entrepreneurs, like Mr. Jackson, and working to expand trade with Africa.

Jobs for Family Members

Soon after meeting Mr. Jackson in late 2000, Mr. Jefferson prodded the Pentagon to test one of iGate's products, documents show. He recruited investors and did favors for iGate's leading supplier. He also lobbied political leaders in Nigeria, Ghana and Cameroon to include iGate in telecommunications projects, while repeatedly urging the Export-Import Bank of the United States to finance the deals.

And each time the company seemed poised to take off, records show, Mr. Jefferson sought a greater share of the potential profits for his family.

His wife, Andrea, had a marketing contract with iGate; their eldest daughter did legal work for iGate and one of its investors; and Mrs. Jefferson's brother-in-law was iGate's chief engineer. Even before the congressman brought up the takeover proposal, he had arranged for a consulting firm owned by his wife and five daughters to receive nearly 31 million shares of iGate stock, roughly a quarter of the company, at no cost, documents show.

The F.B.I. has said that Mr. Jefferson also sought a substantial share of profits made by iGate's partners in a Nigerian venture, and that a complaint from one of those investors prompted the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0064434

"Greed is one thing," said William A. Warner, a former I.B.M. executive who had a contract to market iGate's products. "But this guy took it to another level."

Mr. Jefferson's lawyer, Robert P. Trout, said that given the investigation, the congressman and his family would not discuss their dealings with iGate. Mr. Jefferson, who is seeking a ninth term in office, said earlier this year that his family's dealings with Mr. Jackson were legitimate, and that when "all is said and done, you will see that there is an honorable explanation for everything."

But in his guilty plea, Mr. Jackson asserted that iGate's payments to the family's consulting firm amounted to bribes for Mr. Jefferson's help. He also said he believed that if he had stopped paying, Mr. Jefferson would have quit helping him.

Mr. Jackson, a boisterous man as big as a football lineman, has been cooperating with federal authorities. In a recent interview, he declined to talk about details of the case. But he said that while he had lost an earlier company to chicanery by business associates, "I didn't think it was going to happen to me in dealing with someone in government."

Several of Mr. Jackson's associates described him as an innovative engineer, if a bit naïve about business.

As a minority student with top science scores, he was recruited in high school by Bell Labs, which paid for him to get an associate's degree in electronics. After rising over 20 years to senior engineer, Mr. Jackson said he retired and started a company to develop videoconferencing from desktop computers.

The collapse of that business led him to start iGate in 1998, with a focus on delivering high-speed Internet access over the old copper phone wires. Mr. Jackson said he thought military bases, corporate campuses, hospitals and schools would be able to use iGate's relay boxes to send graphics and streaming video to outlying buildings without expensive fiber-optic lines. He also hoped to interest the phone companies.

Vying for an Army Contract

Mr. Jackson and Mr. Jefferson were introduced in late 2000 by a Washington consultant, Jack W. White, who had been hired to sell iGate's technology to the Army. Mr. Jefferson soon called an Army official to his office to press for a test of the device, which supported iGate's claims about data-transfer speeds.

In early 2001, the congressman told Mr. Jackson that he could not provide any more help, according to court documents filed in connection with the F.B.I.'s search of the congressman's office and Mr. Jackson's guilty plea. Instead, he recommended hiring the ANJ Group, a consulting firm just incorporated under the names of his wife and his daughters.

The women were hardly marketing professionals: Mrs. Jefferson was vice chancellor of the New Orleans campus of Southern University, and while the Jeffersons' oldest daughter was a lawyer, the others were still in school. Even so, iGate's agreement with ANJ provided for payments of $7,500 a month, plus 5 percent of any money it raised from investors and 5 percent of sales over $5 million it made for iGate. Mr. Jackson also gave ANJ 100,000 shares of stock and options for a million more.

Former iGate officials said Mrs. Jefferson made at least two marketing contacts in Louisiana, with a telephone company and a university, though nothing came of them. But, the officials said, it was her husband who kept driving most of the action.

Over dinner in New Orleans that spring, he and Mr. Jackson persuaded five men, mostly Jefferson campaign donors, to invest $375,000 total. One of them, Lloyd L. Villavaso, said he had left feeling an iGate contract with the Army was "pretty much a done deal."

By mid-2002, Mr. Jackson had persuaded a unit of Siemens, the German conglomerate, to manufacture iGate's devices. Mr. Jefferson attended iGate's annual shareholder meeting with a Siemens executive and an Army testing official, and that summer, Siemens invited Mr. Jackson to a stock-car race, where iGate's slogan, "Communications in Motion," was painted on two cars.

The congressman later did several favors for Siemens, at Mr. Jackson's request. Mr. Jefferson offered, for example, to arrange for the company's chief executive to be taken to the front of the customs line when he flew in from Germany, and he set up a meeting with Army officials about possible contracts, said Paula Davis, a spokeswoman for Siemens USA.

Reaching Out to Nigeria

Africa was another promising market, former iGate officials said, because few countries there could afford fiber-optic lines. In June 2003, the congressman introduced Mr. Jackson to officials at Netlink Digital Television, a Nigerian company that agreed to invest $45 million to use iGate's products in Africa. At this point, Mr. Jackson was developing a new product, a "triple play" switch that could deliver voice, data and video communications to home and business consumers. Netlink was to put up $6.5 million and finance the rest, with Mr. Jefferson's help, through the Export-Import Bank.

As Mr. Jackson began gearing up, Mr. Jefferson moved to increase his family's stake: in late July 2003, court papers show, he presented Mr. Jackson with an amendment to the ANJ contract, giving the firm 35 percent of iGate profits in Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0064435

But relations soured with the Nigerian company, and by early 2004, Netlink was demanding some money back. The F.B.I. said Mr. Jefferson had also expected to receive a share of Netlink's profits. Agents found a letter the company's lawyer had sent the congressman that May, accusing him of breaking Nigerian laws.

In June 2004, Brett M. Pfeffer, a former aide to Mr. Jefferson, introduced him to a Virginia investor, Lori A. Mody, who ran a foundation that supplied technology to public schools. When Ms. Mody wired iGate $3.5 million for a new Nigerian deal, it looked as if the company was finally starting to click.

Mr. Jackson's original device had passed a field test at Fort Stewart, Ga., and Fort Sam Houston in Texas was about to begin what would become another successful test. Siemens had installed the technology in security systems at Howard University and Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport. That August, after the company demonstrated the triple-play switch, a top research official at SBC Communications, which later merged with AT&T, asked in an e-mail message to an iGate engineer how the company had managed to surpass an industry standard.

On Aug. 20, 2004, company records show, iGate granted the ANJ Group 30 million shares of stock. And that Labor Day weekend, said Ms. Davis, the Siemens spokeswoman, Siemens treated the congressman, Mr. Jackson and their wives to a weekend in New York, including airfare, lodging and tickets to the United States Open and "The Lion King."

An Informer Wears a Wire

But before long, nearly all of iGate's sales initiatives had stalled or begun to crumble. The Army had to pay for the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism. The biggest phone companies had decided to extend their fiber-optic networks or develop triple-play switches with other suppliers.

Ms. Mody, meanwhile, had become suspicious, and in March 2005, she agreed to wear a wire for the F.B.I.

Over the next several months, she recorded conversations in which Mr. Jefferson pushed for 30 percent of her profits. According to court documents, he suggested that 3o percent go to a Nigerian company owned by his daughters, and that both his sons-in-law be involved in the deal. The F.B.I. said he asked Ms. Mody for $100,000 to bribe Nigeria's vice president, and agents found nearly all of it in his freezer.

The wire also captured the congressman telling Ms. Mody that he was frustrated with how Mr. Jackson was running iGate, and asking her to help ANJ buy a controlling interest and replace Mr. Jackson. According to the F.B.I., he told Ms. Mody, "I'm in the shadows, behind the curtain."

Three days later, on July 15, 2005, at the Washington breakfast, the congressman revealed his takeover plan to Mr. Jackson, proposing that iGate be merged into a new company, with Mr. Jackson's ownership shrinking to 3 percent from 60 percent, said Mr. Harper, the iGate lawyer. Mr. Jackson was offered an incentive: $500,000 in cash and two years on the company's payroll, at a total additional salary of $1 million. But he rejected the deal, Mr. Harper said.

Since the case became public that August, Mr. Pfeffer, the former Jefferson aide, has pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges. IGate has rescinded nearly all the Jefferson family's stock grants. Siemens has severed its ties with Mr. Jackson, and iGate has closed its offices and furloughed its staff.

But even with his looming prison term, which could be reduced if he continues to cooperate, Mr. Jackson has not given up on his dream of providing broadband access both here and in the developing world. He remains disappointed in how slowly the phone companies have upgraded broadband services, and he continues to talk to investors about providing more bandwidth over leased phone or power lines, he said.

He has also become a minister at the Spirit of Peace Missionary Baptist Church here.

The pastor, R. Z. Miller, said that at first he was afraid the scandal might have set Mr. Jackson on "a run for the cross." But he said Mr. Jackson recently preached about his struggle to embrace forgiveness and atone for his mistakes. "I told Vernon that even though I teach forgiveness," Mr. Miller said, "I don't know if I could really forgive like he has."

Katrina Task Force Charges 400 With Fraud In 1st Year (FEDTIMES)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, September 16, 2006

More than 400 people have been federally charged with Hurricane Katrina-related fraud since Attorney General Alberto Gonzales convened a task force to investigate the cases last September.

According to Gonzales, charges have been filed in 30 federal districts in all U.S. regions.

"To take advantage of the devastation and recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast is both shameful and illegal," Gonzales said in a statement. "We must ensure that the criminals who have exploited this time of human suffering are brought to justice and that their crimes do not undermine the programs intended to rebuild the homes, businesses and communities destroyed by hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma."

DOJ_NMG_0064436

The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force reported that as of last month, the Federal Emergency Management Agency had received more than 2.5 million applications for disaster assistance related to the 2005 Gulf Coast hurricanes. While most of these applicants had legitimate needs, the task force found that numerous people committed fraud in seeking benefits to which they were not entitled.

According to the task force, criminals often seek to exploit perceived systemic weaknesses in oversight or internal controls associated with disaster relief programs. The task force found that these people often work in groups.

In one example, 48 Mississippi residents were charged with creating and submitting fraudulent debris removal slips totaling more than $700,000. Four of these people were indicted for conspiracy.

The task force also found that insiders had exploited the system.

“A particularly distressing pattern of criminal activity has involved individuals who use their positions with governmental agencies and charitable organizations to exploit the disaster relief programs they are supposed to protect,” the report said.

The task force encouraged reporting of possible fraud.

Vast Majority Of Katrina Fraud Complaints Not Investigated (NEWHOUSE)

By Sean Reilly, Newhouse News Service

Newhouse News Service, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Gulf Coast was still drying out last September when federal officials promised aggressive action against fraud stemming from Hurricane Katrina. A year later, complaints of disaster aid abuse are pouring in to one key watchdog entity -- the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's inspector general's office -- but only a small fraction have resulted in investigations, government figures show.

By the end of last month, the inspector general had received more than 11,000 such complaints for fiscal 2006, which ends Sept. 30, according to statistics provided by the office. Of those, 999, or about 9 percent, have been pursued, the numbers indicate.

Asked why such a low proportion of fraud allegations appear to be getting attention, spokeswoman Tamara Faulkner said via e-mail that all are reviewed, but some don't warrant further action.

Even if a complaint furnished only a little information, Faulkner said, "it would be evaluated, and a determination would be made on a case-by-case basis" whether to pursue an investigation or refer it to the Federal Emergency Management Agency or some other branch of the homeland security department.

At the same time, she said, some complaints are closed out-of-hand, because they lack "specificity or clarity."

As a rule, however, the inspector general "has to pursue those cases that have the biggest economic impact and seem the most believable," said Clark Kent Ervin, who headed the office in 2003 and 2004, in e-mailed answers to questions. "One can't go after every `nickel and dime' claim because there are too many of them and too few resources."

With 490 employees, the inspector general is a major gatekeeper for complaints of fraud, waste and abuse affecting a wide range of homeland security programs, including emergency aid. Since the homeland security department's creation in 2002, the office has won praise for its hard-hitting inquiries into subjects ranging from port security spending to the training of airport screeners.

After Hurricane Katrina struck in August of last year, the inspector general set up a special oversight operation that has since issued dozens of audits and reviews aimed at ensuring wise use of disaster assistance funds. That class includes emergency payments to households, money funneled to local governments for debris removal and payments to contractors.

But Katrina was just one in a string of storms to hit the Gulf Coast region in the last two years. Allegations of FEMA fraud have shot up almost 900 percent since fiscal 2004, while the size of the inspector general's staff has increased only about 9 percent, according to government numbers.

"Clearly, the figures underscore that more people are needed," said Leslie Phillips, a spokeswoman for U.S. Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the Senate committee that oversees the homeland security department.

A spokeswoman for the committee's chairwoman, U.S. Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, did not respond to requests for comment. Also not reachable were spokespersons for the Republican chairman and top Democrat on the House homeland security committee. In June, the House passed legislation stiffening penalties for fraud related to disaster relief.

The bill, which still needs Senate passage, won House approval soon after congressional investigators concluded that FEMA dished out between $600 million and $1.4 billion in improper and potentially fraudulent payments following Katrina and Hurricane Rita.

The inspector general is also part of the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, a combined federal effort announced by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last September.

DOJ_NMG_0064437

Saying he would need more information, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra declined comment this week on the figures showing the low proportion of inspector general investigations. While the task force says its work has produced federal prosecutions of more than 400 individuals, Sierra did not know the total number of complaints received by all the agencies -- such as the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service -- that are participating.

Many of the allegations received by the inspector general involve allegations that FEMA gave money to people or companies who weren't supposed to get it, according to brief summaries obtained under the Freedom of Information Act.

In the summaries, all personal identifying information was blacked out, making it impossible to know whether the complaints stem primarily from ordinary citizens or other sources.

One complaint filed last year, for example, charges that an individual got $19,500, evidently for a home that suffered no flood damage.

Another claims that a nursing home received $50,000 "for a security camera that was not working prior to the disaster," the summary states. The inspector general has closed both cases, apparently without taking action, the summaries show.

They also reflect complaints from workers who say that FEMA contractors or subcontractors failed to pay them what they were owed. As a rule, the inspector general refers such complaints to FEMA's legal office, Faulkner said.

In most cases, FEMA takes no further action, spokesman James McIntyre said in an e-mail, "as these are not employees of a contractor the agency hired or has responsibility for paying."

Officials Want Former Governor In Prison (AP-Y)

By Mike Robinson

AP, September 16, 2006

Former Gov. George Ryan should not remain free while appealing his racketeering conviction and should start his prison sentence as scheduled Jan. 4, prosecutors said Friday.

Authorities argued in court papers that decisions made by U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer during the seven-month trial of Ryan and co-defendant Larry Warner were likely to be upheld by appeals judges.

Ryan, 72, and Warner, 67, were convicted April 17 of racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud and other offenses involving corruption when Ryan was secretary of state in the 1990s and later governor. Ryan was sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison.

Whether Ryan gets to remain free on bond is likely to depend on whether judges believe his appeal stands a good chance of winning him a new trial.

Ryan's attorneys said the dismissal of two jurors who were replaced with alternates means Ryan could easily win a new trial. They said that unauthorized documents brought into the jury room poisoned the deliberations.

Prosecutors took sharp issue with that contention, and warned of the "dangers that freely granting bond pending appeal pose to public confidence in the judicial system."

Bush Campaign To Donate Illegal Donation (AP)

AP, September 16, 2006

Donations that a former coin dealer funneled to President Bush's re-election campaign will be given to charity, barring further directions from authorities, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee said Friday.

Tom Noe, 52, has admitted arranging a contribution scheme to fulfill his promise to generate $50,000 for a Bush-Cheney fundraiser. He was sentenced Tuesday to two years and three months in prison on three charges, including exceeding federal campaign contribution limits.

Prosecutors said Noe gave $45,400 directly or indirectly to 24 friends and associates who made the donations in their names, allowing him to skirt the $2,000 limit on individual contributions.

Authorities said Bush's campaign committee was unaware of the alleged contribution scheme and unknowingly submitted a false campaign report to the Federal Election Commission.

The campaign already has donated $6,000 it received from Noe and his wife, Bernadette, to charity, said Aaron McLear of the Republican National Committee, which represents the inactive Bush campaign.

"Barring any further directions from authorities, Bush-Cheney '04 will also voluntarily donate the $45,400 that was the subject of this investigation to charity," he said.

McLear said it had not been determined which charity would receive the money.

Noe still is charged with stealing at least $1 million from an ill-fated $50 million rare coin investment that he managed for the state workers' compensation fund. Investigations into the coin investment led to Gov. Bob Taft's no contest plea and conviction last year to charges that he failed to report gifts, such as golf outings.

DOJ_NMG_0064438

Noe, who also was fined $136,200 Tuesday, will not have to serve his prison sentence for the Bush donations until after the conclusion of the coin investment case, which is set for trial next month. He has pleaded not guilty to 46 charges.

Chat Rooms Are Identity Thieves' Street Corners (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, September 16, 2006

NEW YORK (Dow Jones/AP) -- On a weekday afternoon in a chat room, hackers are busy exchanging credit-card numbers, cash, hacked servers, information and stolen identities.

A hacker called Pinokio logs on and posts six identities, known as ``fulls."

``Mesage (sic) for trade with me :)" he writes.

A ``full" contains enough information to take a thief on a multiyear identity theft ride, as it will include someone's Social Security number, home phone number, e-mail account and password, debit card PINs, credit-card numbers, and mother's maiden name. Hackers like Pinokio sell them in bulk for $1 to $5 a pop in an international ring of credit ``carders," as sophisticated as it is blatant.

Welcome to the world of identity theft, a market that costs the U.S. economy $56.6 billion last year, according to a study by Javelin Strategy & Research using methodology developed by the Federal Trade Commission.

The problem's so prevalent that financial advisers guiding America's affluent through investment decisions now want training on how to deal with the crime. Indeed, Charles Schwab Corp. is holding a session at its upcoming Impact 2006 conference in November on how to teach clients about the problem. Vanguard Group Inc. added a ``Security Center" section to its Web site to teach consumers about identity theft and other issues.

That's all the more significant given that the rich seem most at risk. While 4 percent of Americans fell victim to identity theft in 2005, 6.38 percent of households earning more than $150,000 reported fraud, the Javelin survey found.

``Ten years ago it was a bunch of frustrated teenagers who had something to prove," said Supervisory Special Agent Thomas Grasso Jr. of the FBI's cyber division. ``Now, it's all about the money."

There are several reasons hackers like Pinokio post these identities: to show he has good data and there's more to be had, to raise his status in the underground or to muddy the waters of any potential investigation by getting others to use a card he's already used.

``The other 240 hackers can get it right now and hammer this credit card in the next 10 minutes, and there is no way for a law enforcement officer to see who ordered first," said Dan Clements, chief executive of CardCops Inc., an Internet-security company based in Malibu, Calif.

Pinokio may have one more motive: bonding. The chat room's a community, said Clements. ``They're a brotherhood."

One of the stolen identities Pinokio posted belongs to Brandee Sissom. Her trouble began about a year ago, when she began receiving letters about credit-card accounts for which she had never applied. Credit reporting agency Equifax Inc. told her that people had been trying to open accounts in her name.

She recently noticed three charges for $25.90 from AOL on her credit card, canceled them and filed a complaint with AOL. The day her stolen data had been posted in the chat room, an anonymous caller told her that her Social Security number was compromised. But she still hasn't been able to change it.

``I have cancer, and I'm extremely tired all the time," Sissom said. ``And if you've ever been in a Social Security office; it's a long wait, and I don't have the time or energy to wait."

She put 90-day and year-long alerts on her credit. She said she has no idea how her information got online. ``I'm really careful with my credit information," Sissom said. ``I chop up everything."

The 363 hackers in the chat room are gathered together under the aegis of the room's administrators, the top dogs of this particular group. The chat room is hosted on Internet Relay Chat, more commonly known as IRC. At any given time there are thousands of chat rooms open, about 30 to 40 discussing credit-card information. This is one of the more popular ones. Anyone who knows the name of the room can log in.

According to the Secret Service, most carders are based in the former Soviet Union or Southeast Asia. Some, Clements, the CEO from CardCops, said, claim to make $10,000 to $20,000 a month.

``We haven't really seen any (other) illegal activity, (such as) drugs," said Scott Johnson, Secret Service Criminal Investigative Division's acting special agent-in-charge. ``They're too busy rolling on their piles of money."

The administrators are marked by an ``" symbol next to their name. They have what the FBI's Grasso called channel ops, meaning they can kick people out of the room and set passwords, as well as load programs onto the page, allowing the hackers to check the validity of stolen credit cards in real time.

An administrator will use a hacked merchant credit-card account, check the information and post it in the room. Typically, they don't actually charge the cards; instead they run authorization transactions, which don't cost the cardholder anything but confirm whether a given card is valid. The merchant takes a hit for the minimum transaction fee, usually about 10 cents, and the consumer is none the wiser.

Though there is no agency tasked with culling chats for consumer data, the FBI and Secret Service do occasionally monitor the rooms.

Eric Zahren, a spokesman for the Secret Service, said that he couldn't ``discuss or confirm'' that the Secret Service monitors chat rooms, but did say that ``we've proved we can operate in the same environments'' as the hackers.

The Secret Service, which was empowered by Congress to combat computer fraud, has 24 electronic crimes task forces across the country and 20 foreign offices working with local law enforcement on the issue. Their strategy is to go after top-tier carders, people who have millions of individuals' information at their disposal.

The Secret Service said it recently brought agents from Latvia and Lithuania to the United States for training on cyber crimes, and currently it is now running a training program in Thailand.

Cathy Milhoan, an FBI spokeswoman, said the agency doesn't have ``teams of people'' monitoring these rooms ``24 hours.'' She said it monitors the rooms only when it has a ``legal reason for being there.''

Since the FTC started tracking numbers in 2003, the total number of identity thefts annually has fallen 12 percent to 8.9 million from 10.1 million. But simultaneously the total cost of fraud has risen 6 percent to $56.6 billion from $53.2 billion, as the average amount of fraud per victim has risen 17.8 percent to $6,383. The most vulnerable age range is 25 to 34, with fraud affecting 5.4 percent of the U.S. population compared with 2.3 percent of people over the age of 65.

Jackson Mayor Is Indicted Over Crime-Fighting Tactics (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

ATLANTA, Sept. 15 — The mayor of Jackson, Miss., was indicted on six felony charges Friday after months of criticism and warnings that his unorthodox crime-fighting tactics might put him on the wrong side of the law.

Among the counts now faced by the mayor, Frank Melton, are burglary, malicious mischief, illegally carrying a gun and causing a minor to commit a felony. The most serious of the charges against him carry sentences of up to 25 years, said the local district attorney, Faye Peterson.

The mayor's supporters called the charges politically motivated and said he would not resign.

Some of the charges stem from a sheriff's investigation of the night of Aug. 26, when the home of Evans Welch, a man with a history of mental illness and petty crimes, was attacked by a sledgehammer-wielding group of young men without warning or permit.

Witnesses said Mr. Melton, who often patrols the city at night with the police and a group of teenage followers, had directed the demolition of the house, which he said was known as a place to buy illegal drugs. His two police bodyguards are also charged in connection with that event.

Dale Danks, Mr. Melton's lawyer, issued a statement acknowledging that damage had been done to "the drug house" and that "maybe better judgment could have been used."

"But," the statement said, "the charges that have been made against Mayor Melton are an extreme and excessive reaction."

Mr. Melton was also charged with carrying a gun on the campus of the Mississippi College School of Law, in a public park and in a church. The first is a felony; the two others are misdemeanors. All three of these cases had been referred to the local authorities by the state attorney general, Jim Hood, who had earlier written Mr. Melton a letter warning that he could not legally carry a gun in such places.

Mr. Melton, a former television executive, took office in July 2005, promising to lower the crime rate in Jackson, the state capital. He personally oversaw those efforts, drawing attention for going on nighttime raids, using the Police Department's only mobile command unit and wearing a police jacket and badge.

After The Clarion-Ledger, Jackson's daily newspaper, reported that he made a habit of traveling with guns, the federal Transportation Security Administration, the paper said, requested that he no longer carry guns aboard commercial airplanes, as he had under a waiver granted to law enforcement personnel.

In April, Mr. Melton used a police car to pull over four school buses on a highway so that, he said, he could talk to the children and hug them.

After a grand jury returned the indictments Friday, the mayor surrendered, posted a $50,000 bond and was released on condition that he refrain from using law enforcement vehicles, carrying firearms or supervising minors.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Blocks Strike At Northwest (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

A federal judge yesterday blocked a threatened strike by flight attendants at Northwest Airlines in a ruling that could strengthen the hand of struggling airlines that seek to reduce labor costs.

The flight attendants said they would appeal.

A prolonged labor disturbance could have forced Northwest into liquidation. Yesterday's decision, which affirms a temporary ruling last month, forces the airline's roughly 9,000 flight attendants to keep working at reduced wages and benefits, which the company says will save it $195 million a year.

Judge Victor Marrero of United States District Court in New York issued a preliminary injunction preventing flight attendants at Northwest from striking or taking other job actions. He also said in a written order that the bankruptcy judge overseeing Northwest's reorganization had erred in not issuing an injunction against a strike. In August, Judge Allan L. Gropper of Federal Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York had said he did not have the authority to block a strike.

In his ruling yesterday, Judge Marrero noted that Congress, in passing a host of labor laws that apply to airlines, has made it clear that keeping the nation's transportation system operating is vital. Northwest, which is based in Eagan, Minn., is the nation's fifth-largest carrier.

Northwest's other major work groups have either agreed to reduced pay-and-benefits packages or have had terms imposed on them. The carrier, in bankruptcy for nearly a year, is seeking to cut labor costs by $1.4 billion annually, sharply cut other operating expenses and raise capital. It hopes to emerge from bankruptcy early in 2007.

The judge's order "allows our customers to continue to book Northwest Airlines with confidence," said Douglas M. Steenland, president and chief executive.

Flight attendants were disappointed and said they planned to appeal.

"This fight isn't over," said Mollie Reiley, who heads the Northwest chapter of the Association of Flight Attendants. Flight attendants contend that Northwest does not need all the cuts it is seeking.

The case is a complicated one, involving three sets of labor laws and the federal bankruptcy statute. Judge Marrero said in his order that there was no direct precedent in the case. Under bankruptcy law, a company can gain release from an existing labor contract and impose new and reduced terms on workers, with court approval.

The threat of such an action has typically been enough to persuade workers to agree to a new contract at reduced pay. Earlier this year, the union leadership of the Northwest flight attendants twice agreed to new terms. But both times the rank and file rejected the proposed contracts.

So Northwest imposed pay and benefit cuts and longer hours on the flight attendants. At issue in this case is whether such new terms release the workers from the bargaining process and allow them to strike.

Judge Marrero, however, said in his order that imposing new terms is a temporary measure and that both sides remain bound to the mediated bargaining process.

If workers were allowed to strike when terms were imposed by a bankrupt carrier, the right of companies to impose new terms would be "a suicide weapon," he wrote. That would undermine the bankruptcy law, he added, and make it harder for companies to avoid liquidation.

Euclid Council Drafts Law To Propose New Districts (CLPD)

By Leila Atassi, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, September 16, 2006

Euclid- The city might redraw ward boundaries while also contesting a federal lawsuit that accuses the city's existing election system of keeping black candidates out of office.

Council President Ed Gudenas has drafted legislation that would give City Council the authority to propose new districts to ease a "statistical imbalance in population" in time for the 2007 election. The legislation is listed on the agenda for Monday's council meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0064441

Hilary Taylor, the attorney representing the city in the Department of Justice lawsuit, said City Council might lack the authority to adopt a redistricting plan without voter approval.

Mayor Bill Cervenik said Friday his administration has been kept in the dark by council re garding redistricting.

"Not including the administration in discussion about this is very detrimental to what we're trying to do," Cervenik said. "But at least this measure shows that council is willing to look at adjusting borders."

The city has struggled to compromise with the Justice Department ever since a three-year investigation concluded that too many at-large council seats and districts that cover a large geographic area have diluted minority voting strength.

The city has never elected a black official, though more than 30 percent of its residents are black.

In June, Justice Department officials proposed that the city break four wards into eight smaller districts - each with a City Council member - and eliminate all at-large seats except for council president.

Currently, five of the nine council members, including the council president, are elected citywide.

Instead of accepting the proposal, Taylor recommended city officials demand evidence collected during the investigation before agreeing to redraw districts. Less than a month later, the Justice Department filed suit against the city.

Since then, court filings show that the city has continued to defend its current electoral system and demand a definitive explanation of the charges.

The city has challenged the Justice Department's claim that a diluted black vote - rather than a lack of black candidates or low voter turnout - is to blame for a dearth of black city officials.

Under the current system, black voters get a chance to vote for all four at-large seats and potentially harness their voting power for a candidate in each of the slots. The city argues that if districts are redrawn, as the Justice Department has proposed, the black vote could be confined to only two wards - creating six "super-majority" white wards in the rest of the city.

The city also contends that the Justice Department relied on inadequate census data that do not accurately reflect the demographics of the city.

In court records, the city provided results of a city-commissioned study of population changes since the 2000 census that found that more than 30 percent of Euclid's population is black and that at least one of the existing wards is predominantly black. Taylor argues this could naturally achieve the Justice Department's goals.

The Justice Department declined the city's request for more information about the charges and claimed that the demographic data the city provided is inadmissible evidence without expert testimony to back it up.

Taylor said the redistricting proposal would be an attempt to find middle ground with the Justice Department, rather than defend the city's current electoral system to the end.

"You can have a great case, but how much justice can you afford?" Taylor said. "We believe our system is defensible. But if we travel the whole path of litigation - I can't imagine how much it would cost this city."

Woman's Monkey Barred From Restaurants (SPRINGNL)

By Sony Hocklander, News-Leader

Springfield (MO) News-Leader, September 16, 2006

A Springfield woman filed a complaint with the federal government Friday after the Springfield-Greene County Health Department declined to reverse a decision barring her from taking her monkey into businesses that serve or handle food.

"I didn't feel I had any choice," said Debby Rose, holding her monkey during and after a meeting with Director of Health Kevin Gipson and Assistant Director of Health Ron Boyer.

Rose said her monkey, Richard, is a service animal that helps her cope with a debilitating anxiety disorder, which includes a racing heart, high blood pressure and panic attacks in certain situations -- particularly public activities. Richard helps relieve that and, according to the Americans With Disabilities Act, she said, he should be allowed into public food places.

Gipson maintained the health department's position that, according to its interpretation of ADA law, the monkey is a therapy animal or a pet -- not a service animal — and therefore not allowed in food establishments. According to health department research, "a service animal by definition has to perform a physical function for that person," Gipson said.

Gipson said he would reverse the decision if the federal government says Rose's monkey is a service animal. He encouraged Rose to file a complaint.

"What I need is something from the federal government, official, that tells me that that indeed is a service animal," he said. Even then, he added, there would be limitations on what the animal could do in the establishments, such as eating.

Shelby Butler said the ADA's definition for service animals has expanded. Butler, who attended the meeting to advocate for Rose, is an access specialist from Southwest Center for Independent Living, a not-for-profit organization that's federally mandated to assist people with disabilities. She also helped Rose file the complaint.

Butler said it wasn't the department's place to determine if Richard is a service animal. She also said that the ADA covers any disability that prevents a person from performing regular life functions.

Though the service he performs is a gray area, she said, "there have been instances where an emotional support animal has fallen under that category."

Rose said her disorder prevents her from going into crowded public places, such as grocery stores, ball games, restaurants and shops.

Without her monkey, she said in the meeting, "I can't function anymore. I can't go anywhere or do anything."

Butler scheduled Friday's meeting after the health department sent approximately 1,000 letters, dated Sept. 5 and naming Rose, to Greene County food establishments. It stated that businesses would violate a critical food code if they allow Rose to enter with her monkey.

Boyer said the letter resulted from five complaints the department received after Rose and her family dined recently at a buffet restaurant where Richard sat in a high chair and ate with the family.

He said there have been a dozen or more complaints about Rose over the past year, though he did not have documentation. Jim Fry, environmental health coordinator, later said there were 10 complaints.

Rose filed a Title II discrimination complaint under the ADA. In addition to the health department, it names Gipson and Boyer.

Butler said it could take several months to hear back from the Justice Department's civil rights division. They filed under Title II because it covers state and local governments, she said. A government decision might be based on the information gathered, Butler said, or it could go to federal court for a judge to decide.

Rose said she worries about how she'll cope without taking Richard into places like the grocery store: "I just don't think I could manage that again."

Islamic Group Puts Challenge To FBI Agents (COLDT)

By Janese Heavin, of the Tribune's staff

Columbia (MO) Daily Tribune, September 16, 2006

Meeting an effort to bridge IARA fallout.

A group of local Muslims aimed loaded questions at an FBI agent last night and fired point blank.

Does the FBI seek out Muslims as criminals? Is the government inventing new rules on a daily basis to entrap Muslim-Americans? What does the FBI think about Muslims in general?

Thorny questions, all of which were directed at FBI Supervisory Special Agent Richard Thornton as he addressed members of the Islamic Center of Central Missouri in Columbia.

Thornton and Agent Stewart McLaren visited the group in an effort to rebuild bridges between law enforcement and Muslims, bridges that might have crumbled when the FBI shut down the Islamic American Relief Agency in Columbia two years ago. Agents seized computers and belongings from the organization, searched the home of Director Mubarek Hamed and froze bank accounts with hundreds of thousands of dollars earmarked for charitable purposes.

U.S. Treasury officials contend the Columbia-based charity was the U.S. affiliate of a Sudanese charity, the Islamic African Relief Agency, which is accused of supporting al-Qaida and its predecessor, Maktab al-Khidamat.

"There is a lot of mistrust because our charities were closed with sealed evidence," said Corey Brand, president of the ICCM. "They suspected money was going to support terrorism. I certainly don't believe it was. I'm not aware of any charges being filed."

Thornton was careful not to discuss the charity closure in detail because it's still under investigation, but he told the group he thinks the act was justified.

"My belief as an FBI agent and representative of the United States is that it was legal and constitutional and fair, in the legal sense of fair," he said.

Other members asked whether they would be targeted if they donated money to the IARA, considered a "designated charity" since it has been shut down.

"I'm not aware of a situation where the U.S. government is looking at the average contributor to a designated charity as anything other than a victim," Thornton said. "With significant donors, there's a chance federal agents may want to talk to you about it."

DOJ_NMG_0064443

Typically, significant donors stay in touch with executives of a charity to ensure the money is being used properly, he said. "If you're somebody who left or gave a significant contribution to a charity, there's a decent chance there has been that discussion."

Thornton would not specifically answer one of the most direct questions of the evening: Does he believe Muslims are the peace-loving people they say they are?

"That's a loaded question," he said. "I don't think I can take 700 people from any demographic and generalize."

Muslims reiterated last night that a few extremists do not represent their religious beliefs.

"You can find examples of extremism in every group and every culture," Brand said. "You can't take a few examples and condemn a whole culture or religion or race because of that."

Thornton expressed the same idea later in the evening, saying if he pulled together a similarly-sized group of doctors, farmers or any other subgroup in town, more than likely one person in the group would at some point in time have had or will have a run-in with the law.

It's a tricky tightrope, especially when certain subgroups have a history of terrorism.

But Thornton did assure the group that the FBI isn't "out to get" Muslims. After one man said he felt as though he "walks on eggshells" when it comes to the law, Thornton said the FBI has enough legitimate concerns to look into without having to find ways to get people.

But he didn't deny wire-tapping and other surveillance are used in Mid-Missouri.

"My job is to balance and protect the country while protecting individual liabilities. I have to protect everybody," Thornton said. "If there's a threat or possibility of a threat, I have to investigate that the best I can."

The federal government has internal checks and balances to ensure surveillance is done according to law, Thornton told the Tribune.

"I took an oath to defend and protect the Constitution of the United States," the 19-year FBI veteran said. "Part of that is to protect this country from terrorist attacks and to also protect individuals from being attacked" unfairly.

He assured the group that if any of them "ever come under scrutiny," the FBI would "do it fairly and constitutionally."

ANTITRUST:

'We Won't Pass The Bill' (FWST)

By David Wethe

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 16, 2006

DALLAS -- The latest attack on the Wright Amendment compromise, which stripped antitrust immunity from the proposed legislation this week, is a potential deal breaker, said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas.

"We won't pass the bill in the form it came out of the Judiciary Committee," Hutchison told reporters Friday after a lunchtime speech in Dallas.

"We're not going to open up a can of worms. We'd have to bring the bill down. We couldn't pass it," she said.

On Wednesday, the House Judiciary Committee agreed to cut language that gave the bill protection from claims that it violates federal antitrust laws.

"What we're trying to do of course with this bill is create a certainty about what the rules are going to be in this area," Hutchison said.

"We couldn't attract new airlines, which we want to do to add competition, if they knew that this interpretation would have to go through years of litigation to know what the rules are going to be."

The committee's action was a victory for the owner of the former Legend Airlines terminal, which is slated for condemnation by Dallas.

The owner, Love Terminal Partners, said talk of tearing it down killed an imminent deal to sell the vacant six-gate terminal for $100 million. Love Terminal has since sued the five local parties that struck a compromise on Wright -- American Airlines, Southwest Airlines, Fort Worth, Dallas and Dallas/Fort Worth Airport.

The deal calls for Dallas Love Field to shrink to 20 gates from 32, for through-ticketing to anywhere in the U.S. immediately and for lifting all Wright restrictions after eight years. Currently, the law limits flights from Dallas to Texas and eight nearby states.

The Love Terminal suit claims that the deal violates antitrust laws because it doesn't allow enough room for other airlines to compete at Love Field.

DOJ_NMG_0064444

Several other airlines, as well as antitrust scholars, consumer groups and a neighborhood group near Love Field, have raised similar concerns.

The mayors of Dallas and Fort Worth and other key dealmakers from the airline and D/FW Airport have said the agreement has no antitrust violations.

Several versions of the Wright compromise bill are in Congress.

They must be reconciled and passed by the House and Senate before the end of the year, or the deal is dead, according to the local agreement.

Kevin Cox, D/FW's chief operating officer, stopped short of agreeing with Hutchison that the bill passed by the Judiciary Committee is a deal breaker.

"Obviously, if the senator is in charge of the Senate process and she feels that way, we will absolutely follow her," Cox said. "However, we're still hopeful that with her leadership and with the leadership of the House, we'll be able to find resolution on this."

The mayors could not be reached for comment Friday but said earlier this week that they didn't view the lack of antitrust immunity as a deal breaker. Dallas Mayor Laura Miller told the Star-Telegram on Wednesday that although she viewed it as a problem, there will be a way to work out the differences.

Hutchison has until Oct. 6 to work things out before lawmakers go home to campaign for the upcoming elections. They will return for a short, lame-duck session in November, but she said she's trying to get everything done now.

A bad bill is worse than no bill, Hutchison said. "But a good bill is the goal in September."

U.S. House Judiciary Committee, judiciary.house.gov

Hutchison: Wright Won't Pass Without Antitrust Exemption (DALLBIZ)

Dallas Business Journal, September 16, 2006

Without the antitrust exemption that was stripped from the Wright Amendment bill by the House Judiciary Committee earlier this week, the bill will have to be brought down, said the bill's author.

"We won't pass the bill that came out of the Judiciary Committee," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, told reporters Friday. "We'd have to bring it down. We couldn't pass it."

Hutchison said the absence of the antitrust immunity opens up the parties involved to legal battles.

"We're trying to stop the years of litigation that we think have caused so much pain in this district," Hutchison said.

Her comments came during a question-and-answer segment following a speech she gave at the North Texas Commission's 35th anniversary luncheon at the Hilton Anatole in Dallas Friday.

Hutchison introduced the bill in the House, which appeared to be on a fast track until antitrust concerns were raised.

The legislation, which is based on a local compromise between the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines, Southwest Airlines and the D/FW Airport board, calls for lifting Wright restrictions by 2014.

In return, the city of Dallas will use eminent domain to demolish a privately owned passenger terminal at Love Field, reducing the number of gates there to 20, down from 32. That has sparked anticompetition complaints, including a lawsuit filed by the owners of the gates.

Soon after the bill was introduced, an unsigned letter purportedly from the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, began circulating on Capitol Hill that raised antitrust concerns.

"What we've been trying to do with the bill is bring a certainty," Hutchison said.

Hutchison says the area won't be able to attract airlines if they aren't sure of the playing field.

Dallas-based Southwest Airlines (NYSE: LUV) spokeswoman says the airline also is supportive of the original bill, which included the antitrust provision. Without it, "it would be like throwing the agreement into the lion's den with no whip," she said. "That is not something that any of the parties would want to jump in to."

"It is my highest priority," she said of the bill. "I lose sleep every night."

Hutchison told reporters she hopes to have a solution this month. She says she is constantly trying to come up with the language that will push the bill through Congress.

Dynegy Eyes Deal For Power Plants (CCT)

By Rick Jurgens

The Contra Costa Times, September 16, 2006

Dynegy Corp., a financially troubled energy merchant affiliated with San Ramon-based Chevron Corp., plans to acquire a power plant portfolio from LS Power Group that includes about 15 percent of Northern California's electricity supply and an interest in a large Nevada coal project.

DOJ_NMG_0064445

The proposed deal will cut Chevron's ownership interest in Dynegy from 20 percent to 12 percent but add to Chevron's stake in the coal industry, which is targeted by environmentalists concerned about rising atmospheric carbon dioxide levels that fuel global warming.

Dynegy will emerge from the deal with a 20,000-megawatt fleet of nonutility power plants that includes "a new strategic position in the California market," according to a news release. A megawatt is enough electricity for 750 houses.

"We support this transaction as an opportunity for them to grow the company," said Don Campbell, a Chevron spokesman.

Chevron, through Dynegy, would get a minority interest in 3,700 megawatts of generating capacity in Northern California, including big natural gas-fired plants in Morro Bay in San Luis Obispo County and Moss Landing in Monterey County, and a smaller oil-fueled plant in Oakland. LS Power acquired those properties in May as part of a $1.6 billion deal with Duke Energy Corp.

LS Power's growth plans mainly involve power plants that burn coal, a fuel that is abundant, relatively cheap but loathed by environmentalists. Coal-fired plants emit carbon dioxide at a much higher rate than natural gas-fired plants, while nuclear and hydroelectric plants emit virtually no greenhouse gases.

Chevron said in a recent corporate responsibility report that it shares "the concerns of governments and the public about climate change" and that it had slightly cut such emissions in 2005, to 61.7 million tons. Power from Chevron geothermal properties in Indonesia and the Philippines had helped reduce coal use there, Campbell said.

But burning of oil, gas and other products from Chevron produced 374 million tons of emissions in 2005, the report said. That included coal from Chevron's Pittsburg & Midway Coal Co. unit, which produced 14 million tons in 2005 and has reserves of 235 million tons in surface mines in New Mexico and Wyoming and an underground mine in Alabama.

Some in the power industry view legislated caps on carbon emissions as inevitable, and some companies are touting new technologies that cut emissions by gasifying coal and then burning it.

LS Power has instead opted to develop coal plants that burn pulverized coal, including a 665-megawatt "Plum Point facility in Arkansas (that is) the only coal-fired plant in the country currently under construction by (a nonutility) power producer." Darpan Kapadia, an LS Power spokesman, said that the company considered various design options and chose "the most efficient, commercially proven, clean coal technology."

LS Power has in the works an additional 4,000 megawatts of coal-fired capacity, including a 1,600-megawatt plant near the eastern Nevada town of Ely. Power from that plant and a nearby 200-megawatt wind project could help keep the lights on in Las Vegas, 250 miles away, said Eric Crawford, the project manager.

In the Dynegy deal, which requires approval from antitrust and energy regulators, LS Power will transfer its existing plants to Dynegy in exchange for a 40 percent stake in the company, $100 million and a $275 million promissory note. Dynegy will also get a 50 percent stake in LS Power's new plant development unit.

The deal comes four months after Dynegy paid off a $400 million loan from Chevron, whose interest in Dynegy extends back to 1996, when the oil giant contributed some natural gas operations to help create a Houston-based energy maker and trader that set out to emulate a better-known neighbor called Enron.

That path soon led to riches, especially in 2000 when natural gas and power prices skyrocketed and boosted the value of Chevron's ownership interest to $4.8 billion. But the price run-up sparked a financial crisis in California's newly deregulated electricity market, and triggered a fierce political backlash with Enron as the main target.

At first, Dynegy saw opportunity in the troubles of its larger and more notorious competitor. With the help of a $1.5 billion loan from Chevron, Dynegy moved in to rescue and take over Enron. But the deal soon soured, and Enron filed for bankruptcy. Dynegy soon became mired in its own financial troubles and accounting scandal, its chief executive resigned, and the value of Chevron's stake plummeted.

The deal announced Friday marks a new beginning for the power merchant, and signals that it no longer demands financial and management attention from Chevron.

EU Competition Commissioner Says Policy on Microsoft Differs Little From U.S. Approach

NEW YORK (AP) -- EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, involved in an investigation of Microsoft Corp., said Friday that the European policy toward the software company does not differ substantially from that of the U.S.

Kroes spoke Friday at the Council on Foreign Relations about fostering a global competition culture. She outlined three areas of policy development: combatting cartels, punishing those who engage in unilateral antitrust behavior and encouraging private damage suits that would serve the same purpose as regulation.

DOJ_NMG_0064446

Of Microsoft, she said, "I'm not willing to say that there is a major difference in the way of thinking between the United States and ourselves."

The commission is investigating Microsoft over its Vista operating system. The investigation is the latest development in a case that dates to 2004, when it hit the software company with a record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine. Microsoft was fined another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July.

Microsoft has said its Office 2007 software will not include a way to save data in the popular Portable Document Format and that it dropped plans to include the format after Adobe Systems Inc. asked it to charge customers for the feature.

On Friday, Kroes said the commission was engaged in a debate over policies that would foster private damage lawsuits over regulation. That would bring the European legal environment closer to that of the U.S.

"You, in the U.S., have traveled much farther down this road than in Europe," she said, adding that she hoped the commission would conclude its policy debate on the issue early next year.

ENVIRONMENT:

Possible Source Of Bad Spinach Is Named As Outbreak Widens (NYT)

By Julia Preston And Monica Davey

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

SAN JUAN BAUTISTA, Calif., Sept. 15 — As the number of cases of a virulent strain of E. coli linked to fresh prepackaged spinach grew to at least 94 in 20 states on Friday, federal health authorities identified an organic produce company here in California as a possible source of some of the tainted spinach.

By late Friday, 14 of the sickened people had grown gravely ill, the federal authorities said, and one had died, a 77-year-old woman in Wisconsin. Health officials said they were unable to determine if the outbreak was likely to spread further.

The company, Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, announced a voluntary nationwide recall of its Earthbound brands of prepackaged spinach and salad mixes as well as prepackaged spinach it processes for numerous other companies, including Dole. Prepackaged spinach has been processed, washed and sanitized and placed in airtight bags or plastic trays.

In a statement, the company said it had stopped shipping spinach products, had removed spinach from all of its salads and was cooperating with state and federal authorities by allowing them access to company facilities and products.

Speaking to reporters at the company's operation here, a spokeswoman said there was no conclusive evidence that its spinach was contaminated.

"We're obviously very, very upset," said the spokeswoman, Samantha Cabaluna. "This is a tragedy for us."

Dr. David Acheson of the Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition at the Food and Drug Administration said at a news conference that the F.D.A. did not have definitive evidence that Natural Selection Foods was to blame for the outbreak of illness. But people who have been sickened apparently ate its spinach, Dr. Acheson said.

"I want to emphasize that the investigation is ongoing," he said. "It is possible that the recall and information will extend beyond Natural Selection Foods and involve other brands and other companies at a later date."

At the company's headquarters here, set beside rows of vegetables, Ms. Cabaluna told reporters late Friday that company officials were distressed by the situation, and said that investigators had not reached conclusions about a possible tie to the outbreak.

Ms. Cabaluna said the company thought the recall was "the right thing to do." She added, "We are doing this voluntarily because we just want to be safe."

As grocers nationwide removed bags of fresh spinach from their shelves and restaurants took it off menus, health authorities said they were working to determine how the spinach might have come to carry the deadly bacteria. E. coli, which can live in cows' intestines without making the animals sick, is more commonly considered a risk for people who eat undercooked hamburger.

Health and agriculture investigators say the bacteria may have emerged at any number of points in the production process, from the field to the supermarket, making it more difficult to pinpoint the source.

In Wisconsin, which has reported the largest number of cases, Gov. James E. Doyle issued a plea on Friday for residents to call their doctors if they experience bloody diarrhea or other symptoms that might indicate E. coli and to throw out spinach still in their refrigerators.

"Simply washing it is not enough to protect you," Mr. Doyle said in a news conference in Milwaukee.

In addition to the woman who died, whom local health authorities described as a resident of Manitowoc County, 29 people in nine counties across Wisconsin have been sickened by E. coli, Mr. Doyle said.

DOJ_NMG_0064447

Federal authorities reported one fewer case in Wisconsin, and state authorities here could not explain the discrepancy late Friday.

Ten of the cases in Wisconsin were confirmed since Thursday night, when the F.D.A. first announced the outbreak, and state health officials said they were still investigating at least four more suspected cases late Friday.

At least two federal lawsuits — one in Wisconsin and one in Oregon — have already been filed in connection with the outbreak. Both suits named the Dole Food Company as defendants. Officials at Dole did not respond to a reporter's telephone message.

In a suit filed Friday in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, Paul and Anna Zientek said their two children had become violently ill and developed a condition that could lead to kidney failure after eating baby spinach in late August; one child remains hospitalized, the suit says.

In a telephone interview, Gwyn Wellborn, 27, of Salem, Ore., described how she ate baby spinach four days in a row at her office, then fell ill with unbearable abdominal pain and bloody diarrhea within days. At one point in her hospitalization, she said, the doctors told her they thought there was nothing more they could do, that she might die.

"It became very real," Ms. Wellborn said, "and very scary."

Milwaukee public health officials created a hot line for nervous residents and reported a "robust" number of calls with questions and worries. At grocery stores here, bins for raw spinach sat empty and produce managers said they had few inquiries about the product. Most people, it seemed, had heard about the outbreak by Friday morning and had no intention of buying spinach.

Bette Massaro, who was shopping in the produce aisle at Grasch Foods in Brookfield, Wis., where a clerk had moved some 100 bags of spinach to the back of the store early Friday, said she had already thrown away her bag of spinach at home. Ms. Massaro said did not intend to buy another right away, even when the immediate outbreak was over.

This is not the first time leafy greens have been deemed a problem in E. coli outbreaks. As recently as August, the Food and Drug Administration announced the development of the Lettuce Safety Initiative, "as a response to the recurring outbreaks" of E. coli O157:H7, a strain associated with fresh and cut lettuce. Federal and state officials are in the middle of a review of lettuce farming and processing in the Salinas Valley of California, where Natural Selection Foods and other growers are located.

According to the F.D.A., there have been 19 outbreaks of the specific E. coli bacteria now under scrutiny since 1995, and 8 of the incidents were traced to leafy produce.

In Salinas, growers in the immense spinach fields were dismayed by the broad scope of the federal warnings not to eat any fresh bagged spinach. More acres of spinach are produced in California than in any other state; last year, American farmers produced 53,700 acres of spinach, 75 percent of it in California.

Robert Eli Perkins, the executive director of the Monterey County Farm Bureau, said the growers were staying out of the limelight and waiting for a decisive determination of the source of the contamination. They were worried, Mr. Perkins said, that the broad recommendation issued on Thursday against consuming any bagged spinach would confuse consumers and might leave a long-lasting taint on fresh spinach.

For now, though, Dr. Acheson said Friday night, consumers should avoid all prepackaged spinach and mixed salad products, and throw out any products that have already been bought. Rewashing spinach and salad mixes at home may only worsen the problem by spreading the contamination, he said. And if a restaurant fails to specify the source of spinach in its items, diners should avoid ordering raw spinach, he said.

In addition to the Wisconsin cases, federal authorities broke down the E. coli cases by states this way: Utah, 11; Ohio and New York, 7 each; Michigan, 6; Oregon and New Mexico, 5; Indiana, 4; Idaho, Pennsylvania and Kentucky, 3 each; Maine and Connecticut, 2 each; and California, Minnesota, Nevada, Tennessee, Virginia, Washington and Wyoming, one each.

Calif. Farm Firm Linked To Tainted Spinach (WP)

By Michael S. Rosenwald And Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Federal health officials last night linked a deadly E. coli outbreak in bagged spinach products to a California farm company that sells organic produce in 74 percent of the country's grocery stores.

Natural Selection Foods, widely known for its Earthbound Farm brand, yesterday recalled all its fresh spinach products, along with packaged salads.

The company also sells products under the Trader Joe's and Dole brands, among dozens of others.

Many of the people who have become ill reported eating Natural Selection products, but the Food and Drug Administration has not yet found the bacterium in the company's products. The outbreak has sickened nearly 100 people in 20 states, including one potential case in Virginia.

FDA officials warned consumers not to eat packaged spinach, and last night it extended the warning to packaged salad products that contain spinach, as well as spinach at restaurant salad bars. The strain of Escherichia coli that is making people sick is particularly virulent. The bacteria can cause severe vomiting and diarrhea, and some people can develop kidney failure.

The warnings came on a day when grocery stores and restaurant chains scrambled to pull bagged spinach off their shelves and menus. Wal-Mart Stores Inc. removed its bagged spinach from stores around the country. So did Giant Food, Food Lion and Safeway. Cosi, a popular lunch chain, took baby spinach out of its hand-tossed salad. The Ruby Tuesday restaurant chain decided last night to remove all spinach from its salad bars and entree salads.

At Whole Foods Market, which cleared its stock Thursday after initial FDA warnings, signs were posted explaining to customers why bagged spinach was not on shelves.

"We pulled all our spinach in the store, not only the bagged stuff but any of the fresh stuff and any products that had fresh spinach in them," said Sarah Kenney, director of marketing for the company's mid-Atlantic region. The stores communicated with each other via e-mail. "We get questions like: 'What about the spinach in this dip?' The response is: 'Just pull it.' "

Spinach is a nearly $300 million-a-year industry and has been growing with the popularity of packaged salads. While sales of canned spinach have fallen 14 percent, to $34 million, from 2002 to 2005, sales of packaged spinach have risen. Sales rose nearly 36 percent from 2002 to 2005, to $158 million, according to AC Nielsen.

"I love spinach," said Ophelia Miranda, a District resident, who couldn't find it yesterday at a Whole Foods Market. "I'll stay away from it for a while."

Health officials made the link to Natural Selection Foods by interviewing patients, asking them what they had eaten in the week before they became ill, and then looking in the answers for a common thread. Once spinach was implicated, epidemiologists queried the people about where they shopped and what brands they had bought. That led to the California company.

A spokeswoman for Earthbound Farm released a statement saying the company was assisting federal health authorities in their investigation, including providing full access to its facilities and offering products for testing.

"We will do whatever is necessary to help protect the health and safety of the public," the statement said.

David Acheson, an FDA food safety official, emphasized last night that no E. coli bacteria has been isolated from any of Natural Selection's products and that recalls could extend beyond Natural Selection Foods. Samples of spinach that several patients still had in their refrigerators are being shipped to FDA labs for testing.

Food safety experts have been recently tracking an increase in the number of food-borne illnesses in fresh produce. Outbreaks in produce have been more frequent than beef and poultry in recent years, according to federal health statistics analyzed by the Center for Science in the Public Interest. From 1998 to 2004, there were 492 outbreaks of food-borne illnesses attributed to produce, including 86 in 2004. In the same period there were 324 outbreaks traced to beef, 402 to poultry and 626 to seafood.

Caroline Smith DeWaal, food safety director for the Center for Science in the Public Interest, said it was not clear what caused the increase in produce problems. "What is clear is that the numbers show they are not going down," she said.

James Gorny, senior vice president for food safety and technology at the United Fresh Produce Association, attributed the increase to several factors, including increased consumption of produce, better detection methods and advances in epidemiology. He said the public is also more aware of problems that could arise from tainted produce.

"We never thought to look at fruits and vegetables before, and now we are," he said.

Gorny said the industry has improved its communication with regulatory agencies and recently issued guidelines for handling melons, tomatoes, lettuce and leafy greens.

"These documents don't just sit on a table," he said. "We really try to get them out to industry."

Tom Stenzel, president and chief executive of the United Fresh Produce Association, said it is working closely with the FDA to determine the source of the current outbreak. "We've got to make sure consumers retain their confidence in the safety of these products," he said yesterday during a news conference at the National Press Club in Washington.

The outbreak prompted questions about how packaged spinach is produced. Gorny said it is sent to a processing facility after harvesting, where it is cooled and triple-washed in chlorinated water, "probably a more vigorous wash cycle than you can ever do in your home." The spinach is then dried, packaged and refrigerated before being shipped to distributors.

Raw, bulk spinach is harvested and packaged but not washed before it is sent to distributors, Gorny said. Stenzel cautioned that produce tainted with E. coli cannot be decontaminated simply by washing. "You can certainly reduce risk by washing the product, but you cannot eliminate the risk," he said.

The only way to eliminate the risk is to cook the product to at least 160 degrees, but health officials advised against that, saying preparing contaminated food could spread the bacteria.

BP Safety Under Fresh US Attack (FT)

By Sheila Mcnulty In Houston

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

BP mistakenly told state regulators in a 2003 application for an emissions permit that it had installed the updated equipment which investigators said would have prevented last year's fatal explosion at its Texas City refinery, the Financial Times has learned.

In the application, a copy of which has been seen by the FT, BP said: "Relief valves are routed to a flare; therefore, 100 per cent control credit is applied." A flare is a closed tank in which liquid emissions are received and the vapour burned off. But BP only applied to replace the outdated blowdown stack on the refinery's ISOM unit with a flare after the refinery exploded, killing 15 and injuring an estimated 500.

A blowdown stack is a tank with an open stack, used to dispose of emergency releases. An ISOM unit is used to boost the octane rating of gasoline.

"The fatal explosion would not have occurred if the ISOM unit had a properly sized and designed flare system," said Daniel Horowitz of the US Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, an independent federal agency that investigates industrial chemical accidents.

In BP's own assessment of the blast at its biggest refinery, it said the use of a flare system, instead of a blowdown stack – which the industry has been phasing out for years – would have reduced the accident's severity. BP said on Friday: "We follow the rules."

BP is under grand jury investigation for possible criminal charges in Texas. The FT has learnt that both the US Attorney's Office and the federal Environmental Protection Agency, conducting separate investigations of BP, have learned of the existence of the emissions permit document during their probes.

BP also is under grand jury investigation in Alaska for severe corrosion that forced it to shut half of Prudhoe Bay. Hearings are also being held in Congress over how BP let its field deteriorate to such an extent.

A year-long oil leak in the Gulf of Mexico, uncovered by the FT last month, and a spill in California announced this week, have bolstered claims that BP's US safety culture needs improving.

The BP document is part of BP's application to the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality for a revised Flexible Permit relating to emissions from the Texan plant. It is likely to surface in state court in the first civil cases arising from the blast to go to trial. BP received the permit in July 2005, four months after the explosion.

That trial is to begin on Monday, with the start of jury selection. There are roughly 550 outstanding death, injury and damage cases against BP, which has settled about 650 cases.

Ruling To Halt Forest Fee Will Be Appealed (AZDS)

By Tony Davis, Arizona Daily Star

Arizona Daily Star, September 16, 2006

$5 requirement for Mt. Lemmon, canyons at stake

The federal government has given notice that it will appeal a magistrate's ruling that could lead to elimination of $5 daily user fees in popular recreation areas, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix.

People now pay the user fees to hike or picnic on Mount Lemmon, in Sabino and Madera canyons, and in other sites in Arizona and around the West.

U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton's notice, filed Thursday, said the government will appeal U.S. Magistrate Charles Pyle's Sept. 5 ruling dismissing two $30 tickets the Forest Service issued to Tucsonan Chris Wallace.

Wallace was cited twice in September 2005 on Mount Lemmon for parking her car to hike in the Marshall Gulch area and near the General Hitchcock Campground without paying the fee.

Pyle's ruling said the Forest Service lacks authority to impose such a fee for trail use.

The user fee system requires anyone who drives up Mount Lemmon to pay $5 per day or $20 for an annual pass, if they park at hiking trails or picnic areas or anywhere else within a prescribed area on the mountain. That area includes all national forest along the Mount Lemmon Highway.

They do not have to pay if they drive up and down the mountain without stopping, or stop at campgrounds that have separate fees charged by concessionaires. They also don't pay if they stop at private cabins, Summerhaven businesses, scenic overlooks or vista points.

The appeal will be pursued in U.S. District Court. The Justice Department has 30 days from Thursday to file a legal brief on the case.

DOJ_NMG_0064450

On Friday, a Forest Service official corrected a statement he made Wednesday that Congress has cut back its appropriations for Forest Service recreational programs by 50 percent to 75 percent over the past decade.

Actually, the amount appropriated for recreation nationally has increased by 22 percent over that period, said Larry Raley, the Santa Catalina Ranger District's district ranger. He declined to comment on budget issues for the Santa Catalina district.

Fresno Judge To Rule On Air Suit (FRESNOB)

By John Ellis, The Fresno Bee

Fresno Bee, September 16, 2006

Decision about vehicle emissions could have national implications.

State officials on Friday asked a federal judge to throw out a lawsuit by the automobile industry challenging new state emissions standards that would be the toughest in the nation.

After hearing more than two hours of arguments, U.S. District Court Judge Anthony W. Ishii said he would issue his ruling later.

If he rules against the state, the closely watched case is likely to go to trial in January — and its outcome would have national implications.

Already, 10 states have adopted California's new emissions standards, and nine states in the Pacific Northwest and northeast, as well as New York City, have filed briefs on the state's behalf in the case.

The new state regulations, scheduled to take effect with the 2009 model year, would set tailpipe emission standards for greenhouse gases, which many scientists believe are contributing to global warming.

The regulations are expected to cut exhaust emissions in cars and light trucks by 25% and in larger trucks and sport utility vehicles by 18%. The operation of vehicle engines creates greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide.

"This is an incredibly important issue," Deputy Attorney General Marc Melnick told Ishii.

The rules were approved two years ago by the state Air Resources Board and stemmed from legislation signed in 2002 by then-Gov. Gray Davis.

In December 2004, more than a dozen San Joaquin Valley auto dealers — including Central Valley Chrysler-Jeep of Modesto, Kitahara Pontiac GMC Buick of Fresno, Madera Ford Mercury and Merle Stone Chevrolet of Tulare — joined DaimlerChrysler Corp., General Motors, the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers and others in filing suit to block the new rules.

At issue is whether California has the right under the federal Clean Air Act to regulate greenhouse gases through tailpipe emissions.

Under the Clean Air Act, California is the only state allowed to set emissions rules stricter than national standards, but it must first obtain a waiver from the federal Environmental Protection Agency. That has not yet happened. Other states, in turn, can opt for California's standards.

Washington, D.C., attorney Andrew Clubok, who represents the plaintiffs, told Ishii California's new rules are fuel-economy standards, which can only be set by the federal government.

He said the state's efforts to regulate greenhouse gases on its own violate antitrust laws, the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, foreign policy laws and other federal statutes.

"California thinks it's better to lead by example, even if it interferes with the position of the federal government," Clubok said.

He also said the federal Energy Policy and Conservation Act gives the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration — not individual states — the exclusive ability to set gas mileage regulations.

Clubok told Ishii the regulations would lead to a loss of jobs and the elimination of certain types of vehicles from the states that adopt the new standard. He said it would increase highway fatalities and pollution.

He also said the Valley would be hit especially hard because heavy-duty trucks needed in agriculture and related industries no longer would be available or would be much more expensive.

Automakers say the rules will increase vehicle prices by at least $3,000 as soon as they take effect. The air board estimates the increase at no more than $1,000 by 2016, spokesman Jerry Martin said. That added cost would be more than offset by savings in other areas.

By contrast, Clubok said, the only stated benefit from California is a reduction in global warming, but even that claim, he said, would be disproved during a trial.

Melnick, who called Clubok's statements a "parade of horribles" meant to frighten the public, said that if the regulations eventually are adopted, the automotive industry can take legal action in state court.

DOJ_NMG_0064451

David Doniger, a Washington, D.C.-based attorney for the National Resources Defense Council — which has joined the state in defending the regulations — added that the automotive industry's arguments should be made to the EPA when the state seeks the waiver to implement the new regulations.

"This should be handled by the EPA in Washington, not in a courthouse in Fresno," he said. The reporter can be reached at jellis@fresnobee.comor (559) 441-6320.

Environmental Group Sues Federal Government To Halt Sales Of Toy Jewelry Containing Lead (FINDLAW/AP)

By Terence Chea, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Environmentalists sued the federal government Thursday to stop the sale of toy jewelry made with lead, citing dangers it can pose to brain development in children.

The San Francisco-based Sierra Club wants the Environmental Protection Agency to find ways to stop the sale or production of toy necklaces, bracelets and rings containing lead.

"I don't think parents realize that these pieces of jewelry have the potential to be harmful," said Jessica Frohman, head of a Sierra Club committee on toxic substances. Children can be exposed to dangerous levels of lead if they suck on or swallow the jewelry, she said.

The attorneys general in California and Illinois sent letters to the EPA supporting the Sierra Club complaint.

The EPA would not comment directly on the lawsuit, which was filed in federal court in San Francisco. But spokesman Mark Merchant said the agency has a "comprehensive set of regulations" to protect children from lead. It does not, however, have specific regulations for toy jewelry containing lead, he said.

Inexpensive toy jewelry made with lead or painted with lead paint is sold across the United States in vending machines and in stores that sell mainly to immigrant communities.

A 4-year-old Minnesota boy died of lead poisoning in February after swallowing a heart-shaped charm from a bracelet distributed by Reebok International. In March, the company recalled 300,000 of the silver-colored, Chinese-made bracelets found to be 90 percent lead.

Earlier this year, more than 70 major U.S. retailers, including Target, Kmart, Sears and Toys "R" Us, agreed to stop selling children's jewelry containing lead in California after an advocacy group, the Center for Environmental Health, and the state attorney general sued in 2004.

EPA Plans To Close Labs, Drop Scientists And Reduce Oversight (MCT)

By David Goldstein

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Environmental Protection Agency intends to close labs, cut its cadre of upper-level scientists and reduce regulatory oversight, according to an internal agency document.

In a memo dated June 8, a top agency official outlined "a set of proposed disinvestments, innovations, efficiencies and consolidations" for the upcoming 2008 fiscal budget.

"The decisions we make will be critical, difficult and will have long-term consequences," EPA Chief Financial Officer Lyons Gray wrote.

He said the EPA wanted to limit duplication and find "opportunities for consolidation and streamlining." EPA assistant administrators, regional administrators, the general counsel and inspector general received the memo.

Gray called for creating "Centers of Excellence" within the agency that would manage "contracts, grants and human resource work."

Asked about the memo, the agency said in a statement, "The EPA is committed to being good stewards of our nation's environment and good stewards of our nation's tax dollars."

It said the agency hoped "to accelerate the pace of environmental protection by promoting environmental results and accountability, innovation and using the best available science."

Jeff Ruch, the executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, a watchdog group that obtained the memo, said that rather than consolidating to improve the agency, the EPA was "chopping up the furniture to meet external budget targets."

The EPA's budget has been dropping steadily since it reached a record $8.13 billion in fiscal 2003. The Bush administration's proposed fiscal 2007 budget was nearly $1 billion lower, but Congress hasn't yet approved a final version. The fiscal 2008 budget plan is due in February. Gray said the financial outlook was "very challenging."

In his memo, he asked for plans to close at least 20 percent of the EPA's 16 research laboratories by 2011 - a minimum 10 percent cut by 2009 and another 10 percent by 2011.

He asked agency officials to suggest upper-level staff cuts, which would include scientists, analysts and managers. His memo hinted that more reductions could be necessary later.

Staff cuts could worsen what some experts have said is already a deteriorating situation, particularly with a significant number of EPA employees due to retire over the next decade.

M. Granger Morgan, the head of the Engineering and Policy Department at Carnegie Mellon University and the chairman of the EPA Science Advisory Board, told Congress in March, "The agency is in danger of losing core scientific expertise in both conventional and emerging environmental issues."

Morgan testified that research and development spending at the agency had fallen more than 16 percent since 2004.

A report in August from the EPA inspector general found that various studies have concluded that the agency doesn't always have reliable data to support its conclusions and "does not always use reliable science to support its rules and regulations."

Gray's memo also calls on the agency to work with state and tribal groups to look for ways to reduce regulatory oversight.

"The state and tribal grants have been reduced 25 percent since the administration started," said Heather Taylor, the deputy legislative director of the National Resources Defense Council, an environmental advocacy group. "First we take away the money to do their jobs, now we take away the oversight."

Fairfax Issues Pandemic Flu Response Plan (WP)

By Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Nearly 700 Deaths Possible in Outbreak

A severe outbreak of bird flu would infect nearly a third of Fairfax County's population, killing almost 700 people and sending thousands to local hospitals, according to a new report.

The 112-page primer on how the Washington area's largest local government would respond to a pandemic that many researchers think is inevitable depicts a grim scene of sick or at-risk people in widespread isolation or quarantine, at home or in hospital beds.

As much as 40 percent of the county's workforce would be out of commission. And hospitals, nursing homes and other makeshift medical centers would have to set up temporary morgues and stockpile body bags to handle the deaths.

"Life as you see it today will not be the same," Fairfax health director Gloria Addo-Ayensu said yesterday. "We will all have to make sacrifices."

Fairfax, which has posted its response plan on the county Web site, is the region's first local government to issue a comprehensive report on pandemic flu preparations, said Addo-Ayensu and other emergency management officials.

Although the Bush administration has released a federal plan and committed tens of millions of dollars to anticipate a crisis, the details of how to respond are left to state and local governments.

Public health experts fear that avian influenza, which is spreading worldwide in poultry and has infected more than 230 people, could mutate into a virulent, pandemic strain that could spread widely from person to person, killing millions around the world.

There is no bird flu vaccine, and public health officials predict a shortage of antiviral drugs.

Fairfax, like most local governments, has planned emergency exercises; held meetings with doctors, businesses, school and religious leaders; and prepared public service announcements and publications to give residents information about a possible pandemic.

Now the county is giving its government officials, infectious disease specialists, emergency planners and first responders explicit instructions on what to do if people get sick.

"We have to look at the scenarios that are the worst-case," said C. Douglas Bass, the county's emergency management director, "and look at how we would deal with them."

Bass said the county took the unusual step of putting the response plan on its Web site "to assure the public that we are being vigilant, that we've gone through this process, and to provide a forum if they have questions."

It's largely a communications plan that dispassionately lays out military-style procedures that would be set in motion at the first sign of a pandemic. The goal is to minimize the transmission of a highly contagious virus while keeping the county government of 11,000 employees running, albeit with truncated services.

DOJ_NMG_0064453

Taking its cue from federal officials, the county would track individual infections through reporting by local doctors and hospitals. Sites would be set up across the county to distribute a potential vaccine or medicine, and sick people could be forced into quarantine.

The county would communicate a series of sobering messages: A pandemic has been declared somewhere in the world, and Fairfax may soon experience illnesses and deaths. A pandemic could last as long as 18 months. And residents should practice good hygiene -- washing their hands and covering their mouths when they cough -- to prevent the spread of germs.

Many county employees would work from home, and hundreds could be diverted from their jobs in libraries, parks and other "nonessential" agencies to help with the emergency response. Critical personnel would include police and fire rescue workers and those in utilities and wastewater treatment. Heads of agencies are supposed to designate replacements who could fill in if they get sick.

And as a pandemic approached, thousands of other people would be ordered to stay home, steering clear of trains, buses, malls and other places where they would come into close contact with others.

The response could get particularly challenging in a county of more than 1 million people, thousands of whom do not speak English. As many as 51,000 of those infected would be low-income residents without regular access to medical care, the response plan says.

"Trying to do mass vaccinations, for example, would be a huge challenge," county spokeswoman Merni Fitzgerald said. "We are so big that we can't just say, 'Everybody show up at once place.' "

A flu outbreak could last six to eight weeks, with two waves over 18 months, the report says.

As more people get sick, waves of panic could spread, with increased calls to police. "Civil disturbances and breakdowns in public order may occur," the plan says. Crime could jump as police officers might be diverted from traditional duties.

And security problems could be rampant as people might fight for access to limited vaccines and medication. Health-care workers, the elderly and those with chronic illnesses would get first priority.

Interior's Internal Messes (NYT)

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

We knew that bad things would happen when President Bush filled many of his important environmental posts with right-wing activists and industry lobbyists who had spent their careers criticizing the laws they were now being told to uphold and representing industries they were now being told to regulate. Just how bad became clear this week in the course of some pointed testimony from the Interior Department's inspector general, who accused top officials at his agency of fostering a culture of "managerial irresponsibility" that tolerated conflicts of interest, cronyism and other lapses.

At a House subcommittee hearing, the official, Earl Devaney, said that "short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior." The committee had summoned Mr. Devaney to give his views on some flawed drilling leases the department signed in the late 1990's — before the Bush administration came to office — that could allow big oil companies to escape billions of dollars in royalties on oil and gas produced in the Gulf of Mexico. The leases appear to have been the result of bureaucratic bungling, not favoritism, but Mr. Devaney suggested that Interior had since gone to some lengths to cover up its mistakes.

On the broader subject of departmental ethics, Mr. Devaney expressed particular frustration at what he described as the kid-gloves treatment of J. Steven Griles, a former industry lobbyist who was deputy secretary during Mr. Bush's first term, before returning to the lobbying game. Regarded by many environmentalists as the Svengali behind Gale Norton, Mr. Bush's secretary of the interior until earlier this year, Mr. Griles brought a pro-industry bias to nearly every big decision made during the Norton regime. He was an architect of the administration's relentless search for oil and gas in fragile areas of the Rocky Mountain West. He was also involved in an agreement between Ms. Norton and the state of Utah that opened millions of acres of potential wilderness to commercial exploitation, and was instrumental in rolling back environmental regulations governing the mining industry.

Beginning in 2002, Mr. Devaney conducted an 18-month investigation into a whistleblower's complaints that Mr. Griles had behaved improperly by meeting with former business partners and with industries that stood to benefit from departmental decisions. The office of government ethics eventually ruled that Mr. Griles had not violated any laws. But Mr. Devaney has made clear his belief that Mr. Griles, who was allowed by Ms. Norton to stay on the job after simply confessing to bad judgment, should have been severely reprimanded, if only to send a much-needed message to the department that even the appearance of impropriety cannot be tolerated.

That message still needs sending, and it is up to Dirk Kempthorne, Ms. Norton's successor, to do it. Mr. Kempthorne has promised to investigate the foul-ups and cover-ups regarding the oil contracts. But he should broaden that inquiry to encompass the ethical shortcomings of an agency whose reputation for probity and fairness is as low as it has been since the dark days of Ronald Reagan.

Mexican Agents Complete DEA Course (SAEN)

By Gary Martin, Express-News Washington Bureau

San Antonio Express-News, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON – Mexican law enforcement agents completed a Drug Enforcement Administration program as part of a joint U.S.-Mexico effort to combat methamphetamine production in border states, officials said Friday.

The announcement that 55 Mexican agents and prosecutors completed the DEA course in Quantico, Va., comes one day after the State Department issued a travel alert for Americans in Mexico.

Training Mexican police to dismantle methamphetamine labs and prosecute offenders is "a big step forward in our fight against meth," said Karen Tandy, the DEA administrator.

Tandy called the program "a historic effort to jointly combat meth production and trafficking that is devastating both nations."

About 80 percent of the methamphetamine consumed in the United States is manufactured in Mexican labs by criminal organizations based in both countries, according to the DEA.

A war among drug cartels over control of narcotics trafficking and distribution routes is blamed for rising lawlessness along the U.S.-Mexico border.

That war is blamed for the death of a Monterrey policeman and the killing of a state police administrator in Tamaulipas earlier this month.

The State Department issued a warning to Americans traveling to Mexico to exercise extreme caution as execution-style killings of U.S. and Mexican citizens in border states have been reported.

That warning includes a particular alert for Americans traveling in the border cities of Nuevo Laredo and Matamoros.

Tony Garza, the U.S. ambassador to Mexico, said in a statement that crimes in those cities are putting a strain on travel, tourism and business.

He pledged to work with Mexican counterparts to "restore order and successfully take on those undermining our society."

The manufacturing and trafficking of methamphetamine has become a growing problem in Mexico, the result of a crackdown in the United States where recent laws restrict the sale and access to pseudoephedrine, the main ingredient for the drug.

In May, Tandy and U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales met with Daniel Cabeza De Vaca, the Mexican attorney general, to address the methamphetamine problem in both countries.

U.S. and Mexican officials vowed to crack down on producers of the drug, and work together to combat trafficking. They unveiled the joint training program for Mexican police, modeled after a similar DEA program that has trained 300 Mexican agents.

Officials hope the new team of trained Mexican agents can target the largest methamphetamine trafficking gangs in Sinaloa, Michoacan, Jalisco, Sonora and Baja California.

In the United States, the DEA is focusing on traffickers and organizations transporting and distributing methamphetamine produced in Mexico and smuggled through American border states.

The DEA also is attacking money-laundering operations of the gangs and criminal organizations operating on both sides of the border. gmartin@express-news.net

Gun Collector To Remain In Jail, Magistrate Rules (SEATT)

By Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporter

Seattle Times, September 16, 2006

A Bellevue gun collector once questioned about the slaying of a federal prosecutor will remain in custody pending trial on a charge that he illegally possessed a machine gun.

U.S. Magistrate Monica Benton ruled Friday that Albert Kwok-Leung Kwan posed a flight risk and a potential threat to the community and to federal agents who would monitor him if he was freed.

DOJ_NMG_0064455

At a hearing before the judge's decision, Kwan's attorneys acknowledged that he repeatedly invoked his Fifth Amendment guarantee against self-incrimination during appearances before a grand jury investigating the slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Wales in October 2001.

Kwan was arrested and held as a material witness for 23 days last year as FBI agents and federal prosecutors attempted to discern the whereabouts of two handgun barrels Kwan allegedly owned. The bullets that killed Wales were fired through the same, rare type of barrel, the FBI has said.

Kwan is not a suspect in the killing.

He was indicted last week for owning an unlicensed M-14 assault rifle the government says was capable of firing as a machine gun.

Kwan has hundreds of firearms — many of them licensed machine guns — in his home. Benton was worried about the safety of federal agents who would supervise Kwan if he was released.

Kwan's attorneys argued to have him placed in a federal halfway house while his gun collection was moved. His lawyer Joseph Conte said the collection amounted to nearly 3,000 pounds of guns.

Benton cited instances in which Kwan had been evasive or confrontational with agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, which has revoked his federal firearms license. Kwan, the magistrate said, appeared guilty of "not insubstantial" violations of ATF regulations.

"And this is a firearm offense," Benton said. "I have to look at his conduct in light of that."

IRS Orders All Saints To Yield Documents On '04 Political Races (LAT)

By Louis Sahagun

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Antiwar remarks at All Saints in Pasadena were made two days before the 2004 election. The church is ordered to hand over records.

Stepping up its probe of allegedly improper campaigning by churches, the Internal Revenue Service on Friday ordered a liberal Pasadena parish to turn over all the documents and e-mails it produced during the 2004 election year with references to political candidates.

All Saints Episcopal Church and its rector, the Rev. Ed Bacon, have until Sept. 29 to present the sermons, newsletters and electronic communications.

The IRS investigation was triggered by an antiwar sermon delivered by its former rector, the Rev. George F. Regas, at the church two days before the 2004 presidential election. The summons even requests utility bills to establish costs associated with hosting Regas' speech. Bacon was ordered to testify before IRS officials Oct. 11.

The tax code bars nonprofits, including churches, from endorsing or campaigning against candidates in an election.

Facing the possible loss of his church's tax-exempt status, Bacon said he plans to inform his roughly 3,500 active congregants about the investigation during Sunday's services. Then he plans to seek their advice on whether to comply.

"There is a lot at stake here," Bacon said in an interview. "If the IRS prevails, it will have a chilling effect on the practice of religion in America."

The congregants will have two choices: consent to the IRS request, or decline, which could result in the matter being referred to the Department of Justice and, possibly, U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, All Saints' lead attorney Marcus Owens said.

"The congregation's decision will be clear on Sunday or a few days after that," Owens said. "My guess is they will be unlikely to respond demurely and acquiesce in the government's request at this stage. The issues are too close to the quick of their fundamental religious beliefs."

Members of All Saints have a long history of social activism. The sermon that attracted the IRS' attention was delivered by Regas, who was well-known for opposing the Vietnam War, championing female clergy and supporting gays and lesbians in the church.

The medieval-looking church, just east of City Hall, seems to embody staid, moneyed Old Pasadena, but the liberal outlook goes back decades. During World War II, its rector spoke out against the internment of Japanese Americans. Regas headed the church for 28 years before retiring in 1995.

Exactly how the congregants will make their feelings known on the IRS issue is yet to be decided.

DOJ_NMG_0064456

"It may come via e-mail, or as a yea or nay on Sunday, or some other means," said Keith Holeman, a spokesman for the church.

IRS spokesman Frank Fotinatos declined to comment on the matter saying, "We can't confirm or deny any ongoing investigation."

Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank), who unsuccessfully tried to launch a Government Accountability Office investigation into the IRS' probes of churches nationwide last year, called the summons "a very disturbing escalation" of the agency's scrutiny of All Saints.

"I don't want religious organizations to become arms of campaigns," he said. "But they should be able to talk about issues of war and peace without fear of losing tax-exempt status. If they can't, they'll have little to say from the pulpit."

The view was echoed by the Rev. Bob Edgar, an ordained elder in the United Methodist Church and general secretary of the National Council of Churches USA. "I'm outraged," he said. "Preachers ought to have the liberty to speak truth to power."

"There is a lot more to be done about this, and it may include some actions of nonviolent civil disobedience," Edgar said. "Since 9/11, the IRS, like the FBI, has been moving back to the 1950s and 1960s when a great deal of such activity was propagated against church leaders like Martin Luther King."

In July, the IRS warned 15,000 tax-exempt groups across the nation, including churches and nonprofit organizations, to stay neutral on politics.

At the time, IRS officials said the agency also began expediting investigations into charges of improper campaigning under a new enforcement program, the Political Activity Compliance Initiative. Under it, the IRS will no longer wait for an annual tax return to be filed or for the tax year to end before investigating allegations of wrongful campaigning.

Since 2004, the IRS has investigated more than 200 organizations nationwide.

Federal law prohibits the IRS from releasing the names of those under investigation, but the agency in July said it had 100 cases pending — 40 of them churches.

Among them is the agency's case against the NAACP, which drew the IRS' attention in July 2004, after the organization's chairman, Julian Bond, criticized the Bush administration's policies on civil rights.

All Saints came under IRS investigation shortly after Regas delivered a guest sermon that depicted Jesus in a mock debate with then-presidential candidates George W. Bush and John F. Kerry.

The sermon, which did not endorse or oppose any of the candidates, addressed the moral and religious implications of various social issues facing the nation at the time.

Regas' suggestion that Jesus would have told Bush his preemptive war strategy in Iraq "has led to disaster" prompted a letter from the agency in June 2005 stating that "a reasonable belief exists that you may not be a tax-exempt church."

After nearly a year without communication with the agency, Bacon said he was "quite surprised" Friday when an IRS agent handed him the summons at his church.

In addition to seeking electronic communications, the summons requests "a copy of all oral communications identifying candidates for public office delivered at All Saints Church or at events sponsored by All Saints Church between Jan. 1, 2004, and Nov. 2, 2004."

The summons also asks for various financial records. "Please provide an accounting of all expenditures associated with delivery of the sermon, including allocations of overhead." All Saints officials take that to mean such things as the pay of church staff.

Bacon said the IRS' renewed investigation raises concerns that it may reflect an attempt to quash the church's discussions of "fundamental religious issues with policy implications before the midterm elections, and in a way that intrudes into core religious practices."

"Despite the drain on our finances and the time we will spend defending this attack on the freedoms of religion and speech, All Saints Church will continue without interruption or fear what has distinguished its mission for 125 years," Bacon said.

Senate Confirms Minnesotan As Peace Corps Director (MINNST)

By Brady Aaverill

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 16, 2006

A Minnesotan has been confirmed as the 17th director of the Peace Corps. "I'm elated. I'm honored to be able to serve in this way," Ron Tschetter said after the Senate confirmed him late Wednesday.

WASHINGTON - A Minnesotan has been confirmed as the 17th director of the Peace Corps. "I'm elated. I'm honored to be able to serve in this way," Ron Tschetter said after the Senate confirmed him late Wednesday. He said he expected to start the job at the end of the month.

"Here you have a guy who understands the system and who is committed to making sure the Peace Corps is more effective today than it was when it was started under John Kennedy," said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., chairman of the subcommittee that has oversight of the Peace Corps.

Coleman said that while safety and security will have to be the foremost priority for Tschetter, he also hopes that Tschetter will diversify the volunteer base by recruiting baby boomers. The new director has said both will be priorities.

President Bush nominated Tschetter, 64, in July to manage the Peace Corps, which he has had ties with since he was a health volunteer with his wife, Nancy, in India from 1966 to 1968. He was also a chairman of the National Peace Corps Association.

Tschetter was raised on a farm outside Huron, S.D. He received a bachelor's degree at Bethel College, and he was president of the investment firm Dain Rauscher for 10 years before he retired in 2001. He became president of the financial services firm D.A. Davidson & Co. in 2004.

Appeals Court Split Opposed By Nevada Bar (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

CARSON CITY, Nev. — The State Bar of Nevada reaffirmed its opposition to a bill by Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) to split up the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, a frequent source of anti-Bush-administration rulings.

In a letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee, Rew Goodenow, State Bar of Nevada president, said the group's governing board opposes Ensign's bill "given the tremendous financial strain splitting the 9th Circuit Court would cause and thereby taking away from the direct administration of justice."

Besides that, Goodenow — who is active in state GOP circles — said the governing board believes there is "a lack of evidence supporting a quantifiable need for the split" of the nation's largest federal appeals court.

The conservative Ensign, who had eight co-sponsors for his measure, has pressed for its approval by saying the San Francisco-based court is overloaded.

Opponents allege political motives by Republicans annoyed by the court's rulings, including a 2002 opinion that declared the Pledge of Allegiance unconstitutional when recited in public schools. The Bush administration had maintained the pledge is not an unconstitutional endorsement of religion.

The 9th Circuit covers nine states and has 28 judgeships.

Snow Laughs (WASHEX)

By Jeff DuFour And Patrick Gavin

Wash Exam, September 16, 2006

Must be the beautiful blue eyes ...

Covering the White House is not an easy beat. The hours are late, the travel can be brutal and the tug-of-war between the White House spin machine and journalists can wear down even the toughest reporter.

But White House spokesman Tony Snow, who has been on the job four months, might very well be out to change all of that and to put the “fun” back in “fundamentally, a frustrating job.”

Yeas & Nays reviewed the press briefing and press gaggle transcripts from Snow’s first four months on the job and compared them to those of Snow’s predecessor, Scott McClellan, during his first four months.

Under Snow, there were more than 330 percent more instances of laughter — as defined by the transcriber’s insertion of “(Laughter)” in the transcript — than under McClellan.

Have reporters fallen for the former Fox News commentator’s woo and charm? And — gasp! — could Snow actually be making the notoriously curmudgeonly task of covering the White House fun?

“It’s not that Tony’s necessarily a laugh riot,” says Ron Hutcheson, who covers the White House for McClatchy newspapers. “But he engages, and it’s a lot more fun to be in the room with somebody who’s engaging reporters.” Hutcheson says that McClellan, on the other hand, “was just cautious, cautious to a fault. He would retreat to the talking points and it was almost as if he didn’t listen to the question.”

Snow says that his humor is not intentional. “It’s just doing what I do, the way I do it,” he says. “For me, the job is a blast. I love the job and I think that’s part of it. And I enjoy the people out there. It’s not like I feel as if I’m among strangers. You’ve just got to be yourself when you’re doing a briefing.”

But is there any danger in being a bit too humorous?

"Well, I do like to have fun, but at the same time you don't want to be doing stand-up as the spokesperson of the president and the leader of the free world," he says.

Obama: A little off the top, Tom

The Senate has its own Oscar and Felix in the freshman class.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., the Democrats' Next Big Thing, and Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., the conservative hard-liner, have made an unlikely bipartisan pair this year.

The two celebrated their most recent success before reporters Thursday — a database bill that would shed light on government contracts and grants.

Amid the elation, the two even caught up on grooming tips.

"What did I tell you about your hair?" the buzz-cut Obama asked the shaggy-haired Coburn.

"4:30 today, it's coming off," said Coburn, running his hands through his gray mane. "I should save some for you in case you end up getting thin."

The collegiality may be welcome for Coburn, who alienated many members over his rigid views on spending when he served in the House from 1994 to 2000. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., alluded to Coburn's tumultuous history in the lower body Thursday when he said, "if you were surprised at how quickly we moved a bill with Sen. Coburn's name on it, imagine how surprised he was."

Raj and Rudy: Right?

Many of you know Raj Bhakta from his appearance on the second season of Manhattan mogul Donald Trump's TV show, "The Apprentice." But Bhakta is hoping that you'll associate him with a different oversized New York personality: Rudy Giuliani.

Bhakta, who is running as a Republican in an effort to unseat Democratic Rep. Allyson Schwartz in Pennsylvania's 13th Congressional District, is touting a recent Northeast Times article by reporter Tom Waring titled "Raj a rising Giuliani type?"

"I share much in common with the outlook of Mayor Giuliani," Bhakta told Yeas & Nays. "I think it's a very relevant comparison. "The basis is that, in both cases, we're people of action. Giuliani has taken action in cleaning up New York City when it needed action, and Philadelphia needs representatives who are going to take similar action."

Of course, Bhakta, who trails Schwartz in the polls, stands to benefit from a potential Rudy-Raj partnership.

"I look forward to having his support and help in the campaign," he said.

Hizzoner Mr. Giuliani did not get back to us by press time on whether Bhakta would have it.

Shuttle Astronauts Complete Final Spacewalk At Station (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064459

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — A pair of astronauts completed the third and final spacewalk of their mission outside the International Space Station on Friday by freeing up a new heat-dispensing radiator and upgrading communications gear.

The two, Joseph R. Tanner, a former Navy pilot, and Cmdr. Heidemarie M. Stefanyshyn-Piper of the Navy, spent 6 hours 41 minutes in space completing assorted tasks to get the station ready for further expansion as building of the research outpost resumed in earnest.

Their main task was removing packing restraints and readying deployment of a radiator that was part of the new solar power array set unfurled on Thursday. Shortly afterward, mission control sent commands to unfold the 1,600-pound radiator, and its seven panels expanded to form a 44-foot-long, 12-foot-wide winglike structure.

The radiator is to disperse heat and control temperatures of the electronics inside the solar array module once it starts supplying power to the station in December.

The astronauts also adjusted a communications antenna and swapped out defective parts, retrieved a suitcase-size experiment that exposed various materials to space to see how they fared, cleared the path of a mobile workstation that traverses the station, and rearranged footholds and handgrips for future spacewalkers working outside the station.

Mr. Tanner and Commander Stefanyshyn-Piper conducted their first spacewalk on Tuesday, connecting the 17.5-ton truss structure that the space shuttle Atlantis attached to the station a day earlier. A spacewalk the next day by Cmdr. Daniel C. Burbank of the Coast Guard and Steven G. MacLean of the Canadian Space Agency continued installation of the $372 million addition and freed a big rotary joint that will allow the station's solar panels to track the sun.

An overloaded circuit breaker delayed the final spacewalk of the shuttle's 11-day mission by 45 minutes because it knocked out a depressurization pump in the airlock where the astronauts were preparing for their excursion. The problem was caused by heaters cycling on at the same time as the pump and was corrected easily, said John McCullough, the lead station flight director.

With completion of the spacewalks, Mr. McCullough said, the busy mission was winding down. This is the first station construction mission since the 2003 Columbia disaster, which resulted in a nearly three-year grounding of the shuttle fleet.

"We're all tired on this team, but happy," Mr. McCullough said at a news briefing from the Johnson Space Center in Houston.

On Saturday, the six Atlantis astronauts are to get a half-day off before packing up and preparing for the shuttle's departure on Sunday. The shuttle is scheduled to land at the Kennedy Space Center in Florida on Wednesday.

Shuttle Crew Finishes Project (WP)

By Marc Kaufman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Energy System Is Installed at Station

HOUSTON, Sept. 15 -- After a final six-hour spacewalk Friday, the crew of the space shuttle Atlantis finished building out the expanded solar energy system on the international space station.

The mission, completed by spacewalkers Joe Tanner and Heidemarie Stefanyshyn-Piper, was essential to any future construction at the station, which is half built and well behind schedule. NASA officials were delighted by the work done by the Atlantis team, the first construction at the space station since the 2003 Columbia disaster.

"We have to say what a wonderful job you both did today, especially you, Joe," Mission Control said as the astronauts returned to the station. "It was a legendary performance."

The extra credit went to Tanner because it was his seventh, and apparently last, spacewalk. He appeared reluctant to leave space at the end of the walk and spent some time looking out before entering the air lock.

The shuttle will leave the space station Sunday and prepare for a Wednesday landing. Before returning to Earth, however, the shuttle will circle the station and take the first full set of photos in several years. With the station's large new set of solar panels appearing as golden wings, NASA is expecting dramatic images.

Much of the work done Friday, and in the previous two Atlantis spacewalks, involved bolts and connectors that the astronauts had to open and close while wearing their bulky space gloves. Several bolts got stuck again, but none flew off into space, as two did in the other spacewalks. Fast-moving debris can harm spacecrafts, but NASA officials said they were certain that the missing bolts were far from the station.

NASA hopes to send 14 more shuttle missions to the station by 2010, at which point the agency hopes construction will be complete and the shuttles will be retired. Although Russian spacecraft travel regularly to the station, only the shuttles are large enough to carry some of the massive components needed to complete the station and its several research laboratories.

Congress Ducks (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0064460

By Editorial
The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

We know that you know that there is an entitlement problem. But the message hasn't reached Capitol Hill.

THERE'S NO great mystery about how to address Medicare's financial crisis. Either you contain the rate at which the program's costs rise, or you raise more money to pay for it. The federal office that runs the health program for seniors recently announced progress of each sort. Unfortunately, Congress may undo both.

The first announcement was that spending on doctors is rising more slowly than in the past. But the announcement assumed that Congress will follow through on its promise to cut Medicare payments to doctors by 5 percent next year. Congress made that promise after two consecutive years of failing to follow through on similar ones. Lawmakers show every sign of reneging again, and they may even award doctors an increase -- in which case part of the apparent progress in protecting Medicare's finances by containing medical inflation will turn out to be illusory.

The second announcement was that the richest 4 percent or so of retirees will face steep increases in Medicare premiums. Until now, all patients have paid a premium equal to 25 percent of the value of the benefits that the average retiree receives. In the future, the most affluent will pay more, though they will still be paying less in premiums than they take out in benefits. This modest reform, which won't affect the premiums 96 percent of retirees pay, is expected to raise an extra $20 billion for Medicare over the next decade. That's a fraction of the program's long-term funding shortfall, but it's still worth having.

That's not the way some Democrats see it, however. Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.) is pushing a bill that would repeal the higher premiums, arguing that rich retirees should not be hit with increases because they have already contributed generously to Medicare via higher taxes. This is like arguing that the tax code is in danger of becoming too progressive -- a strange position for a Democrat. Ms. Lowey also worries that premium hikes may be extended to a broader swath of retirees, perhaps even to those with incomes of $30,000 or $40,000. That might raise harder questions. But we are not there yet, and it's worth remembering that retirees with that sort of income still are among the richest third of Medicare beneficiaries.

The entitlement programs are not going to be fixed without some hard decisions. If Democrats oppose modest changes that hit only the rich, how will they find the courage to support far-reaching reforms?

Consumer Prices Up 0.2 Percent In August (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger
AP, September 16, 2006

Inflation slowed last month as Americans finally got a break at the gas pump, lifting consumers' spirits and easing fears the country could stumble into recession.

The Labor Department reported Friday that consumer prices rose just 0.2 percent in August, half the gain in July. With oil prices falling in September, economists predicted more good news ahead on inflation.

That should bolster consumer spending and make a recession much less likely.

The recent drop in gasoline — which had surged above $3 per gallon in early August and is now down to $2.62 nationwide — is helping to lift consumer confidence.

The RBC Cash Index, from the Ipsos international polling firm, showed confidence soared to a seven-month high of 93.7 in early September after a sharp fall in August. A separate consumer survey by the University of Michigan also showed confidence rising.

Analysts said the readings offered hope for a rebound in consumer spending, which slowed dramatically in the spring.

"The decline in energy prices is just the right boost at the right time," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com. "This should ensure that spending remains sturdy enough to keep the expansion intact."

Wall Street liked the inflation report. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 33.38 points to close at 11,560.77, just 162.21 points shy of its all-time closing high set in January 2000.

Consumers account for two-thirds of total economic activity. They have been under pressure from soaring energy prices, rising interest rates and a weakening housing market.

The spending slowdown in the spring cut overall economic growth to a 2.9 percent pace, down from a sizzling 5.6 percent rate in the first three months of the year. Zandi predicted that economic growth will average about 2.5 percent for the last half of this year.

DOJ_NMG_0064461

With inflationary pressures easing, analysts said Federal Reserve policymakers are likely to keep interest rates unchanged — at their next meeting, Wednesday, and for the rest of 2006. The belief is that the Fed's 17 increases over the past two years have slowed economic growth enough to restrain inflation.

"Healthy growth and diminishing inflation — it's a soft landing in progress," said Bernard Baumohl, chief economist at the Economic Outlook Group, another private forecasting firm.

Not all the economic news on Friday was positive. The Fed reported that output at factories, mines and utilities dropped by 0.1 percent in August, the first setback in seven months.

Several factors contributed, including a drop in utility production that reflected the end of a summer heat wave and a fall in oil production related to the troubles with the Prudhoe Bay pipeline in Alaska.

While manufacturing production was flat in August, analysts looked for gains in coming months, reflecting in part a rebound in consumer demand.

The slowdown in inflation did not help workers' average weekly earnings, which dropped by 0.5 percent in August, after adjustment for inflation, when compared with July.

President Bush said Friday he expected the economy's performance would persuade voters to keep Republicans in control of the House and Senate in the November congressional elections.

"I don't believe the Democrats are going to take over because our record on the economy is strong," Bush said, asserting his tax cuts had helped the country withstand a recession, terrorist attacks and last year's hurricanes.

"I certainly hope this election is based upon economic performance," Bush said during a Rose Garden news conference.

The Labor Department report on the Consumer Price Index showed that core inflation, which excludes the volatile energy and food sectors, rose a moderate 0.2 percent in August, the same as the increase in overall inflation.

After hitting a record closing high above $77 per barrel in mid-July, crude oil prices have fallen by nearly 20 percent, helping to moderate prices for gasoline and other energy products.

For August, the 0.3 percent rise in overall energy costs reflected a tiny 0.2 percent increase in gasoline prices. Food prices were up 0.3 percent.

Outside of food and energy, clothing prices, which had fallen sharply in July, rebounded by 0.9 percent in August, reflecting higher prices for the fall and winter clothing lines.

Airline fares, which had been rising sharply because of fuel costs, fell by 1.9 percent, the biggest drop since last December.

Price Index Moderated In August (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

What a difference a few weeks make.

A month ago the economy seemed to be in dire straits — wedged in by the inflationary pressures of soaring energy prices and rising labor costs while threatened by the prospect that the weak housing market would decimate consumer spending.

But yesterday, the government reported that consumer prices rose only 0.2 percent in August, pushing annual inflation to 3.8 percent, the lowest since April. Meanwhile, retail sales rose by a respectable rate of 0.2 percent in August. And in September, consumers' confidence about the future increased sharply.

The changes largely reflected declining gasoline prices, which not only dragged down inflation but also left consumers with more money.

The data suggests pricing pressures may have peaked. To many economists, this means that the Federal Reserve will probably maintain its benchmark interest rate at 5.25 percent at the meeting of its rate-setting committee next week.

"The economy appears to be leveling off," said Jack Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank in Chicago. "My sense is that we will dodge the bullet regarding inflation."

There are potential pitfalls on the horizon. A steeper decline in housing prices could slam the brakes on consumer spending and curtail economic growth.

But, so far, while the pace of consumer spending has slowed, it is by no means plummeting.

"Supply and demand are more balanced now," said Steven Wieting, an economist at Citigroup.

For months, the economy has been poised between competing forces pulling in different directions.

The economy has slackened, slowed by higher interest rates and a weakening housing market. Yet despite slower growth, energy prices continued to push inflation higher. Wages, which have inched up consistently over the last year, have threatened to put additional pressure on prices.

DOJ_NMG_0064462

Indeed, the index of core prices, the gauge most closely watched by the Fed, which excludes the unstable prices of food and energy to provide an indication of underlying inflation, rose 2.8 percent in August compared with the year before, the fastest annual pace since November 2001.

The economic tug of war left the Fed and its chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, in a tight spot. Having increased interest rates by 0.25 percent at each of 17 consecutive meetings since June 2004, the Fed decided last month against tightening monetary policy more.

But with core price inflation still way above Mr. Bernanke's stated "comfort zone" of 1 to 2 percent, many economists said they were worried that the Fed had stopped too soon.

If the 1 to 2 percent range "is a credible forecast, the Fed has to do something about it," said Allan H. Meltzer, a professor of political economy and public policy at Carnegie Mellon University. "We are certainly not moving towards 1 to 2 percent inflation."

Jeffrey M. Lacker, governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Virginia, took the unusual step of dissenting, voting against the decision to stop increasing rates at the Fed meeting last month.

The more benign inflation figures in August appear to support the Fed's stance. Mr. Wieting said energy prices in the price index should also fall steeply in September. That is because the August data referred to prices midmonth and thus missed most of the recent fall in the price of gas, which declined by 30 cents a gallon, to $2.67, from Aug. 21 to Sept. 11.

Falling gasoline prices are also affecting inflation expectations. According to the University of Michigan's preliminary reading of consumer sentiment, reported yesterday, expectations of inflation one year ahead declined to 3.1 percent from 3.8 percent a month ago.

Core prices are not likely to follow energy prices down immediately. But they have been moderating. August was the second consecutive month in which core prices rose 0.2 percent, following three months of 0.3 percent inflation. And some prices that have perked up recently will probably abate. For instance, rising clothes prices, which also bolstered core inflation, are mostly a result of the arrival of more expensive fall fashions.

Rents have also played a big role pushing up prices. The National Association of Realtors expects apartment rents in urban complexes to rise 4.8 percent this year, up from 2.9 percent in 2005. The shelter component in the Consumer Price Index, which makes up more than 40 percent of the core, rose 0.2 percent in August, pushed mostly by higher rents.

Some economists argue, however, that rents should moderate eventually, because many condos that were built during the housing boom are now sitting unsold and will probably be converted into rental units.

And the moderating viewpoint is consistent with other data. Industrial production declined by 0.1 percent in August, according to another government report. Slowing output should ease inflation pressures.

"One of the components of inflation has been commodity prices across the board, from energy to metals," said Thomas J. Duesterberg, president and chief executive of the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI. "We are starting to see some moderation in these prices. That's consistent with the moderation of industrial demand."

The economic outlook could yet become bleaker. People who bought their homes using adjustable-rate mortgages to keep their monthly payments low are starting to see higher mortgage bills. Some are falling behind on their payments.

And many economists suspect that home prices are still likely to fall more steeply. This could decimate residential construction. And it could impair American consumers' ability to borrow and, therefore, to spend.

"There's a storm building there," said Dean Baker, co-director of the Center for Economic Policy Research in Washington.

But if so, it is further away on the horizon.

U.S. Economy: Price Gains Slow, Backing Bernanke View (Update3) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 16, 2006

By Joe Richter

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Prices paid by U.S. consumers rose in August at half the pace of the previous month, supporting Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's view that inflation will moderate.

The consumer price index rose 0.2 percent following July's 0.4 percent increase, the Labor Department said today in Washington. Excluding food and energy costs, so-called core prices climbed 0.2 percent for a second month. A report from the University of Michigan showed Americans were more optimistic about the outlook for inflation and the economy as gasoline prices dropped.

Stocks advanced as traders speculated the Fed, whose policy makers meet next week, won't resume lifting interest rates after 17 consecutive increases through June. The central bank, which has been criticized for being complacent about inflation, is forecasting price pressures will ease over the next two years.

DOJ_NMG_0064463

``Inflation is starting to turn," said Scott Anderson, senior economist at Wells Fargo & Co. in Minneapolis. ``The core may remain stubbornly high for the rest of the year, so while inflation may have peaked, we're going to stay at elevated levels and the Fed will have to keep its eye on the ball."

Consumer prices rose 3.8 percent during the 12 months ended in August compared with 4.1 percent in the period ended in July. Core prices rose 2.8 percent from a year earlier, the biggest 12-month jump since November 2001.

`Good News'

The numbers were ``not as favorable as some would like, but they showed the CPI numbers down, and that's good news," Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig told an audience of bankers in Copper Mountain, Colorado. ``How we balance those will be, I think, an important part of the discussion that goes forward."

Separate figures from the Fed showed industrial production unexpectedly dropped 0.1 percent in August, compared with a gain of 0.4 percent the previous month. The proportion of industrial capacity in use declined to 82.4 percent from 82.7 percent the month before.

``I'm not quite ruling out one more rate increase in either the October or the December meeting" of Fed officials, said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group in Pittsburgh. ``We're close to the end, if not at the end."

Bernanke and Fed policy makers may be reducing borrowing costs by next summer, said Hoffman.

People surveyed by the University of Michigan this month said they expect an inflation rate of 3.1 percent in one year, compared with 3.8 percent in the August survey. The school's index of consumer confidence advanced to 84.4, from 82 in August.

`Fits and Starts'

``Consumer sentiment has improved mainly as a result of lower gas prices," said Chris Rupkey, senior financial economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi UFJ Ltd. in New York. ``The recovery in sentiment should lead to a gradual increase in the pace of economic growth, though it's going to come in fits and starts."

The gain in the August consumer price index matched the median of 80 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey. Estimates ranged from no change to 0.5 percent. Core CPI was also projected to increase 0.2 percent.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note was unchanged at 4.79 percent as of 5:02 p.m. in New York.

The consumer price index is the government's broadest gauge of costs for goods and services. Almost 60 percent of the CPI covers prices consumers pay for services, ranging from medical visits to airline fares and movie tickets.

So Far This Year

So far this year, consumer prices are rising at a 4.6 percent rate, compared with 3.9 percent in the first eight months of 2005. Core prices are rising at a 3 percent rate, after a 2 percent pace during the same period last year.

Energy prices rose 0.3 percent in August after jumping 2.9 percent a month earlier. Gasoline prices rose 0.2 percent after rising 5.3 percent in July.

Food prices, which account for about a fifth of the CPI, rose 0.4 percent in August after rising 0.2 percent the month before.

Housing costs, which include some energy costs and account for one-third of the index, rose 0.2 percent after rising 0.3 percent. A category designed to track rental prices rose 0.3 percent after rising 0.4 percent. Airfares fell 1.9 percent last month, the biggest drop since December.

Accommodation Costs

Rising rents, which account for almost 40 percent of the core CPI, have been contributing to inflation as less affordable home prices make renting more attractive.

The cost of medical care rose 0.4 percent, following a 0.2 percent increase in July.

Today's report puts the three-month annual rate of consumer price increases at 3.6 percent.

Retail gasoline prices fell to an average of $2.85 a gallon by the end of August, from $2.95 for all of July, according to U.S. Department of Energy figures. Gasoline fell to an average of $2.62 a gallon in the week ended Sept. 11. Crude oil prices declined and concerns over gasoline supplies eased with the end of the U.S. summer driving season.

Signs of a cooling economy that may help stem inflation pressures kept the Fed from raising rates last month for the first time in two years. The Fed's next policy-setting meeting is set for Sept. 20, and economists surveyed by Bloomberg News expect central bankers to leave the overnight lending rate at 5.25 percent.

Growth Forecast

The economy will expand at an annual rate of 2.6 percent in the final three months of 2006, down from an average of 4.3 percent in the first half, according to the median forecast of 81 economists surveyed Sept. 1 through Sept. 7.

Cathy Minehan, president of the Fed's Boston district bank, told a National Association for Business Economics meeting in Boston this week that her bank ``sees inflation subsiding slowly, assuming no further geopolitical or other shocks to oil prices."

DOJ_NMG_0064464

Still, Minehan said the Fed will stay ``quite vigilant'' against inflation, and economists said there is reason for concern that inflation pressures may persist.

Coca-Cola Co. said this month it's raising prices on Minute Maid Premium and Simply Orange juices for the third time in a year because of higher costs for oranges and orange concentrate. Prices will increase 3 percent to 6 percent in October, Coca-Cola said today in a statement. Before 2006, the Atlanta-based company hadn't raised orange juice prices in about five years.

Some economists said rising wages also pose an inflation risk after labor costs rose during the first half by the most in six years. During August, real average weekly earnings fell 0.5 percent after being little changed in July, a separate report from the Labor Department showed today.

Measure Favored by Fed

The Commerce Department said in an Aug. 30 report that the government's personal consumption expenditures index excluding food and energy, an inflation measure favored by Fed policy makers, rose at a 2.8 percent annual rate in the second quarter after a 2.1 percent rise the previous quarter.

The figure is above the comfort zone of policy makers who have specified a numeric inflation goal, including Bernanke.

San Francisco Fed Bank President Janet Yellen last week defended the central bank's pause, and said inflation may recede ``faster than many forecasters expect.''

Tame Consumer-Price Report Points To End Of Rate Increases (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

A tame reading on consumer prices lifted financial markets Friday amid hopes that waning inflation would allow the Federal Reserve to end its long march toward higher interest rates. The benign inflation figure, though, was largely the result of a small and anomalous statistical adjustment.

Easing fuel prices helped slow the increase in the Labor Department's consumer-price index to 0.2% in August from July, compared with 0.4% in July from June. The index, which measures inflation at the retail level, stood 3.8% above its year-earlier level, down from 4.1% in July. Core prices excluding food and energy, a measure watched closely by investors and the Fed, also rose 0.2% in August. Core prices were 2.8% higher than a year earlier, up from 2.7% in July.

ECONOMISTS REACT

The August CPI report is unlikely to get the Fed revved up when policy makers meet next week. Read a handful of economists' reactions1.

The core-inflation figure cheered financial markets, because it suggested that a string of higher readings earlier this year may have come to an end. Before rounding, though, the core price index rose 0.242%, not far off a 0.3% rise that would have been more likely to stoke inflation worries.

The main factor holding the core down: A seasonal adjustment that shaved one-tenth of a percentage point off the August increase in owners' equivalent rent, a proxy for the cost of housing that makes up almost a third of the index.

"We just squeaked by," said David Glocke, a bond portfolio manager at Vanguard Group in Valley Forge, Pa.

Patrick Jackman, an economist at the Labor Department, said the adjustment was an anomaly that had little to do with the underlying trend in rents, which have played the leading role in pushing up core inflation over the last several months. "While that had a dramatic impact on the actual number, as far as trends are concerned I certainly wouldn't make a big deal out of it," he said.

Nonetheless, investors concluded that the consumer-price report would calm Fed officials' inflation concerns and make them slightly less likely to raise interest rates from the current 5.25% at their next policy-making meeting Wednesday. Stock and bond prices rose immediately after the report, while futures markets lowered the probability of a quarter-point rate increase next week to 11% from 16%.

"The Federal Reserve is in pause mode right now," said Mr. Glocke. "I don't think there was anything that came out in the inflation report that would cause them to shift from that perspective." Last month, the Fed interrupted a string of 17 straight interest-rate increases in the hopes that a decelerating economy, together with stable energy prices, would relieve inflationary pressures.

Separate reports on industrial production and consumer sentiment Friday offered signs of a slowing economy and improving inflation expectations. The Fed reported that industrial production declined 0.1% in August as cooler weather precipitated a 0.8% decline in utility output. In a University of Michigan poll, consumers' estimate of long-term inflation fell to 2.9% in September from 3.2% in August -- a display of faith in the Fed's ability to keep prices under control. That confidence has been reflected in the market for inflation-protected Treasury bonds, where the implied 10-year inflation rate stood at 2.40% yesterday, down from about 2.60% at the end of July.

Still, many economists see reason to believe year-on-year core inflation could exceed 3% by the end of the year, testing the patience of consumers and investors alike. "It's really going to depend on whether or not the bond market has the intestinal fortitude to see core inflation going up while the Fed stays on the sidelines," said Steve East, an economist at investment bank Friedman Billings Ramsey. "It takes some degree of faith that the inflation numbers are going to peak and then come down."

The persistent rise in rents presents the main reason for concern. Over the past six months, tenants' rent and owners' equivalent rent have risen at annualized rates of 4.4% and 5%, respectively, well above other elements of the core index.

That trend is likely to stay in the system for a while: The high cost of buying a home is still sending people into the rental market, pushing down vacancy rates and giving landlords ample power to keep raising rents. Tom Toomey, chief executive of Denver-based United Dominion Realty Trust, which owns about 75,000 apartments across the country, says he has seen robust rental demand that has allowed him to raise some rents by more than 10% from last year's level.

"It's very unusual to see this much strength across the country in so many markets," he says.

U.S. Stocks Rally As Inflation Slows; S&P 500 Nears 5-Year High (BLOOM)

By Nick Baker

Bloomberg, September 16, 2006

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks rallied on signs of slowing inflation, pushing the Standard & Poor's 500 Index within half a percent of a five-year high and completing the market's best week in a month.

Microsoft Corp., the world's biggest software maker, jumped to its highest level since April after an analyst said its Vista operating system might go on sale earlier than forecast. United Technologies Corp., maker of Pratt & Whitney jet-engines and Carrier air conditioners, led the Dow Jones Industrial Average higher after increasing its stock buyback to $2 billion.

Consumer prices rose in August by half the pace of the previous month, a government report said, reducing the chances the Federal Reserve will resume raising interest rates. The gains put the Dow average within 163 points of a record close set in January 2000.

``Inflation appears to be decelerating," said Alan Gayle, who helps manage $70 billion as senior investment strategist at Trusco Capital Management in Richmond, Virginia. ``Some of the risks that have been in the market are gradually clearing away. We view this as encouraging."

The S&P 500 added 3.59, or 0.3 percent, to 1319.87. On May 5, the index reached 1325.76, the highest since February 2001. Losses in auto shares kept the market from advancing further as Ford Motor Co. delayed its North American profit goal by a year.

The Dow average climbed 33.38, or 0.3 percent, to 11,560.77. It set a record of 11,722.98 on Jan. 14, 2000. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 6.86, or 0.3 percent, to 2235.59. Volume surged because of the quarterly expiration of futures and options, known as quadruple witching.

Weekly Gains

Stocks climbed this week as oil prices tumbled and investors became more convinced the Fed is in no hurry to increase the benchmark rate.

The S&P 500 added 1.6 percent and the Dow average advanced 1.5 percent from Sept. 8, while the Nasdaq climbed 3.2 percent. For the S&P 500 and Nasdaq, it marked the biggest gain since the week ended Aug. 18.

Prices paid by U.S. consumers rose 0.2 percent in August following July's 0.4 percent increase, the Labor Department said. Excluding food and energy costs, so-called core prices rose 0.2 percent after a 0.2 percent gain the previous month. Both readings matched the median forecast of economists surveyed by Bloomberg News.

Consumer confidence rose more than expected this month. The University of Michigan said its index of sentiment increased to 84.4 from 82. Economists expected a reading of 84.

`Good News'

Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig said in a speech that today's inflation numbers are ``good news" and the Fed's past rate increases are ``still playing out" in the economy.

``If inflation is no longer a concern, the outlook for the consumer is bright," said Philip Tasho, who helps manage $450 million as chief investment officer at Tamro Capital Partners LLC. ``The markets may rally further if we see some positive signs that consumer sentiment is changing."

Policy makers last month kept the benchmark rate unchanged at 5.25 percent after raising it 17 times over two years to contain inflation. The Fed announces its next decision on rates on Sept. 20.

DOJ_NMG_0064466

Microsoft jumped 52 cents, or 2 percent, to $26.85 for the third-biggest advance in the Dow. The shares may reach $33 in the next 12 months, up from a prior forecast of $30, Goldman, Sachs & Co. analyst Rick Sherlund wrote in a note. Microsoft's Windows Vista operating system may go on sale earlier than previously expected, he said.

United Technologies

United Technologies added $1.61, or 2.6 percent, to $64.61 for the best performance in the Dow average. The company had previously said it would buy as much as $1.5 billion in stock this year. ``The business environment remains very good around the world," said Chief Executive Officer George David.

Adobe Systems Inc., the world's No. 1 maker of graphic- design software, rose $3.35 to $37. The stock's 10 percent jump was the largest in the S&P 500. Profit this quarter will be as much as 34 cents a share on sales of up to $685 million. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect, on average, 32 cents in profit and revenue of $668.8 million.

About seven stocks rose for every five that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 2.19 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, the most since June 30.

The surge in volume reflected trading tied to the expiration of stock-index futures, single-stock futures, index options and options on individual stocks.

Homebuilders

Homebuilders jumped as investors bet the Fed won't push interest rates higher and cool the economy further. A gauge of builders in S&P indexes added 2.4 percent, bringing its weekly advance to 10 percent, the most since October 2003.

Pulte Homes Inc., the No. 1 U.S. homebuilder by stock-market value, added 70 cents to $31.97. D.R. Horton Inc., No. 2 in the U.S., gained 35 cents to $24.34.

Ford Motor Co. slid $1.07, or 12 percent, to $8.02 for the biggest plunge since December 2002. The No. 2 U.S. automaker, responding to a $1.44 billion first-half loss, accelerated job cuts and plant closings and projected that its North American auto business would remain unprofitable until at least 2009. Trading in Ford totaled 190.5 million shares, the most ever.

DaimlerChrysler AG tumbled $3.54 to $49.36. The world's fifth-largest carmaker cut its full-year profit forecast, citing a loss at Chrysler in the third quarter.

General Motors Corp., the No. 1 automaker, retreated $1.30, or 3.9 percent, to $31.66. It had the top decline in the Dow average.

Dynegy, Exelon

Dynegy Inc. added 31 cents to $6.07. The energy company agreed to buy LS Power Group's generating plants for $2.3 billion to create the third-largest independent U.S. electricity producer.

Exelon Corp. jumped $1.44 to $59.21. The company abandoned its $17.8 billion purchase of New Jersey's Public Service Enterprise Group because of an impasse with state regulators over the plan to create the largest U.S. utility company. Public Service fell $4.15 to $62.

Starbucks Corp. rose 82 cents to $33.85. The world's largest coffee-shop chain agreed to buy 40 stores from Diedrich Coffee Inc. for $13.5 million to expand in California and Oregon.

Adobe Systems Inc. (ADBE US) D.R. Horton Inc. (DHI US) DaimlerChrysler AG (DCX US) Dynegy Inc. (DYN US) Exelon Corp. (EXC US) Ford Motor Co. (F US) General Motors Corp. (GM US) Microsoft Corp. (MSFT US) Pulte Homes Inc. (PHM US) Starbucks Corp. (SBUX US) United Technologies Corp. (UTX US)

Inflation Data Bode Well For Economy (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

With the recent slide in energy prices, experts are forecasting moderate growth.

A report Friday showing tame consumer inflation, coming amid falling energy prices, raised hopes that the economy may be entering a "soft landing" of moderate growth without recession.

If that happens, it could be because of consumers like Ellen MacArthur.

She and her husband, David, cut back on running errands in their suburban South Florida community when gasoline prices shot up earlier this year. But as pump prices dropped in recent weeks, MacArthur started running weekend errands again, even stopping for lunch along the way. And she notices she's not alone.

"There are much more people out there now," MacArthur, 44, said. "During the week, even at night, you pass by restaurants and there was a time they would seem kind of empty. And they're full now."

Economists say the recent drop in oil prices has the potential to boost consumer spending, giving the economy a lift and at least partly offsetting the negative effect of a weakening housing market.

Energy prices rose just 0.3% in August, down sharply from a 2.9% boost in July, the Labor Department reported Friday as part of an overall report that showed the consumer price index rising 0.2% in August versus 0.4% in July. The subdued overall inflation was helped by slower price rises for energy, transportation, recreation and housing.

The core consumer price index, which excludes volatile energy and food prices, rose 0.2%, the same increase as in July but down from 0.3% increases in the previous four months.

Overall consumer prices rose 3.8% in the 12 months ended in August, down from 4.1% for the July period. Core prices rose 2.8% in the last 12 months, compared with 2.7% for the 12 months ended July.

The average retail price of regular gasoline fell from $3.04 a gallon Aug. 7 to $2.62 a gallon Sept. 11 and is expected to average $2.55 a gallon by January, according to a report Tuesday by the Energy Information Administration. Natural gas prices are lower this year compared with last year and are expected to remain lower this winter.

Analysts say the possibility that inflation may be peaking suggests that the Federal Reserve's campaign to raise interest rates could be succeeding. The Fed paused last month after raising rates 17 consecutive times in two years. Fed watchers predict that the central bank will hold off on raising rates at its meeting Wednesday.

"All of these numbers seem to be falling right in with the Fed's tightening path," said Michael Englund, principal director of Action Economics in Boulder, Colo.

Consumer sentiment has been buoyed by falling pump prices, said T.J. Marta, a strategist with RBC Capital Markets in New York. RBC said Friday that its index of consumer confidence rose to 93.7 this week from 74.8 in August. The University of Michigan said Friday that its index of consumer sentiment rose by 2.9% in September, the first increase in two months. It included a 13.4% monthly gain in consumers' expectations of future economic activity.

"Falling gas prices have a profound effect on consumer psychology," said University of Maryland economist Peter Morici. "Everyone knows how important oil is and it's the one statistic that is continually before their eyes. Men don't buy clothes once a week and not everyone buys food once a week. But it's a communal thing: Almost everyone buys gas."

Kevin Sugarman, 27, commutes in his pickup truck 98 miles a day from San Jose to his job at a public relations firm in Alameda, Calif. With lower gasoline prices, he started taking his second car — a Toyota sports utility vehicle — out for weekend spins to the beach, ballparks and Bay Area restaurants.

"It doesn't seem that huge, but when you're driving that much it matters," he said of the price change.

As consumer spending increases, Morici predicts that economic growth will pick up in coming months from an annualized rate of 2.9% in the second quarter to 3.1% for the rest of this year and 3.4% next year. "We're accomplishing a soft landing. Today's inflation numbers are really great news and we're going to continue to see good numbers in September and October," Morici said.

Marta, the RBC strategist, was less optimistic. Given the weak housing market, particularly in regional markets such as California, it's "a close call." He predicts annualized growth of 2.3% for the rest of the year and 2.5% to 2.7% next year.

"I think the consumer has benefited from the lower oil prices during the past few weeks, but we're near the bottom of the range for gas and oil" prices, Marta said.

Also, wage growth appears to be mixed, making it uncertain how much it will boost consumers' spirits. Inflation-adjusted hourly earnings fell in August and were flat over the last 12 months, but average weekly earnings, adjusted for inflation, were up 0.3% in August, the Labor Department said Friday.

Businesses, once reeling from higher fuel prices, are also finally reaping some savings. But another report Friday showing that industrial output fell unexpectedly by 0.1% last month, the first decline since January, suggested businesses are still cautious.

Stevens Manufacturing Co. in Milford, Conn., expects to save on delivery of its aircraft parts as well as on heating fuel costs as the fall chill begins.

Company President Stephen Fogler, 46, lives on the shore of nearby Long Island Sound and has noticed that as gas prices fell, more boaters showed up at the marina and at local stores.

As "people spend less putting gas into their cars, they spend more at the mall," he said.

Morristown Drivers' Service, a trucking company based in Morristown, Tenn., employs 173 drivers and plans to invest fuel savings back into the business, said Jerry Malone, vice president of safety and personnel.

But the decline in gas prices could also stretch trucking companies if retail orders pick up in anticipation of increased holiday spending, said Bob Costello, chief economist for the American Trucking Assns. The next few months are a busy freight season, and the long-haul, heavy-duty truck industry alone faces a national shortage of 20,000 drivers, Costello said.

"The key for us is how much they think consumers are going to spend," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0064468

Economist Englund said falling gas prices could jump start major purchases, especially autos, because new car prices fell 0.1% in August. Prices remained 1% higher than a year earlier.

Last year, David and Ellen MacArthur traded in their Ford SUV for a smaller Hyundai Santa Fe that gets about 11 more miles to a gallon.

Since gas prices started to fall this month, David MacArthur has noticed signs at local car dealerships advertising $5,000 to $10,000 markdowns on SUVs. He expects his neighbors in Port St. Lucie, Fla., to start buying soon.

"I think people are still waiting to see if gas will go down a lot," he said. "We've got hope."

Lower Oil Prices Drive Fall In US Inflation (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott In New York

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Inflation fell for the second month in a row in August, reducing pressure on the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates when it meets next week.

The consumer price index, a closely watched indicator of inflation, rose 0.2 per cent last month, in line with economists' predictions, after rising 0.4 per cent in July. On a year-on-year basis, CPI inflation is running at 3.8 per cent, down from 4.1 per cent in July.

The Fed has argued that a series of interest rate rises combined with slowing levels of economic growth have done enough to curb inflation, and consequently decided upon a pause in rate increases in August. Analysts said the slowing of inflation implied in the latest CPI report suggests the Fed is likely to keep rates on hold.

"This CPI data helps support the notion that the Fed will not need to raise rates further, and that inflation should decline further in coming months," said Rob Carnell, an analyst at ING Bank.

However, core inflation, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, is still rising - in August it nudged higher to reach 2.8 per cent year-on-year from 2.7 per cent in July. This remains above Fed chairman Ben Bernanke's preferred range of 1 to 2 per cent.

August and September have seen oil prices fall to their lowest levels since March, after reaching an all-time high in July. In August energy prices rose by just 0.3 per cent following a 2.9 jump the month before.

As such, some analysts saw the data as masking underlying inflation in the economy, and suggested that, in the longer term rates may start creeping up again.

"Core CPI ... is consistent with continued underlying inflation pressures and inflation running above a desirable pace for policymakers," said Alan Ruskin, international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

"This is not the kind of number that gets the Fed out the woods, it is just low enough to allow them to continue to play for time in assessing longer-term growth trends, notably in the housing market."

Air fares fell by 1.9 per cent for the second month in a row, helping to keep core inflation down.

Adding to inflationary pressure, rents rose faster than inflation, with owners' equivalent rent up 0.3 per cent, although the increase was smaller than in recent months and overall housing costs rose more slowly than in July. Prices of apparel rose by 1 per cent after falling in July.

US stocks opened sharply higher on the data, and benchmark 10-year Treasuries also rose, sending yields lower.

Wall St.'s Inconspicuous Rally Continues (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

It has been a stock market rally that dare not speak its own name.

With little fanfare — and with very few days of sharp upswings — stocks have been on one of their best runs so far this year. The Standard & Poor's 500 stock index is up 3.4 percent since July 31, to 1,319.87, just 6 points short of its five-year high in early May, and the Dow Jones industrial average is up 3.4 percent, to 11,560.77, 163 points from its record. Even the Nasdaq composite index, which was down for most of the summer, has turned up 7 percent since the end of July, to 2,235.59, and is now positive for the year. Yesterday, the Dow added 33.38 points, the S.&P. 500 was up 3.59 points and the Nasdaq gained 6.86 points.

Stocks have been buoyed by a significant decline in energy prices and a growing belief that the Federal Reserve will not raise interest rates again this year — an argument that won over more believers yesterday after a report on August consumer prices showed that inflation slowed. Crude oil futures are down 15 percent since July and national average retail gasoline prices have dropped to $2.73 a gallon, from a high of $3.10 at the start of August.

"Economic activity has been holding up pretty well and inflation pressures have eased," said Jeffrey N. Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Advisors.

Technology, retailing and consumer companies, which largely lagged the broader market in the first seven months of the year, have posted the biggest gains in the last seven weeks.

As rallies go, it has been very muted: Over the last seven weeks, the S.&P. climbed more than 1 percent or more and the Dow added more than 100 points on just two days.

The measured rise reflects a recognition by investors that the economy has slowed from the first quarter, when it roared at a 5.6 percent annual pace, but has not fallen into a slumber, said Alan Skrainka, chief market strategist for Edward Jones, a brokerage firm based in St. Louis.

Other analysts, however, caution that the concerns that sent the markets tumbling in May and June — rising inflation and interest rate increases by the Fed — have not completely dissipated. Inflation, while it has eased, is still running higher than the 2 percent annual level that policy makers are comfortable with.

Oil and gasoline prices could move higher again if another hurricane threatens oil production in the Gulf of Mexico, if tensions between Iran and the West reach another fevered pitch, or if the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries decides it has to support prices by cutting output. The economy could also sustain further damage if home sales and prices keep falling.

"If you believe that the housing market will slow down but not collapse and retail growth will still be in positive territory, then one ends up naturally thinking equities will do reasonably well," said Marc D. Stern, chief investment officer for Bessemer Trust, based in New York. But "if you are more skeptical of that, then I don't think the market looks very good right now."

A reason to be more hopeful, is that even amid the current rally, many investors remain bearish, said Bruce Bittles, chief investment strategist for Robert W. Baird & Company. He noted that demand for put options, a financial instrument used to protect against a drop in the price of stocks, had risen since the start of August. Surveys of market sentiment also indicate that many investors have as much as a third of their portfolios in cash, a high percentage.

When sentiment is this downbeat, stocks often move higher, Mr. Bittles and other analysts note. Conversely, when investors are very optimistic and have a large allocation of their portfolios in stocks, it signals that markets may be poised for a fall. "It's an oversimplification," Mr. Bittles acknowledged, "but it works."

Take Trusco Capital Management, a money management firm based in Atlanta. The firm has had a neutral view toward American stocks, because it believes that risks of higher inflation could prompt the Federal Reserve to raise its benchmark short-term rate, now at 5.25 percent, in the coming months, said Alan M. Gayle, the senior investment strategist and director of asset allocation. But he finds the recent data "encouraging."

Bond investors are indicating that they believe the Fed has inflation under control. Yields on the 10-year Treasury note, which move in the opposite direction from the price, have fallen to 4.79 percent from 4.98 percent at the end of July. When investors are worried about inflation, they demand higher returns for holding bonds.

As for oil prices, the size of the decline has surprised analysts. Crude oil futures touched a high of $77.03 a barrel in mid-July and closed yesterday at $63.24 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Gold prices, which have closely followed the rise in energy prices and are seen as a safe haven from inflation, have dropped 9 percent, to $577.50 an ounce, since July.

"It was well documented that there was plenty that could go wrong to push prices even higher" this summer, said Thomas Bentz, an oil broker at BNP Paribas in New York. But "we made it through the gasoline season without any major disruptions.''

"The hurricane season — I am afraid to say it fizzled out — but we certainly didn't see the number of hurricanes that were forecast."

The hurricane season ends in November, but with the exception of Ernesto, which hit southern Florida in August, it has not produced a significant storm, at least thus far. Another important factor is the flow of speculative money into and out of energy. Data on long and short interest from the Commodity and Futures Trading Commission shows that non-industry investors in oil futures turned bearish on crude oil futures at the start of August, just about when prices started dropping.

Oil Prices Up Despite Cut In OPEC Output (AP-Y)

AP, September 16, 2006

Oil prices edged higher Friday but finished lower for the week after OPEC lowered its oil-demand forecast for the rest of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0064470

Oil prices lost more than 4 percent for the week, and analysts said there has been a definite shift in energy-market psychology, as traders focus on the relatively comfortable balance between supply and demand as opposed to hypothetical supply threats.

However, Fimat USA analyst John Kilduff said in a research note that geopolitical uncertainty, which helped push prices to an all-time high of $78.40 in July, could eventually re-ignite energy markets.

"In the end, our bias still has to remain with the upside," said Kilduff. "It is only for the moment that psychology has shifted more to an economic track, and even there, we don't see the global economy breaking down, only a softening at the margins."

The Federal Reserve said Friday that the nation's industrial output unexpectedly fell by 0.1 percent in August, reflecting weakness in manufacturing and declines in mining and utility production. Analysts had been looking for a small increase.

Some worldwide economic softening was acknowledged on Friday by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, which said fourth-quarter demand for its oil would be 320,000 barrels a day lower than previously forecast, or 28.86 million barrels per day.

In 2007, OPEC expects demand for its crude to average 28.1 million barrels per day, or 800,000 barrels per day less than the 2006 average, in part because non-OPEC supplies are rising. As a result, some analysts believe the Vienna-based cartel, which is pumping close to 30 million barrels a day, may end up cutting its output by 1.5 million barrels a day or more.

"It looks for 2007 that OPEC revenues are going to be under pressure, from both price and volume," said Citigroup analyst Tim Evans.

After falling as low as $62.03 a barrel, light sweet crude for October settled at $63.33, a gain of 11 cents on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Still, oil prices remain about 20 percent below the July peak.

"It's been going straight down. We can't be surprised by a rally," said Man Financial broker Andrew Lebow.

Retail gasoline prices, now averaging $2.55 a gallon nationwide, have fallen about 15 percent in the past month and analysts say further declines are likely.

Nymex natural gas futures, which plunged 10 percent Thursday to a two-year low after government data revealed surging inventories, rebounded slightly. October natural gas rose 9 cents to settle at $4.982 per 1,000 cubic feet.

In other Nymex trading, gasoline futures rose by 2.28 cents to settle at $1.575 a gallon, while heating oil futures fell less than a penny to settle at $1.7023 a gallon.

Ford Cuts 10,000 Salaried Jobs, Delays Profit Target (Update10) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 16, 2006

By Bill Koenig and John Lippert

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Ford Motor Co., increasingly desperate to stem billion-dollar losses, accelerated job cuts and plant closings and projected that its North American auto business would remain unprofitable until at least 2009.

The second-largest U.S. automaker said it will shed an additional 10,000 salaried jobs, finish cutting 30,000 North American factory jobs by 2008, four years sooner than planned, and offer buyouts to all hourly workers. Ford suspended its quarterly dividend for the first time since 1982. The shares posted their biggest drop in almost four years in their highest trading volume ever.

The new cuts speed up steps announced by then-Chief Executive Officer William Clay Ford Jr. in January to ``retake the American roadway." They come on the heels of a surprise $1.44 billion first-half loss. Two weeks ago, Ford hired former Boeing Co. executive Alan Mulally, 61, to replace Bill Ford, architect of a previous failed restructuring in 2002.

``The market has changed so much and this company has lost so much market share that it needs radical surgery," said John Casesa, managing director with Casesa Strategic Advisors in New York. ``And that's what this announcement is: radical surgery."

Shares of Ford fell $1.07 to $8.02 at 4:03 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, nearly wiping out gains for the year. The 189 million shares traded was more than twice the previous peak set on April 26, according to Bloomberg data. Merrill Lynch changed its recommendation on Ford shares to ``sell" from ``neutral."

The 10,000 salaried job cuts come in addition to 4,000 posts eliminated before March 31. The combined totals mean Ford is slashing almost 40 percent of its salaried workforce -- from car designers to financial analysts to secretaries -- in North America.

Mulally's Review

The company will delay steps such as selling brands or other assets until Mulally has a chance to study such proposals, four people familiar with the strategy said last week. Executive Vice President Mark Schulz, who heads Ford's international operations, said today that Ford's money-losing Jaguar luxury car unit won't be sold.

DOJ_NMG_0064471

Ford's worldwide workforce shriveled 16 percent from 2002 through the end of last year. Its share price was $58.69 at the start of 1999, when Bill Ford became chairman, and has since declined 86 percent.

After Ford's announcement today, rival DaimlerChrysler AG cut its full-year profit forecast because of a projected 1.2 billion euro loss ($1.5 billion) at its U.S. Chrysler unit in the third quarter.

Losing Market Share

Ford, of Dearborn, Michigan, has lost U.S. market share every year since 1995 and today said the slide will continue. The company declared that its turnaround would be led by products, just as it did in 2002. More than 70 percent of Ford, Lincoln and Mercury vehicles will be new or ``significantly upgraded'' before 2009, Ford said.

Ford's 7.45 percent note due in 2031 fell 1.5 cents to 76.75 cents on the dollar, yielding 10 percent, according to Trace, the NASD's bond-price reporting service. The debt closed at 80.5 cents, its highest level in 2006, on Sept. 12.

The company is battling falling sales of F-Series pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles, the main sources of its auto profits. After losses in seven of the past eight quarters at the North American automotive unit, Ford is cutting second-half production by 16 percent.

The automaker today dropped a pledge made in January to earn a profit on its North American automotive operations in 2008. Instead, in recognition of the impact of its first-half losses, the company projects a profit in the region in 2009.

Internal forecasts say Ford's global automotive losses may double to more than $8 billion in 2006, four people familiar with the figures said this month.

New Products

To help convince investors that its lineup of future products is sufficient to boost market share, Ford will introduce a redesigned version of the Super Duty commercial pickup in the first quarter of 2007, plus an ``all-new'' F-150 pickup and new compact cars and sub-compacts in coming years.

``This plan is meant to turn our company around,'' Executive Vice President Mark Fields, chief of the North American auto unit, said in an interview. ``I think we have a very realistic plan with conservative assumptions.''

As its closes plants, Ford said it will maintain one shift at its St. Thomas, Ontario, plant to build the Lincoln Town Car.

Ford said its North American manufacturing capacity will be cut to 3.6 million cars and trucks by the end of 2008, a 26 percent decline from last year.

Deteriorating Fast

Management has ``concluded that Ford is deteriorating much faster than they had initially assumed, and that's wholesome'' said Eugene Jennings, a business professor emeritus at Michigan State University.

``The question now is whether they have the right management team to overcome the inertia that set in when Bill Ford was chief executive.''

Ford managers today said the company can fix North American operations without resorting to broader steps.

Bill Ford, in response to a question, said going private is ``not in our plans.'' He also said the company's sales ranking in the U.S. ``doesn't matter'' if the company's auto operations return to profitability.

Toyota Motor Corp.'s sales in the U.S. exceeded Ford's for the first time in July. Ford regained the No. 2 slot behind General Motors Corp. in August.

Chief Financial Officer Don Leclair said Ford management didn't decide until a board meeting yesterday that it would postpone the 2008 target of returning North American auto operations to profitability. Fields said that meeting the 2008 goal would have reduced investment in new cars and trucks.

Ford Credit

Leclair also said the company wasn't looking to sell a stake in Ford Motor Credit Co., which makes loans to buyers of Ford-produced cars and trucks.

``We have thought long and hard on this,'' Leclair said. ``We concluded the credit company is an integral part of the motor company.''

GM, also battling losses, earlier this year agreed to sell a 51 percent stake in General Motors Acceptance Corp. The automaker made the sale to raise cash and to improve credit ratings for GMAC, which are below investment grade.

The decision on Ford Credit was the ``single most disappointing aspect'' of today's announcement for bondholders, Pete Hastings, fixed-income analyst with Morgan Keegan Inc. in Memphis, Tennessee, said in an email. He said he expects the price of Ford bonds to fall.

Visteon Deadline

The company said the plants it took back from auto-parts maker Visteon Corp. last year will be sold or closed by the end of 2008. Ford originally took back 23 factories and offices from its former subsidiary. Two were made permanent parts of Ford's North American operations and the rest were to be sold or closed.

DOJ_NMG_0064472

This is the first time Ford has publicly set a target for disposing of those operations.

Ford said it will complete cutting as many as 30,000 manufacturing jobs by the end of 2008, moved up from the original 2012 target. The automaker estimated it will reduce its operating costs by about $5 billion a year by 2008.

Ford also has completed new work-rule agreements at 30 of its 42 North American plants. Such agreements affect the way Ford deploys factory workers. The automaker projects the new agreements will save $600 million annually.

More Plants Named

The company identified two more plants to be closed: a metal-stamping plant in Maumee, Ohio, and an engine plant in Essex, Ontario. That brings the total number of plants identified to nine.

Also, a Norfolk, Virginia, plant that makes the F-150 truck, originally set to close in 2008, will close one year earlier. That plant and a St. Paul, Minnesota, plant, scheduled to close in 2008, will be reduced to one shift from two.

The company's Dearborn Truck plant in Michigan will be expanded in 2007 to three shifts for F-150 production.

Ford said today that its U.S. market share will continue to fall, a sign that it has given up on Bill Ford's January goal of stemming the decline this year. Ford's U.S. brands -- Ford, Lincoln and Mercury -- captured 16.8 percent of the market this year through August. That figure will decline to ``the low-16 percent range'' by the end of this year and 14 to 15 percent ``going forward,'' a Ford statement said.

Discontinued Vehicles

The company said further declines are occurring because of vehicles it's discontinuing. Ford ceased production of the Monterey minivan, will stop making Taurus sedans later this year and the Freestar minivan in 2007.

Ford will concentrate on selling cars and trucks to individual buyers, where profits are higher.

Ford is using ``realistic business assumptions'' in making the market-share forecast, spokesman Oscar Suris said in an interview. He declined to say when the U.S. brands will reach the 14 to 15 percent level.

Ford was supposed to generate $7 billion in pretax profits this year under the restructuring plan announced in January 2002. The company withdrew the target last year because of North American losses.

January's ``Way Forward'' strategy called for completing the 30,000 factory-job cuts and plant closings by 2012. Until today, only half of the plants had been identified, and North American results have worsened.

Buyouts

Today's announcement came a day after Ford and the United Auto Workers union said more than 75,000 UAW members will receive buyout or early retirement offers.

One of the new buyout offers is for as much as $140,000 for employees aged 55 and over with at least 10 years of experience who agree to forgo health-care benefits, according to the union. Another of the eight options is a $35,000 payout to leave the company and maintain health benefits.

Ford has had ``targeted'' buyouts for union workers at specific U.S. plants, compared with the all-union-employees approach at Detroit-based General Motors Corp. About one in three GM workers, or 34,000 people, accepted the buyout, and GM said it would finish shedding the jobs two years ahead of schedule.

The UAW agreed to the buyouts and early retirements to avoid involuntary layoffs as Ford reduces the size of its workforce, said Bob King, director of the UAW's Ford department, in a statement distributed to union officials in Detroit.

Workers can apply for buyouts between Oct. 16 and Nov. 27, the UAW said. Workers at an Atlanta plant that closes later this year can apply from Sept. 19 through Oct. 2. Most employees who accept buyouts will depart between Jan. 1 and Sept. 1 of 2007.

No Dividend

Before eliminating the dividend today, Ford in July had cut its quarterly payout from 10 cents to five cents a share, its lowest since omitting payments in 1982 and 1983.

The perceived risk of owning Ford bonds rose 8.6 percent today, according to traders who bet on the creditworthiness of companies in the credit-default swap market. The annual cost of a five-year default swap based on Ford's bonds rose to $695,000, up from $640,000 yesterday, according to data compiled by Credit Suisse Group.

An increase in price indicates deterioration in the perception of credit quality; a decline suggests improvement.

Ford disappointed investors by failing to follow GM's lead in specifying which plants will close and when, and in not putting assets like Ford Motor Credit up for sale to pay for the UAW buyouts, said Sean McAlinden, an analyst at the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, Michigan.

``GM is moving along at 70 miles per hour, and Ford is now up to 25,'' McAlinden said. ``We'll probably see another restructuring announcement from Ford by the end of the year.''

New Ford Plan Fails To Ease Crisis (FT)

By Bernard Simon In Detroit And Ralph Atkins In Frankfurt

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

The crisis at Ford Motor deepened on Friday as its shares plunged following the release of a new restructuring plan that suspended the dividend and delayed its target for returning to profit in North America by a year.

Turmoil in the US auto market also hit DaimlerChrysler, the German-based carmaker, which warned that higher-than-expected losses at its Chrysler unit would slash about €1bn ($1.3bn) from forecast operating profits this year, sending its shares down 6 per cent.

Ford's latest version of its Way Forward plan – its third restructuring effort in five years – aims to shrink its North American workforce and speed up the launch of models.

But Ford stopped short of revealing plans to sell its Jaguar luxury division or its Ford Credit financing unit, and it acknowledged that its share of the US light vehicle market was likely to erode from 16 per cent to a range of 14-15 per cent. The company had a 25 per cent market share in the mid-1990s.

Ford shares closed 11.77 per cent lower in New York at $8.02 and the cost of buying protection against the risk of a future default by Ford duly rose in the credit derivatives market.

"Ford's plan lacks the scope in terms of asset sales and falls short of the critical level of strategic commitment to stabilising financials," said analysts at CreditSights in New York. "The market is not going to be happy with this plan."

The carmaker now aims to return North American operations to profitability by 2009, a year later than envisaged under January's Way Forward plan.

The latest cost-cutting measures include axing an additional 10,000 white-collar jobs and offering buy-outs to its entire US blue-collar workforce, as General Motors did earlier this year. The extra white-collar job cuts combined with 4,000 earlier this year will shrink the North American salaried workforce by about a third. Nine assembly and parts plants in the US and Canada will close by the end of 2008.

Bill Ford, executive chairman, said he was less concerned about the possibility of Toyota overtaking Ford in North America than the importance "for this plan to be based on what I consider to be conservative assumptions". He said his family, which owns about 4 per cent of the equity and controls 40 per cent of the votes, had no plans to take the carmaker private.

Alan Mulally, who took over as Ford's chief executive earlier this month, added that senior management was "not waiting for external factors to make it OK".

Ford Cuts 10,000 Jobs, Closes 2 Plants (AP-Y)

By Tom Krisher

AP, September 16, 2006

Ford took drastic steps on Friday to remold itself into a smaller, more competitive company, slashing thousands of jobs and shuttering two additional plants to cut costs and fend off a financial crisis.

The company announced it would cut 10,000 more white-collar positions in addition to offering buyout and early retirement packages to all of its 75,000 hourly employees. It also suspended its dividend.

Wall Street seemed unimpressed. Ford's shares slumped nearly 12 percent amid disappointment that the automaker didn't do more to address rising health and pension costs, falling market share and intense competition from Asian manufacturers whose models have enthralled buyers looking for gas-sipping cars and trucks.

The announcement came as Chrysler's parent said it would cut U.S. production through the end of 2006 and follows big cutbacks at General Motors earlier this year. The cuts can be traced to consumer demand shifting from trucks and sport utility vehicles to smaller, more fuel efficient cars and crossovers.

The blue-collar cuts at Ford, the second-biggest U.S. automaker, are another blow to organized labor, which has been losing members as the auto industry reshapes itself to battle lower-cost, nonunion rivals.

Ford Motor Co. said it would shutter a stamping plant in Maumee, Ohio, in 2008 and its Essex engine plant in Windsor, Ontario, in 2007.

It will also close an assembly plant in Norfolk, Va., in 2007, a year earlier than previously announced and will cut a shift in January. An assembly plant in St. Paul, Minn., which is scheduled to close in 2008, also will have a shift reduction in 2007.

The new cuts bring the total number of plant closures to 16, adding to the 14 plants announced in a previous restructuring plan. The company has identified nine plants to be closed through 2008, but Ford officials would not talk about which facilities would be shut down after that.

Ford said it would complete its cuts of about 30,000 hourly jobs by the end of the 2008, four years ahead of its previous target. The company said it had cut 4,000 salaried positions in the first quarter of this year.

The new cuts would reduce Ford's total North American work force by 29 percent, from the current level of about 130,000 to about 92,000 by the end of 2008. The salaried job cuts represent about a third of that work force.

Ford's method of slashing its labor force is similar to cuts made earlier this year by larger rival General Motors Corp. At GM, 34,410 hourly workers have accepted buyouts or early retirement offers, and the company cut 2,000 salaried workers.

Ford, GM and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler unit are struggling with the need to reduce their so-called "legacy costs" of big pay and benefits packages for workers and retirees.

DaimlerChrysler said Friday that its Chrysler division will make additional production cuts in the third and fourth quarters to reduce dealer inventories.

Ford said by 2008, its North American factory capacity will be 26 percent lower than to 2005 levels.

It said the plan would cut about $5 billion in operating costs, mainly by offering early retirement and buyout packages to all hourly workers and to white-collar employees. Ford plans to expand buyout and early retirement offers worth up to $140,000 to the company's U.S. hourly work force of more than 75,000 as part of the plan.

"The simple fact is that the business model that served us in North America for decades no longer works," Mark Fields, Ford's president of the Americas, said during a morning teleconference.

Also during the teleconference, Executive Chairman Bill Ford said there were no plans for the Ford family to buy back stock and take the company private.

Todd Wiech, a 46-year-old Ford worker in St. Paul, Minn., said it would be hard to leave the company where he's worked for 18 years, but he's weighing options that include a buyout, returning to school or transferring to another Ford plant.

"Myself — people that were hired in 1988 — it hits us pretty hard because we've got a lot of time invested with Ford and we're getting a little older to go out looking," said Wiech.

At a plant in Dearborn, carpenter Brent Orr, a 12-year veteran, said he probably would take a buyout offer.

"For me, I'm a skilled trade. So I can probably go out and get a job somewhere," Orr said. "It will probably be out of state. There isn't a lot of work right now in Michigan."

Ford said that by the end of 2008 it would close or sell all facilities that it took back as part of a bailout of Visteon Corp., a supplier that was spun off from the automaker.

The company also said it expects to achieve full-year profitability in its North American automotive operations no earlier than 2009. The company had previously pledged to make money in North America in 2008.

It also plans to suspend the quarterly dividend on its common and Class B stock in the fourth quarter of this year.

Some Wall Street analysts said the plan did not go far enough.

"We had hoped Ford would close additional assembly plants and make remaining ones highly more flexible, announce the exit-sale of several brands" and take other steps, said Ron Tadross, analyst for Bank of America.

Merrill Lynch analyst John Murphy downgraded the company's stock from neutral to sell and said the plan focuses on buyouts and doesn't address other issues.

"It does not materially accelerate product introductions. It does not provide a solution for the troubled facilities assumed from Visteon. It does not cut capacity deeper. It's missing a lot," he said. Visteon is Ford's former parts unit.

But Morgan Stanley maintained its equal-weight rating.

"While we are pleased to see greater cost reduction and more acknowledgment of the reality/gravity of the situation, we remain concerned that current results are worse than we think," analyst Jonathan Steinmetz said in a note to investors.

Ford shares fell $1.07, or 11.8 percent, to close at $8.02 on the New York Stock Exchange. Its shares have traded in a 52-week range of $6.06 to $10.09.

The company lost $1.4 billion during the first half of this year.

In July, Ford pledged to accelerate its "Way Forward" restructuring plan, which when introduced in January called for up to 30,000 job cuts as well as closing 14 facilities by 2012.

The company indicated Friday that it is ready to accept a smaller slice of the market, focusing on profitable sales instead of volume. It said it expects its market share to slip to 14 percent to 15 percent, down from about 26 percent in the early 1990s.

Ford said it would get out of the minivan business. But it will add a new full-sized, seven-passenger crossover for sale in 2008, based on the Fairlane wagon concept. The Fairlane will be produced in Oakville, Ontario.

"The most important thing we do is to size our company and our capacity to the current demand and, on top of that, to continue to invest in the products and services — the cars and trucks — that the customers really, really want," Chief Executive Alan Mulally said. Mulally, who was named to the post last week, led a turnaround at the commercial jetmaking division of Boeing Co.

Ford also said it would roll out new or significantly upgraded cars and trucks in 70 percent of its Ford, Lincoln and Mercury brands, expanding in growing areas such as car-based crossovers. At the same time, Ford said it will try to maintain its lead in the truck segment by introducing a completely reworked F-150 that will go on sale in 2008.

Sharp Skid Ford And Chrysler Show Dark Outlook For U.S. Car Makers (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Mccracken, Stephen Power And Joseph B. White

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

Ford Will Drop Its Dividend, Cut More Salaried Jobs; Daimler Unit's Loss Grows A 'Black Friday' for Detroit

Bowing publicly to the powerful forces that are reshaping the American auto industry, Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group acknowledged that their strategies for outracing high gas prices, fickle consumer tastes and relentless global competition had hit the wall.

DaimlerChrysler, in a surprise announcement, said its Chrysler Group is on track to lose about $1.5 billion in the third quarter -- more than double prior forecasts. The company indicated it would slash production in the short term to cope with bloated inventories and take unspecified restructuring actions.

Ford, meanwhile, outlined plans to cut more jobs and speed up the pace of some cuts already planned. Over a three-year period that began this year, Ford now has plans to eliminate about 44,000 hourly and salaried jobs in North America, or some 40% of its work force. The newest element of the program is that Ford aims to cut about 14,000 salaried jobs, up from the previous goal of 4,000. Ford also said that in the fourth quarter it will stop paying its quarterly dividend.

Meanwhile, No. 1 auto maker General Motors Corp. has sharply improved its performance recently, following a $10.6 billion net loss in 2005, but at a high price. Its North American work force is less than half its size it a decade ago.

The twin Ford and Chrysler announcements, separated by just a few minutes Friday morning, added up to a Black Friday for Detroit. Taken together with GM's moves, the downsizings and management upheavals point to a new order in what remains one of the most important industries in the U.S. economy.

The concept of a U.S. Big Three -- GM, Ford and Chrysler -- is obsolete. Toyota Motor Corp. has pulled ahead of Chrysler by 200,000 vehicles in U.S. sales through August, and in July even outsold Ford.

Ford's financial outlook is particularly dire. It once promised to return its core North American auto business to profitability by 2008. Now it doesn't expect to do so before 2009.

Ford will burn through an astonishing $8.5 billion in cash this year. It began the year with $25.1 billion and will end the year with about $20 billion, a figure augmented by $3.4 billion Ford has taken out of a fund in which employers set aside money for retiree health-care costs.

Ford plans to give more guidance on its cash situation at its third-quarter conference call in October. Chief Financial Officer Don LeClair, a 30-year veteran, said this crisis is different than struggles in the early 1980s and early 1990s during national economic downturns. "This is something that not every auto company is going through. It's our issue," he said. "It's not something like 1980 where there is a severe recession.... It's more about us than it is the economy."

UAW Softens Attitude About Cuts In Detroit (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

The Ford Motor Co's latest round of cuts is another serious blow to organized labor, costing the United Auto Workers as many as 40,000 active members and millions of dollars in lost dues.

But after taking a highly aggressive approach for decades, the UAW is transforming into a less combative, more cooperative organization that may be willing to work closer with U.S. automakers than perhaps at any other time in its history, analysts say.

"I think the UAW has finally wakened up to the fact that the whole thing is likely to disappear if they don't start to cooperate a little bit," said John Wolkonowicz, an analyst with Global Insight, an automotive research and consulting firm. "In some ways they may be working together now."

Ford yesterday announced a new restructuring plan that includes cutting more than 10,000 additional salaried jobs, offering buyouts to all of its 75,000 U.S. hourly workers and shutting down two more plants than the 14 previously announced.

The plan, hammered out with cooperation from the union, was praised by UAW officials -- even though it would reduce Ford's North American work force by almost a third.

"Once again, our members are stepping up to make hard choices under difficult circumstances," UAW President Ron Gettelfinger said. "Now it's Ford Motor CO's responsibility to lead this company in a positive direction.

DOJ_NMG_0064476

Under the terms of the agreement, no UAW member will be forced to take a buyout -- a concession demanded by the union.

"We remain deeply concerned about Ford's loss of market share, and committed to working together" with Ford, said UAW Vice President Bob King, who directs the union's Ford Department. "Even with all the problems in the auto industry, UAW members at Ford will continue to have a voice in their own destiny."

The UAW has lost 900,000 members since the 1970s, and the potential loss of another 40,000 jobs could cost the union millions of dollars in membership dues.

The union collected about $206 million in 2004, down from about $214 million the previous year, said Martin Payson, a lawyer with the Jackson Lewis law firm, which represents management in labor disputes.

The UAW has realized it must soften its approach in an increasingly competitive and nonunion industry, said Charlie Hughes, former head of North American operations for Land Rover and Mazda.

"There was probably a time in the history of labor where that was helpful, but in a day and age where you have so much competition ... then both labor and management have to pull together," Mr. Hughes said.

He added he expects contract negotiations with the UAW and Ford, General Motors and DaimlerChrysler, which expire next year, to go smoother than previous negotiations.

Much of the union's change in attitude can be attributed to Mr. Gettelfinger, many analysts say.

"Ron Gettelfinger has brought a new enlightenment to the union -- he sees the handwriting on the wall," Mr. Wolkonowicz said. "His goal now maybe has shifted from getting as much as possible [from the automakers] to preserving as many jobs as possible."

Mr. Gettelfinger was re-elected as the union president when he ran unopposed in June.

The UAW has failed to attract membership at automotive plants established in the United States by Asian companies. And while their reluctance is due in part to an unwillingness to pay union dues, which can run $50 a week or more, it's not the only reason, analysts say.

"Workers want to be part of a winning team, and the more factions you have in the workplace, the more names and labels you put it, the more difficult it is to be a single team." Mr. Hughes said. "The [automakers] winning today have a lot of focus, and that focus has to run through the whole organization."

Some say the union's less-harsh stance may come too late to save it from irrelevance.

"You're going to see the UAW as an entity engaged in serious soul-searching as to what it wants to be and what's it's capable of being," Mr. Payson said. "It will be a Herculean effort to turn this around."

The UAW, which also represents some health care and government workers, will be forced to recruit more nonautomotive workers if it is to survive, Mr. Payson said.

"Three years from now, what we call the UAW is going to be something significantly different than it is today," he said.

Detroit Flails In Latest Effort To Reinvent Itself (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

DETROIT, Sept. 15 — Detroit is running low on optimism.

Despite insisting all this year that they had solutions to their financial struggles well in hand, both the Ford Motor Company and the Chrysler Group conceded Friday that the steps they had taken were not working and that more bad news was coming in one of the deepest auto industry crises in Detroit's history.

Ford, which has held second place behind G.M. for 70 years, admitted for the first time that it would inevitably be ceding that spot to Toyota because of slumping sales and its decision Friday to close more factories and cut thousands of additional jobs. It also said it did not expect to make a profit in North America until 2009.

At the same time, the Chrysler Group, also pummeled by the decline in sales of big sport utility vehicles and pickup trucks, said it would report a loss for this summer of $1.5 billion, more than double what it had originally anticipated.

Its parent, DaimlerChrysler, also signaled that it did not see how to build a subcompact car profitably in North America, forcing it to turn to China or another Asian carmaker to help build one overseas. [Page B4.]

For its part, G.M., which is cutting 30,000 jobs and closing nearly a dozen plants, is set to decide within a month whether it wanted to link with a Japanese and a French auto company, a prospect that has rattled union members as well as state officials where G.M. employees live and work.

With all of the auto companies here putting themselves on the chopping block, the upheaval shows that Detroit's basic business strategy — built on the assumption that what has long been thought of as the Big Three would make money simply by dominating the mass market with a full range of vehicles — is irrevocably broken, said James P. Womack, who has written extensively about the auto industry.

"All the old rules of the game are gone," said Mr. Womack, co-founder of the Lean Enterprise Institute. And, he said, the challenge is now to play by the new rules, as dictated by foreign competitors. "We're now in the reinvention phase," he added.

That includes more cuts that will continue at least through the end of the decade. Detroit companies will be focused on closing plants, eliminating blue- and white-collar jobs, and cutting more deeply into their operations to reduce costs. Moreover, the automakers remain liable for billions of dollars in health care costs, both for their active and retired workers.

At G.M., those costs add up to $5.2 billion a year, or the equivalent of $1,440 a car. But for all their efforts to lose excess weight, the biggest challenge facing Detroit's car companies is convincing skeptical American buyers that their vehicles, developed amid this chaos, are as attractive as those from their aggressive rivals. Thus far, they have been failing, reflected in their falling market share in recent years.

Adding to Detroit's woes, its Asian competitors are investing billions of dollars more in American factories and hiring thousands more American workers.

Within six years, it is likely that Asian auto companies, led by Toyota, will outsell their Detroit rivals in the United States, according to a forecast by Edmunds.com, a Web site that offers car-buying advice.

The industry has already gotten a look at the lineup of the future. This July, the best-selling companies were G.M., Toyota, Ford, Honda and Chrysler. And what seemed to be a temporary aberration is about to become the norm, said Jesse Toprak, a senior analyst at Edmunds. "It was a sneak peek of what's likely to happen going forward," Mr. Toprak said.

That was not what Ford's chairman, William Clay Ford Jr., was envisioning in January, when Ford unveiled the first phase of a restructuring plan that it calls the Way Forward.

Amid an announcement that it would cut 34,000 jobs and close 14 plants, Mr. Ford vowed that the 103-year-old company, founded by his great-grandfather, Henry Ford, would regain its supremacy in the American market.

"With it, we will retake the American road," Mr. Ford said at the time.

But Friday, Mr. Ford signaled that his company was allowing Toyota to pass it. At the end of the news release that announced new cuts, including the elimination of 10,000 more salaried jobs, Ford said it expected its share of the market to drop to 14 to 15 percent after this year, 10 points lower than Ford was at the beginning of the decade.

At that time, bets were placed across Detroit whether Ford could surpass G.M.; now, the safe bet is that Toyota will pass Ford to become No. 2 behind G.M., something Mr. Toprak expects to happen for good next year.

"Frankly, our ranking doesn't matter,'' Mr. Ford now says. "You've seen, over the years, chasing market share with sometimes disastrous results."

But given the unpredictability of gasoline prices, to have any kind of security in the American market, both Ford and Chrysler will have to reduce their dependence on sport utilities and pickups, which make up two-thirds of Ford's lineup and three-quarters of the vehicles sold by Chrysler. Both vow they will do that by selling more cars and crossover vehicles.

Those will take time to reach showrooms. Although both have new crossovers on the way, the small car that Ford promises to sell in the United States will not reach the market until 2009 — three years behind compacts introduced this year by Toyota, Honda, Nissan and G.M., which has just introduced a refreshed version of the Chevrolet Aveo, built for it by its South Korean partner, Daewoo.

True, the new Dodge Caliber, introduced this spring, is selling well for Chrysler. Yet both Chrysler and Ford have to hope that gasoline prices stay down from their peaks above $3 a gallon this summer, and that they can keep rebates and other deals to a minimum while they sort out their new status.

One unknown in their predicament is the role of the United Automobile Workers, the union that serves as both their partner and adversary. It has granted some concessions on health care coverage to G.M. and Ford, but said last week that it would not cut a deal with Chrysler, because it was not in such bad financial shape. (Chrysler's latest news could change the union's mind.)

Beyond that, the union has demonstrated that its priority right now is to take care of the members who will be losing their jobs.

On Thursday, Ford and the U.A.W. reached agreement on buyout packages worth up to $140,000 apiece for 75,000 Ford workers, similar to the deals that were offered to G.M.'s 113,000 hourly workers.

The deals, which have not yet been matched by Chrysler, are a clear signal from the union that workers would be well off to get out now before 2007 contract talks, when some of the protection that the U.A.W. has offered generations of workers may diminish.

Once it gets through its current round of job cuts, Ford is expected to have fewer workers at its American plants than Toyota — a prospect that was hard to imagine in 1986, when Toyota opened its first free-standing plant in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0064478

On Friday, that factory, in Georgetown, Ky., built the five-millionth Toyota Camry sedan. It has been the best-selling car in the United States for nearly a decade, a title once held by the Ford Taurus.

Mr. Womack, whose book "The Machine That Changed the World" studied Japanese automakers' American plants, calls the Georgetown factory, which now employs 7,000 workers, "the torpedo that came in when no one was looking."

Reeling from the continuing ripple effects of that explosion, Ford, Chrysler and G.M. need to figure out how to maintain their foothold in a market that they once had practically to themselves. They might take some counsel from the original Mr. Ford.

In his 1930 book, "Moving Forward," Henry Ford wrote that companies were often bedeviled by "the little things that are hard to see — the awkward little methods that have grown up and which no one notices."

Eliminating those tiny wasteful practices, he wrote, could make a big difference between success and failure.

Toyota, at least, was listening. While Ford Motor's "Way Forward'' clearly suggests it faces a struggle ahead, the tagline of Toyota's new advertising campaign is a much more positive "Moving Forward,'' a direct homage to the path that its Detroit rivals may have no choice but to follow.

Bush: Richards Helped Define Texas Politics (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON – President Bush reminisced Friday about the governor he ousted a dozen years ago, calling Democrat Ann Richards a tough opponent and saying he would miss her.

"Running against Ann Richards taught me a lot. She was a really, really good candidate. She was a hard worker. She had the capacity to be humorous and yet make a profound point," Mr. Bush said at a Rose Garden news conference. "She made a positive impact on the state of Texas. One thing's for certain -- she empowered a lot of people to want to participate in the political process that might not have felt that they were welcome in the process."

Mr. Bush is heading to the United Nations on Monday, the day the memorial service will be held in Austin. Former Commerce Secretary Don Evans will represent him at the service, at which Sen. Hillary Clinton, former housing secretary Henry Cisneros and former Dallas mayor Ron Kirk will speak.

As the president noted, "a lot of people loved Ann Richards."

"She really kind of helped define Texas politics in its best way," he said. "One of the things we have done in our history is we've had characters. People larger than life. People that could fill the stage, you know, when the spotlight was on 'em wouldn't shirk from the spotlight but would talk Texan and would explain our state, and she was really good at that."

Ann R., Alcoholic (NYT)

By Maura J. Casey

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

Former Gov. Ann Richards of Texas will be remembered for her wit, her one-liners and especially for the keynote speech at the 1988 Democratic Convention, which was, in retrospect, the high point in the party's dismal campaign for the presidency that year. To intrigued television viewers nationwide, Ms. Richards, with her big hair and big attitude, epitomized the kind of formidable woman that is a hallmark of the Lone Star State. People liked her down-home phrases. When she said, "We're gonna tell how the cow ate the cabbage," they believed her. She leavened a plain-spoken manner with wisecracks. Both helped elect her governor two years later.

But her political career eclipsed what Ms. Richards called "one of the great, great stories" of her life: her recovery from alcoholism and her nearly 26 years of sobriety. That triumph deserves to be more than a line in her obituary.

In so many ways, her decision to stop drinking and enter a rehabilitation program in 1980, after a painful intervention by family and friends, was necessary for her continued rise in public life. What made Ms. Richards different was her decision to be forthright about the fact that she was a recovering alcoholic. She didn't hide it. "I like to tell people that alcoholism is one of my strengths," she said. She was right. Alcoholics know that seeds of healthy recovery grow from the need to mend their own flaws to stay sober, one day at a time. Ms. Richards faced her imperfections fearlessly, and that enabled others to be fearless, too, if only for a little while.

She never stopped helping people. One well-known author said the first mail she received after enrolling in a rehabilitation program was an encouraging letter from Ms. Richards. A politician who left rehab and wondered how on earth he was going to avoid drinking when he got home well after midnight found Ms. Richards waiting for him when he arrived. As governor, she started treatment programs in Texas prisons. When she visited, she would tell the inmates the simple truth: "My name's Ann, and I'm an alcoholic." Her imperfection had become a source of inspiration for others.

Bush Popular With These Republicans (SFC)

By Rachel Gordon

San Francisco Chronicle, September 16, 2006

President Bush plans to travel to Stockton next month to raise money for Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Tracy, a close White House ally who is seeking an eighth term in Congress.

The president also plans to attend a fundraiser for Rep. John Doolittle, R-Rocklin, in El Dorado Hills near Sacramento during a trip similar to one taken by Vice President Dick Cheney to the Republican House districts before the June primary.

Pombo's campaign aides aren't saying how much they hope to pull in at the Oct. 3 fundraiser at the Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium. But, said campaign manager Carl Fogliani, "we're looking at raising a lot."

Fogliani called the president's planned visit a "great honor." Despite Bush's low showing in the polls, Pombo's joint appearance with Bush will be aimed at the party faithful in the 11th Congressional District, which includes portions of San Joaquin, Alameda, Contra Costa and Santa Clara counties.

Although Democrats have a chance to win the 15 Republican seats they need to gain control of the House, most nonpartisan experts believe Pombo is a strong favorite in his race against wind energy specialist Jerry McNerney, a Pleasanton Democrat who lost to Pombo two years ago.

McNerney campaign aides said they'll use the president's visit to remind voters of Pombo's ties to the administration and hope to tap into the national dissatisfaction with Bush and the Republican leadership in Washington.

"Welcome to California," McNerney campaign spokesman Rob Caughlan said of Bush's upcoming visit. He said that considering Pombo's proven fundraising prowess, the president's visit "means they must be running scared."

Bush To Visit State For Pombo, Doolittle (MERCN)

By Erica Werner

The San Jose Mercury News, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush will visit California next month to raise money for Republican Reps. Richard Pombo of Stockton and John Doolittle of Granite Bay, who are seeking re-election amid ethics questions.

Bush will attend a breakfast for Pombo Oct. 3 and a fundraising lunch at an El Dorado Hills country club for Doolittle the same day, the campaigns said separately Friday.

The Doolittle event, which his campaign hopes will raise as much as $500,000, will be Bush's first appearance on behalf of Doolittle. The congressman's friendships with former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and convicted GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff have provided fodder for Doolittle's Democratic opponent, Charlie Brown.

Doolittle accepted campaign cash from Abramoff and Abramoff clients, while interceding on their behalf. His wife also performed fundraising work for Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January in a conspiracy to corrupt public officials.

Unlike Doolittle, Pombo has donated to charity the campaign money he received directly from Abramoff. But he has been targeted by environmentalists over his chairmanship of the House Resources Committee, where he has shepherded legislation helpful to oil and gas interests that have donated generously to him.

The Pombo fundraiser will be held at Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium. Details about how much money his campaign expected it to generate were not available Friday.

Both incumbents represent Republican-leaning districts in Northern California.

The Bush visit follows a California trip by Vice President Dick Cheney, who was appearing at private receptions Friday for the Republican Governors Association in Los Angeles and for the Republican National Committee in Menlo Park.

Cheney was not meeting with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger during the visit, the governor's office said.

Campaigner In Chief (TRCP)

By John Upton

Tracy Press, September 16, 2006

President Bush will continue making the rounds for Republican campaigners when he makes a trip to Stockton to stump for Rep. Richard Pombo.

President Bush will take a break from conducting his war against terror to visit Stockton on Oct. 3 to raise campaign cash for Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Tracy.

Pombo campaign consultant Wayne Johnson said it's normal for incumbent presidents and vice presidents to help candidates raise funds.

"It takes money to run campaigns," said Johnson, who said Bush would appear at a breakfast fundraiser.

The breakfast is expected to be at the Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium.

DOJ_NMG_0064480

Local fundraisers by Vice President Dick Cheney, Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert and House Majority Leader John Boehner have helped Pombo raise more than $2.5 million this election cycle.

The money has helped Pombo fend off an expensive, frenzied attack by primary opponent Pete McCloskey, Democratic candidate Jerry McNerney and a range of activist groups, including MoveOn.org, Defenders of Wildlife and the Sierra Club, in the race for the 11th Congressional District.

Pombo has been targeted for his close ties to convicted felon and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and indicted former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, but David Karol, a political science professor at University of California, Berkeley, said McNerney doesn't have enough money or visibility to make the scandals stick.

"I don't think it really helps Pombo to be seen with the president. … I think what Bush can offer him at this point is help in fundraising," said Karol, who said Pombo remains the favorite in the race despite Bush's unpopularity across the country. A Sept. 7 Gallup poll found 39 percent of Americans approve of Bush's performance, while 56 percent disapprove.

Bush picked up 3 percent more votes in 2004 in the 11th District than his national average.

Sierra Club spokesman Eric Antebi said Bush counted on Pombo, as chairman of the House Resources Committee, to support or turn a blind eye to oil-industry friendly policies on oil drilling and air pollution.

"Pombo joined Bush in trying to allow oil companies to drill in special places like the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and protected the coastline while weakening the rules that protect our waterways from drilling pollution," Antebi said. "And like Bush, Pombo's campaigns have gotten a big boost from oil industry contributions."

Pombo previously said that he wants to create more American jobs and wean the United States from foreign energy supplies by increasing domestic production.

Pombo supports Bush's commitment to keeping U.S. forces in Iraq — which, according to various government reports, had no weapons of mass destruction or links to al-Qaida when it was invaded — saying that an early withdrawal would be a disaster. At least 2,676 U.S. soldiers, including five soldiers from Tracy, have died in the war. Iraq Body Count has documented more than 43,000 Iraqi deaths, but no such government statistics are available.

Defenders of Wildlife and MoveOn.org organizer Ed Yoon said he would greet Bush with a protest, but South San Joaquin County Republican President Frank Aquila said the president will be welcomed by much of the community.

"I'm sure they'll go ahead and bus the protestors in, but any time the president comes — whether Republican or Democrat — you've got to honor that position, and I think the fact that President Bush is going to be here is absolutely outstanding."

McNerney's camp seemed unfazed by Bush's upcoming visit.

"If I were Pombo, I'd probably be stoked that Bush is coming out, because even George Bush is more popular than the Congress," said McNerney spokesman Rob Coughlan.

The visit was announced at a difficult time for the Republican Party, which is facing a pre-election backlash over the federal government's handling of the war in Iraq, Hurricane Katrina and oil prices.

Despite Pombo's formidable campaign war chest, the National Republican Congressional Committee spent more than $55,000 helping Pombo this year.

Committee spokesman Jonathon Collegio said $38,475 was spent a little more than a week ago on a mailer that attacks McNerney's tax policies.

"The (Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee) has targeted Richard Pombo, and the (National Republican Congressional Committee) wanted to level the playing field," Collegio said.

A spokeswoman for the Democratic committee said Bush's visit is a sign that Pombo is in trouble.

"National Republicans are spending money, and they're sending Bush in to raise money for Pombo because they know that his record of using his seat for personal enrichment makes him vulnerable and an unappealing choice for Californian voters," Kate Bedingfield said.

Bush To Visit Stockton (STREC)

By Hank Shaw

Stockton Record, September 16, 2006

SACRAMENTO - President Bush is coming to Stockton next month to help Tracy Rep. Richard Pombo raise money for his re-election bid.

Bush is scheduled to appear at a $250-a-plate breakfast event at the Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium on Oct. 3, according to the campaign.

Pombo is locked in a spirited campaign for the 11th District against Pleasanton wind energy consultant Jerry McNerney, who lost handily to Pombo in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0064481

McNerney has come back stronger this time, and many political observers give him an outside shot at unseating Pombo - if there is a Democratic wave this fall.

Most Republicans nationwide have been focusing on local issues in their re-election efforts, but bringing Bush into the district shifts the spotlight to national matters such as the war in Iraq; Pombo's hometown of Tracy has one of the highest death rates in the nation for soldiers serving overseas.

Bush's approval ratings are hovering around 40 percent nationally, according to several recent surveys. But in California, Bush's popularity is far lower: Nearly two-thirds of all Californians - including more than one-quarter of Republicans - disapprove of Bush, according to a late July Field Poll.

Bush last came to Stockton in 2002, ostensibly to help Bill Simon, the GOP candidate for governor that year. Vice President Dick Cheney hosted a Stockton fundraiser for Pombo earlier this year.

Pombo spokesman Carl Fogliani said the Bush visit will swell their campaign fund so they can blitz McNerney on radio, on television and in the mail throughout the last seven weeks of the election.

"He'll help the campaign raise the resources we need to finish this campaign," Fogliani said.

Pombo's 11th District includes both the Sacramento media market and the pricey Bay Area market, which can bankrupt all but the richest candidates should they choose to advertise heavily on TV.

Pombo already has mailed several fliers to district residents and has been spending more than $50,000 a week on a radio ad highlighting McNerney's decision to change 55 of his positions on a candidate issue questionnaire earlier this summer.

Adding to this is at least $161,000 in spending by the Republican National Campaign Committee on Pombo's behalf for polling and mailers.

As of June 30, Pombo has just under $1 million to spend and had raised more than $2.2 million overall. He has actively been collecting more cash since then, and the campaign hopes the Bush fundraiser will cap their effort.

No money goal for the event has yet been set, Fogliani said.

McNerney, whose campaign says it's raised nearly $1 million so far, is also beginning its own ad campaign on cable television. He is the best-funded challenger Pombo has faced, and his spokesman, Rob Caughlan, says Bush's arrival shows Pombo is concerned.

"I think he's scared," Caughlan said. "He's certainly not taking Jerry McNerney for granted.

"We've been saying all along this is a national race, and there's nothing that'll say 'national race' better than having George W. Bush come into Stockton."

Pombo has voted with Bush's positions 86 percent of the time since 2001, according to information compiled by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

That might please residents of Ripon, Lodi, Escalon and Manteca, which all voted for Bush twice. But Tracy and Stockton - much of which is in the neighboring 18th District - voted for Al Gore in 2000 and John Kerry in 2004.

In the East Bay portion of the district, neither the Alameda County part nor Morgan Hill voted for Bush, although the Contra Costa section did, narrowly.

University of California, Berkeley, political scientist Bruce Cain said bringing Bush to the district could prove risky, although it's in character for the pugnacious Pombo.

"I don't see Pombo apologizing for his conservatism or his support of the president," Cain said. "What he wants to do is strengthen his Republican numbers. He doesn't need a lot of Democrats to vote for him."

Allan Hoffenblum, one of California's premier political odds-makers, says Pombo has little to lose by bringing in Bush.

"Bush is visiting the red part of California, not the blue part," said Hoffenblum, referring to Republican red and Democrat blue. "And if they hate Bush that much there, they're not going to vote for Pombo anyway. Besides, he needs the money."

Election Prospects Looking Up, Some Republicans Say (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - With the fall election campaign taking shape, many Republicans this week believe for the first time in months that they've turned a corner and could limit feared midterm losses enough to retain control of Congress.

The reasons for their guarded optimism include a new poll showing that voters again give an edge to the Republicans on national security, another showing concerns about the seeming lack of a clear Democratic alternative agenda, an impressive get-out-the-vote effort in a Rhode Island Republican primary, and relief over dropping gasoline prices.

To be sure, all Republicans interviewed stressed that they still face a sour country and tough election - the Iraq war being the main reason - and they still fear losing seats in both the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Democrats dismiss the notion of a Republican rebound.

DOJ_NMG_0064482

"These guys must be living in a circular room if they think they've turned a corner," said Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "At the end of the day, the situation in Iraq remains the same, the economy remains the same, and the things coming out of Congress remain the same. To say they're in better shape going into the heart of the general election campaign doesn't pass the smell test."

Nevertheless, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman on Friday all but echoed one internal White House prediction that his party will lose only two to three Senate seats and eight to 12 House seats. That would still leave Republicans in control of Congress. Democrats need to gain 15 House seats and six Senate seats to capture both chambers.

Mehlman and other Republican operatives argued that they "won" the first full week after Labor Day, the date when more voters historically start tuning in to politics and candidates and parties ramp up their campaigns, particularly with advertising.

"We're in a pretty good trend right now, although we're still in a tough environment," Mehlman said at a breakfast with reporters.

"There's clearly a turnaround happening," added a Republican Senate aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity on his boss's orders. "We've got a lot of work to do. But there's a chance now to stave off the kind of disaster that was being predicted."

Several credit President Bush's concerted effort in recent speeches to connect the unpopular Iraq war to the more broadly supported war against terrorism and to paint the Democrats as weak on defense.

One poll this week suggested that the White House campaign succeeded in at least one area. The ABC-Washington Post survey showed that voters trust Republicans over Democrats to handle terrorism by a margin of 48 percent to 41 percent, a sharp turnaround from the month before, when they trusted Democrats by 46 percent to 39 percent.

Another poll, conducted for NBC News and The Wall Street Journal, showed that 42 percent of voters are more concerned that Democrats lack "specific programs," while 37 percent are more concerned that Republicans have offered "no changes" to the status quo. That suggests that the Republican hope to turn the election from a referendum on their rule to a choice between them and the Democrats may be working.

"Paid advertising is picking up," said Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, which helps Republicans in House races. "Voters now are paying less attention to outside noise and focusing more on differences between the candidates."

Republicans also enter the fall with a decided cash advantage to buy more advertising and get-out-the-vote operations. This week, the Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks money in politics, reported that collectively, all Republican political committees had a cash-on-hand edge over their Democratic counterparts of $121 million to $91 million.

Republicans also were buoyed by the party's get-out-the-vote work in Rhode Island on Tuesday, where it helped produce a record turnout and a primary victory for incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee. That turnout effort echoed a successful drive in a special election in California over the summer, signs that the party's much-lauded ability to mobilize its voters is still effective even in a tough year.

And gasoline prices are dropping, easing one of the many drags on the party in power. The ranks of voters who rate gasoline prices as the top issue dropped from 15 percent last month to 5 percent, according to the ABC poll.

"Having gas prices moderate is an important component of having people recognize that the economy is in a lot better shape than they think it is," said Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster.

But he cautioned that it's not enough to turn around Republican fortunes.

"We have had a good week. But that good week needs to be sustained in order for it to have a fundamentally different effect on the election. ... It's hard to say things are really looking up until we see significant improvement on Iraq, or more people see the economy as positive."

The ABC-Washington Post poll of 863 registered voters was conducted by telephone Sept. 5-7 and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

The NBC-Wall Street Journal poll of 1,009 registered voters was conducted by telephone Sept. 8-11 and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

Piñata Strategy (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, September 16, 2006

Behold the Republican playbook: Frightening voters and demonizing Dem leader Nancy Pelosi.

The Republican message for this fall's election season turns Franklin Roosevelt's famous statement on its head: fear is good, or at least it's a strategy. They want the electorate to be afraid, very afraid—of the terrorists, of course, but also of an elegantly dressed woman from San Francisco.

DOJ_NMG_0064483

Democratic operatives have been warning Rep. Nancy Pelosi for months that she needs to prepare for what Karl Rove and the GOP have in store: an all out, coast-to-coast assault.

As the Democratic leader in line to be speaker if her party wins control of the House, Republicans see Pelosi as the piñata of politics in 2006.

Six years into the Bush presidency, GOP operatives in essence are conceding the obvious: voters are angry about Iraq, the economy, immigration and incompetence.

Republicans worry about voters such as Eric Albino, a 29-year-old construction worker I met in New York the other day at the site of Ground Zero. He had been a Bush supporter, but turned against him because of the war in Iraq. "He's doing what he can to the best of his ability," Albino said sympathetically, "but he should have left Saddam alone." We are less safe as a result, he said.

Rather than spend a lot of time and money defending their record to voters such as Albino, the Rovepublicans will try to scare him into sticking with them—or at least staying away from the polls altogether. The way to do that, they have decided, is to scare him silly about what the Democrats would do with control of Congress.

They want to use Pelosi to give their vision of nightmare a face and name and history.

It's a page from an old GOP playbook. In 1984, the Democrats held their convention in San Francisco; Republicans renominated Ronald Reagan in Dallas. It was the dawn of the Red State-Blue State, cultural/political divide we see today. Democrats made history, nominating the first woman—Geraldine Ferraro—for vice president. "Independent" GOP groups swarmed into San Francisco, and onto the airwaves, to denounce the Democrats for their liberal stands on abortion, gay rights, taxes and so on. Reagan won 49 states.

The epithet "San Francisco Democrat" had power then, and for years thereafter. Does it still?

We're about to find out. The product of a middle-class family, reared in Baltimore as the daughter of the city's mayor, Pelosi by background is no flower child. But she does represent a capital of Blue State America. She has a liberal voting record and she is perhaps the most influential congressional critic of the Iraq war.

Pelosi's friend and ally, Rep. John Murtha, got all the ink, but it was Pelosi who gave him his platform in the caucus. Pelosi is personally wealthy; her husband, Paul Pelosi, is a successful Bay Area businessman.

The GOP has "tested" her image in focus groups and polls. She has become a favorite villain of conservative talk radio, which sometimes dwell on her attire and looks. Female Democratic strategists I know fret about this, even as they are outraged at what they see as the sexism of it. They admire her sense of style, but they do worry that she looks too sophisticated, too Nob Hill. "She dresses too 'rich'," one said to me. No one would accuse Denny Hastert of that.

As for her stand on the issues, it is incontrovertibly true that she represents one of the most liberal congressional districts in the country. "That's who she is," said a top Democratic operative. "The problem with refuting that attack is that it's true."

Other insiders worry about gay-rights: the notion that the Democrats are too responsive to gay demands for equal treatment. That was GOP's underlying message 22 years ago, when the term "San Francisco Democrat" first gained currency. It will be subtext—or the overt text—in the campaign this fall.

"They are going to try to turn Pelosi into the Newt Gingrich of our day," said Mark Penn, a leading Democratic pollster. "But I don't think it's going to work. First, she's not that well known. Second, it could work the other way. People want accountability. They want George Bush held to account. Pelosi isn't running for president, she's running for a Congress that will take on the president."

Will voters in, say, eastern Pennsylvania (where there are four House seats up for grabs) care about who Rep. Nancy Pelosi is in November, and what she might say and do as speaker? It seems unlikely, but it's only mid-September.

Mfume Concedes Election To Cardin (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

Kweisi Mfume yesterday officially conceded Maryland's Democratic primary for the U.S. Senate, but it was not clear whether he planned to campaign for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin in the general election contest against Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee.

"Ben and I gave this race our best," said Mr. Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and a former congressman. "However, there can only be one nominee from our party, and he is it.

"He is a great public servant and I have absolutely no doubt that he is going to make a terrific United States senator. He has my full support," Mr. Mfume said.

Mr. Cardin spoke with Mr. Mfume on the phone minutes before a Democratic rally in Annapolis, an Mfume spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0064484

"This was a very positive, hard campaign," Mr. Cardin said after the rally. "Kweisi and I continue our friendship. ... I'm proud to have his support."

Mr. Cardin said that he expects Mr. Mfume to campaign with him.

"I am confident that we will be together during the campaign," Mr. Cardin said.

According to the Maryland State Board of Elections, Mr. Cardin received 247,617 votes, or 43.8 percent, and Mr. Mfume 228,721, or 40.4 percent, in Tuesday's primary. Eighteen Democrats were seeking the nomination to replace retiring Democratic Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes.

About 25 precincts in Baltimore had not had their votes counted as of yesterday, and 26,000 absentee ballots, along with an unknown number of provisional ballots, also had not yet been counted.

Mr. Mfume, who waited until after 2 a.m. Wednesday to end his primary party without then conceding, said that he had spoken with elections officials yesterday morning and decided to concede.

"We have looked at every set of remaining numbers. It is clear that while the gap may narrow, the vote totals will fall short of what will be needed to win," Mr. Mfume said.

In an unrelated matter, the Cardin campaign fired a female campaign staffer yesterday after discovering a Web log she had been writing about the campaign.

Titled "Road Diaries of the Persuasionatrix," the blog talked about taking a picture of Cardin staffers eating Oreos with the caption "devouring the competition."

"Oreo" can be used as a derogatory term for blacks who "act or think white." Mr. Steele is the first black to win a statewide office in Maryland.

A Cardin spokesman said that the staffer was fired as soon as the blog was discovered.

"We became aware of this blog today," said Oren Shur, Mr. Cardin's spokesman. "We utterly condemn the sentiments expressed in it. It is not an accurate reflection of Ben Cardin or his campaign. The junior staffer responsible for the contents of this blog is no longer employed by the campaign."

Mr. Shur did not confirm the name of the blogger.

A Kean On The Ballot? What Else Is New? (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

TRENTON, Sept. 15 — One of Thomas H. Kean Jr.'s earliest political memories is watching his father, Gov. Thomas H. Kean Sr., deliver the keynote address at the Republican National Convention in 1988, when George H. W. Bush was nominated for president.

Now, Mr. Bush is one of many of the former governor's powerful friends helping support the younger Mr. Kean's bid to unseat Senator Robert Menendez, as patrimony has helped propel a relatively inexperienced state legislator into one of the tightest races in the country. Some Democrats here even complain that Republicans are trying to confuse voters into thinking that the popular former governor and chairman of the 9/11 Commission is running, not his 38-year-old son.

After all, Keans have been on the ballot here almost as long as there have been ballots.

"When my dad ran for Congress — and he had been the Assembly speaker — the headline said, 'Kean's son to run for Congress,' " said Mr. Kean, now a state senator. "When my grandfather ran for Congress in 1938, there was a headline that said, 'Kean's son to run for Congress.' When my great-grandfather ran for Senate, I think there was a headline that said, 'Kean's brother to run for Senate,' because his older brother had served in the United States Senate.

"So I personally set very high standards for my own experience in public office, and I think the public has set very high standards for me."

As they did with the current President Bush in 2000, Democrats say Mr. Kean, in his first run for statewide office, lacks the résumé for Washington. But suddenly the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, and several other election handicappers, have moved New Jersey — which last elected a Republican senator in 1972 — into the toss-up column, complicating Democrats' plans to keep a supposedly safe Senate seat.

Despite Mr. Menendez's three-to-one fund-raising edge, Mr. Kean has capitalized on sky-high name recognition to pass the incumbent in several recent public opinion polls by as much as 5 percentage points. Party leaders are increasingly focused on the race: Karl Rove, the White House political guru, is scheduled to sponsor a fund-raising lunch for Mr. Kean on Monday at 21 Club in Manhattan, and Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, is sponsoring a breakfast on his behalf on Wednesday in Washington.

It does not hurt, of course, that former Governor Kean, who enhanced his stature with his leadership of the 9/11 Commission, has been in the news promoting a book and played a part in last week's controversy over ABC's miniseries on the subject. The younger Mr. Kean has also leaned on his father's allies for financial support and strategy. And not every candidate's father has a political action committee — Governor Kean's Fund for All Americans has contributed $10,000 to the effort. (The senior Mr. Kean and other Keans have donated $26,500.)

"I do think what we are seeing in the polls is a familiarity quotient," said Ingrid W. Reed, a political scientist at Rutgers University. "Even if people know it's not Tom Kean Sr., the name resonates, and people say, 'How bad can he be?' "

Mr. Kean says he is not bothered by people who equate his career with political entitlement, or wonder whether he can escape the shadow of his father — or his father's father's father. And while he shares many moderate Republican values with the former governor, he is hardly a political clone, demonstrating a more conservative bent on immigration and gay rights.

"The umbilical cord was cut a while ago," Mr. Kean said in a recent interview at his home in Westfield.

Being the child of a prominent politician brings the blessings of name recognition and nostalgic good will, and the burden — especially for those who share the same first and last names — of the inevitable comparisons and the invariable complaints that the child had too easy a glide path.

Some namesake sons, like Al Gore and Richard Daley, have equaled or exceeded their fathers' records. Some have fallen short, like Adlai E. Stevenson III and Hubert H. Humphrey III. And some have been so unabashed in trumpeting their father's names that you might think the two were running mates.

The elder Mr. Kean, in a recent interview at his office in Far Hills, acknowledged that the pressure could be daunting — and said he had steered all three of his children away from politics.

"It's very difficult when your father is prominent in the same field that you're about to go into," he said. "Frankly, there are a lot of children from political families who have had a lot of problems in their lives." Asked if his son had ever wished that he had a different name, perhaps to lower expectations, he smiled and said, "He's never said that to me, but I suspect there were times."

When it comes to political dynasties, the Keans are to New Jersey what the Kennedys are to Massachusetts, or even what the Livingstons, the Keans' distant relatives, once were to New York.

As he grew up at the family homestead in Livingston, the younger Mr. Kean said he was most impressed with the reception that his father received in the community.

"Whether it be in the movie theater, the diner or the local Friendly's, people would come up and say, 'This is an important issue,' or people would thank him for something he did," Mr. Kean recalled. "That impressed upon me that you could do something good."

At Dartmouth College — which Mr. Kean chose over his father's alma mater, Princeton, to avoid implications that he was admitted because of his connections — his roommates said they found out his father was the governor of New Jersey several months into the school year, when the governor showed up on campus escorted by state troopers.

"He looks to his dad more as a mentor than as a classic father figure, if you will," said Peter Van Alstine, a roommate at Dartmouth who remains one of Mr. Kean's closest friends. "It wasn't the typical American, 'Go fishing, hang out daily, arms-around-the-shoulder' type deal. It was definitely more infrequent and more of a mentor relationship."

Mr. Kean's first job out of college, in 1990, was at the Environmental Protection Agency in Washington — a political appointment his father arranged. Then, after the first President Bush lost in 1992, Mr. Kean worked for former Representative Bob Franks, a moderate Republican and family friend.

At the Fletcher School at Tufts University, where Mr. Kean studied the politics and economics of Central Asia, his academic adviser, Andrew C. Hess, said that he learned of the student's lineage from a secretary.

A classmate, Geneve Mantri, said: "It didn't seem to be a weight on him. Having come from the U.K., where there's an awful lot of name-dropping, where your sense of identity is very much tied to your parents or grandparents, it was nice to meet somebody who had that background but wasn't self-conscious about it, either in a good way or a bad way."

Mr. Kean was studying for a doctorate before being sidetracked by politics — just as his father had been sidetracked from a Ph.D. decades earlier. He decisively lost his first electoral effort, a Republican Congressional primary in 2000, despite his father's help. "It was probably good for him," said David Yaccino, a former roommate and Psi Upsilon Fraternity brother at Dartmouth. "He realized that the Kean name was not going to get him elected."

But it sure helps.

At last week's fund-raiser in Bridgewater, former President Bush observed that it was an old mutual friend of Governor Kean's and his, Nicholas F. Brady, the former Treasury secretary, who extended the invitation.

The former governor was surrounded at the event by enough alumni of his administration that one old hand joked they could "convene a cabinet meeting."

"A lot of those folks are not involved in year-to-year election efforts," said Roger A. Bodman, a former transportation commissioner and one of many who have dusted off their Rolodexes from the 1980's to dial for dollars. "It's their affection for the Kean family that's their motivation here, rather than supporting another Republican."

DOJ_NMG_0064486

The elder Mr. Kean is coy about how involved he plans to be in the campaign. He says that he has gone to strategy sessions — when his son asks — and a few fund-raisers, also when his son asks. And every couple of days, he said, the phone rings.

"He'll call me and say, 'Dad, what do you think about this, what do you think about that?' " the elder Mr. Kean said. "What I want him to understand is, no matter what I say, he's going to make the ultimate judgment — he's the candidate."

New Jersey's Senate contenders, incumbent Bob Menendez and challenger Tom Kean Jr., square off on ethics, war in Iraq and party loyalty. WEB EXCLUSIVE

On the surface, New Jersey seems like an easy Senate seat for the Democrats to hold on to. The incumbent, Democrat Bob Menendez, who was appointed in January when Sen. Jon Corzine became the state's governor, is a seven-term former congressman. The state has been a solid hue of blue in the last four presidential elections and disapproval of President Bush is high. But polls show a dead heat between Menendez and his challenger, Republican Tom Kean Jr., a state senator whose name is political gold—his father was formerly the popular governor of New Jersey and his grandfather was a congressman.

It's shaping up to be quite a fight. Kean's camp has been trying to paint Menendez as the product of a broken New Jersey political system, rocked by scandal over the last decade. At the same time, Kean is trying to cut an independent path for himself—away from the GOP. He's been sharply critical of mistakes in Iraq and several of the president's positions. Menendez, however, says Kean is simply pandering in an election year and points to the fact that Laura Bush, former president George H.W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney have all stumped for Kean. He also proudly notes his own badge of courage: Menendez voted against the Iraq war resolution while in the House of Representatives.

David Gerlach recently spoke with both Menendez and Kean as part of NEWSWEEK'S ongoing Face Off series profiling the midterm's hottest races. Excerpts:

Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez

NEWSWEEK: Why do you think polls are showing a dead heat in your Senate race?

Bob Menendez: The reality is that while people say I am an incumbent, I have been in office a grand total of eight months. And running against someone [who], not because of his own making, but because of his father's making, has a name that is well recognized. Those are parts of the challenge. We have just started our advertising.

Are you concerned that some voters may, if they hear your opponent say he is also in favor of stem-cell research or having Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld resign, have a hard time differentiating between the two of you?

People will see through those as 60-day conversions to a position that Tom Kean Jr. doesn't really believe in. After taking $1.2 million in funds that have been raised by Mrs. Bush, Vice President Cheney and President Bush, it is very hard to walk away from the Bush agenda. For example, even knowing that there were no weapons of mass destruction, Tom Kean Jr. has continually said he supports the war in Iraq and would have voted for it. Even as the New Jersey legislature voted to raise the minimum wage, he voted against it—the same position as President Bush and Republicans in Congress.

Why did you vote against the Iraq war resolution?

I did my due diligence. I sat on the International Relations Committee. It became very clear to me there was no evidence of weapons of mass destruction, no imminent threat to the United States. In my mind, our engagement in Afghanistan, which I supported, was the right engagement, and we needed to finish doing the job there. [Iraq] was a war of choice and not of necessity.

You have called for a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq to country nearby. Where would be a plausible location to move U.S. troops?

Our plan is multifaceted. It is a transition and withdrawal. It is to put part of the force over the horizon. I would listen to the generals to where in fact we would put those troops. It is about having a summit that brings together regional players who have a great interest in the stability of Iraq, as well as the Europeans and NATO. Right now, that is not happening. We are going it alone. It also is ensuring we have some troops whose whole focus is dedicated to any terrorist activity that may exist in Iraq, but not in the midst of being peacekeepers in a civil war. For that, we strengthen the Iraqi troops over the course of this transition over the next year.

What are you hoping to see come out of Congress regarding ethics reform legislation?

[Democrats] believe the Republican corruption of Jack Abramoff and Duke Cunningham and the K Street Project are unworthy of the American people. That is why I stood with [Sens.] Harry Reid and Barack Obama to offer some of the highest ethical standards and legislation to meet those standards. The Republicans rejected it. Hopefully we can get back to it once [Democrats] get a majority [in the Senate].

How do you respond to charges that you rented space in New Jersey to the North Hudson Community Action Corporation while you were lobbying for them to receive federal grants, and that in 2003 you sponsored legislation to ban media mergers, because it would affect stock you owned in Spanish Broadcasting System Inc.?

This campaign started with Tom Kean Jr. trying to "Swift Boat" my history as a reformer and [he] failed miserably. The bottom line is New Jerseyans will see through the Kean campaign on trying to play the politics of personal destruction.

But you did recently state that you regretted renting property to that charitable organization.

Even though the [House] Ethics Committee gave me approval. Even though it was absolutely an arms-length transaction. The bottom line is it is a diversion from the campaign. At the end of the day, Tom Kean will have to answer for why he took $10,000 in casino contributions, which legislators in New Jersey are barred from [doing and] send it to his federal account and ultimately switch his vote on the ban of smoking in casinos.

But it is legal to take contributions from a casino for a federal campaign.

While it may be legal ... it didn't stop the fact he still has to cast votes on the regulation of that industry.

You have noted that you helped restore federal funding to Amtrak. Why do you think it has been difficult to fund and improve the infrastructure of the passenger-rail network?

The Bush administration has kept Amtrak on life support. You can't do the maintenance and infrastructure investment. Amtrak post-September 11 is not only important for the economy of the region, it's important for tourism. It's also about having multiple modes of transportation so that, God forbid, [if] there is an attack, there is a way to make intercity connections. Intercity rail service in any part of the world is never fully self-sufficient on its own.

As a Cuban-American, what are your thoughts regarding the recent health problems of Fidel Castro?

Our hope, America's hope, is freedom and democracy for the Cuban people. If the potential transition to his brother [Raul Castro] on a more permanent basis becomes the reality, than we will see the beginning of change. Raul doesn't have a relationship with the people as Fidel does. He doesn't have the respect of the military. For the U.S., it is important to be poised to send a clear message to the people that we support them and respect the sovereignty of the country and [will] help them in their transition to democracy.

When you entered the Senate earlier this year, you said you had been dreaming about becoming a senator since you were 19.

As someone who grew up poor in a tenement and being the first in my family to go to college, for my ability to go from those beginnings to being one of 100 senators in a country of 300 million people, it is the story of the promise of America fulfilled.

Republican State Sen. Thomas Kean Jr.

NEWSWEEK: You have been critical of the Bush administration, notably its handling of the war in Iraq. Have you heard from the White House or the National Republican Senatorial Committee?

Tom Kean Jr.: What I am focusing on are issues that are important to citizens of New Jersey. I agree [with the president on] the tax cuts and a number of the antiterrorism initiatives. [There are] areas where I disagree: stem-cell research, which I support, or cutting spending, or immigration reform. And the conduct of the war in Iraq and the mistakes that have been made there. It is my responsibility to make people aware of that.

Some Republicans equate critiquing the war with emboldening terrorists.

One of reasons I called for Secretary [of Defense] Rumsfeld's dismissal is that I disagree with that assessment.

When did you come to the conclusion that he should resign?

It has been building for months. I have been following the war and the horrendous mistakes that have been made. When the secretary gave a speech ... to the American Legion, when he essentially compared people who had critiques of the war on terror to "appeasers," I thought the secretary of Defense was stepping into the political realm ... He had stepped too far and we needed a new set of eyes and ears at the head of the Pentagon to focus on the future of Iraq. As well as the future in North Korea, Iran and the future of [terrorism].

Did you think he should resign in the wake of scandals at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq?

Clearly, the buck always stops with the secretary of Defense in that regard. I thought if we had new generals in charge there would be a change in emphasis, a change in policy. And when we had new generals in charge, the same language and direction was coming out of the secretary of Defense. The world has changed so dramatically in the last six years. I do not support an immediate withdrawal of our troops. My concern is it would lead to a humanitarian crisis. [There's a] potential for a terrorist haven to be created.

You have stated that Iraq had nothing to do with 9/11, but you have also said you would have voted for the war had you been in Congress at the time and that President Bush wasn't disingenuous in the lead-up to the war.

I don't think he was. He had the same info that President Clinton had. The vast majority of Republicans and Democrats alike at that juncture thought there was a strong national-security component to that authorization.

Why do you think your opponent voted against that authorization when he was in the House of Representatives?

He has traditionally been on the fringe of his own party. The case [for war] was clearly made with people who had far better information than he did.

Do you have any concerns about alienating your conservative base with some of your stances?

The people realize they can no longer afford the status quo. Bob Menendez is the status quo. He voted for the largest tax increase in U.S. history and the largest tax increase in New Jersey. He has voted to give amnesty to illegal workers. He sat on the conference committee [that] stripped out risk-based funding on homeland security ... He failed the people of New Jersey. It's not because Republicans were in charge. It's more frequently a geographic fight. He had a seat at the table.

In one of your recent television ads, you call yourself an independent reformer. But the commercial does not mention you are Republican. Was that omission intended?

People want an individual who will go down to D.C. and stand up for them. Not someone who will be beholden to the party bosses, whoever they may be.

You have been talking a lot about ethics reform in Washington during your campaign. Why do you think the GOP-controlled Congress has not been able to tackle that issue?

It has been equally difficult for ethics reform to get through the [New Jersey] state legislature. I was thrown out of the state assembly because I was fighting for "pay-to-play reform." ["Pay to play" refers to the practice of rewarding lucrative government contracts to large campaign contributors.]

What did you learn from that as you try to get a GOP-controlled Congress to deal with the problem?

What we have seen is [that] Congress can't police itself. I would hope we would be able to create an independent entity that is nonpartisan in its makeup and that would be able to focus on those issues. This is a big part of this campaign. Bob Menendez sent millions of dollars to a nonprofit organization [from] which he received $350,000 in rent payments. He worked on their behalf. House ethics rules clearly state that an individual should not profit from their public service.

Some ethics questions have been lobbed at your camp regarding campaign contributions that you received from employees or board members of companies where your father serves on the board of directors.

Everything we did was legal. My father has never reached into corporations to ask for contributions on my behalf.

Are you ever concerned about public fatigue with a Kean political dynasty?

My father set a very high standard for public service. His father did [in Congress]. It is important to be proud of your ancestors. But more important that they be proud of you.

2 Candidates Question Vote In Pr. George's (WP)

By Ovetta Wiggins, Eric Rich And Hamil R. Harris

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

Congressional candidate Donna Edwards announced plans yesterday to file a lawsuit over apparent voting irregularities in Tuesday's primary election in Prince George's County, while defeated county executive challenger Rushern L. Baker III demanded an independent investigation of the process.

The separate announcements signaled that Tuesday's voting, a flawed process by many accounts, may not conclude the close primary contests for a seat in Congress and the county executive's office. The election itself was "horrendous," the Prince George's elections administrator said yesterday. And the victorious Democratic county executive candidate, incumbent Jack B. Johnson, said it warranted investigation.

"The integrity of the election is at stake," said Edwards, who ran against Rep. Albert R. Wynn in the 4th District Democratic primary and is waiting for the race to be decided when provisional ballots are counted next week in Montgomery and Prince George's counties.

Jonathan S. Shurberg, a lawyer working with Edwards, said they will ask a judge to take possession of voting machine memory cards in two, possibly three, precincts in Chillum. The request will be made either in Prince George's Circuit Court in Upper Marlboro or U.S. District Court in Greenbelt over the next several days.

Edwards said her legal complaint will focus on the security of voting machines that contained voting cards and were not delivered to the county Board of Elections until late Wednesday. "When we read reports about how easy it is to hack into these machines, there has to be concern," Edwards said.

Wynn lashed out at her over the decision to sue, accusing her of "trying to throw out votes in certain jurisdictions."

Chuck Perry, a lawyer who advised Baker's campaign, said at a news conference yesterday that there is "ample evidence" to warrant an investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0064489

Widespread problems occurred throughout the county, Perry said: Numerous polling places did not open as required at 7 a.m. Computers misidentified the party affiliation of voters. And voting machines failed to electronically transmit data to the county's central office.

"We're not doing this for the campaign," Perry said. "We're doing this as a duty. Voters have been disenfranchised."

A spokesman for Johnson, who had called Tuesday's voting process "abysmal," said the county executive agrees that there should be an inquiry.

"We join Mr. Baker in his request . . . to find out what happened and avoid problems like this in the future," said the spokesman, Jim Keary.

Electronic voting machine malfunctions were reported across the region Tuesday. Machines froze, access cards stopped working and computerized voter lists crashed. The glitches renewed fears about the vulnerability of electronic machines used in the electoral process.

Perry said it is unclear whether an investigation would change the outcome of the race for county executive. For now, said Alexander Krughoff, a campaign spokesman, "Mr. Baker has issued his concession, and he stands by that."

A delay in counting votes left the winner of the surprisingly close county executive race undecided until late Wednesday, when Baker accepted defeat. Johnson had 52 percent of the vote to Baker's 48 percent. In the congressional race, Wynn leads by fewer than 3,000 votes, and Edwards has said she will not consider the election over until provisional ballots are counted.

Results trickled in Tuesday night because election workers said they had trouble transmitting data electronically from precincts to the county's central tabulating office.

According to Baker's campaign, only 60 of 206 precincts managed to transmit their results electronically. Election workers at the remaining polling places had to remove voter memory cards from each machine and drive them to Board of Elections headquarters in Upper Marlboro.

The county's interim election administrator, Robert J. Antonetti Sr., acknowledged yesterday that the primary was the most troubled election he has overseen during 34 years in the field. "This was horrendous," Antonetti said.

Antonetti, the longtime head of the Prince George's election office, served as election director in Howard County for four years after leaving Prince George's and then retired. He said he was called back after his predecessor left the area.

Before he retired, Antonetti's long career was marked by turbulence. He was ordered to pay a $7,500 ethics fine for hiring family members as part-time workers in Prince George's, and he sued the Howard County Elections Board for more pay -- a case that was settled with undisclosed terms.

Yesterday, Antonetti did not dispute Baker's statements about the electronic transmissions, and he conceded that 15 polling sites opened late because, he said, technicians he had hired did not show up.

Yet Antonetti flatly rejected any suggestion that the results were compromised. "There is no fraud in this county," he said. "That's a very bad accusation, and it's usually sour grapes."

Antonetti said election judges had been instructed to have the cards delivered to his office if they were unsuccessful after two attempts to transmit electronically. According to the directions, the cards were to be secured in locked bags and driven to the office by technicians who did not have a key.

Oliver Smith, a chief election judge in Cheverly, said that after a day with frustrating electronic equipment, he ordered the cards delivered to the office without even trying to transmit electronically. "Considering that we had some problems with our voter access cards, we had two machines that had failed and it was getting late, I wasn't going to take any more chances," he said.

Still, because of the security precautions, Smith said he was certain the results were not compromised.

Antonetti said that a number of cards were accidentally left in voting machines and that the last of those cards -- close to three dozen in as many machines -- were expected to be delivered to his office late yesterday. On Wednesday, election officials said data were not received from 81 of the county's 2,056 voting machines. The numbers represented two whole precincts -- in Chillum and Landover -- as well as cards from machines at 34 polling stations.

Although the machines have not been under guard, Antonetti said he is confident the cards have not been tampered with. The machines are kept in locked cases, he said, and security tape ensures that any tampering with a machine would be evident.

Edwards described the delay in reporting as "very suspicious." "I don't want to rush to judgment," she said. "I'm still trying to figure out what is going on."

Edwards has asked not only for data from each precinct, but also for "machine-by-machine data."

"They need to verify the chain of custody of these machines," she said.

Antonetti blamed the problems in part on the rapid pace of technological change, which he said was driven by Linda H. Lamone, the state elections administrator. He also accused her office of missing delivery deadlines, leaving the county short on materials needed to train 3,000 election workers, and altering procedures belatedly.

DOJ_NMG_0064490

Lamone rejected the allegations, saying that older equipment Antonetti had on hand for training purposes did not differ significantly from the equipment used in the primary.

She noted that Antonetti, unlike many other elections administrators, declined to hire technical support workers from Diebold Inc., manufacturer of the voting machines.

Antonetti said the workers were too expensive and, in his view, no better trained than the less-well-paid technical staff he hired after advertising in newspapers.

Prince George's County State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey (D) said yesterday that he was concerned enough about the balloting to call the state prosecutor's office, which, he said, has jurisdiction over election issues.

Ivey said that even if voter irregularities were within his purview, he would have to refer the matter to another authority because of his endorsement of Baker.

Former Prosecutor Wins Ohio Dem. Primary (AP-Y)

By James Hannah

AP, September 16, 2006

A former assistant federal prosecutor easily won a Democratic special primary Friday to face U.S. Rep. Mike Turner in November.

Richard Chema had 73 percent, or 5,758 votes, compared with former Waynesville Mayor Charles Sanders who had 27 percent, or 2,105 votes, in Ohio's 3rd District, according to unofficial results.

The special primary was required to replace Stephanie Studebaker, who dropped out of the race Aug. 15 when she and her husband were charged with domestic violence after police answered calls about a fight at their home.

Chema, 50, was an assistant U.S. attorney from 1994 to 2006 in the Southern District of Ohio and previously an attorney in the Navy's JAG Corps, serving as prosecutor at Naval Intelligence Command in Washington.

Chema is expected to have a tough battle Nov. 7 against Turner, a second-term Republican congressman who has made a name for himself on military and urban issues and won 62 percent of the vote in 2004.

The district includes Dayton — where Turner used to be mayor — and runs through fast-growing suburbs, bedroom communities and farm country.

Dayton has historically been Democratic territory, with labor unions spawned by the auto industry wielding heavy influence. But a strong Republican presence in the city's suburbs combined with conservative voters in the rural areas have given the GOP more clout.

Capitalism With A Heart (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

Compassionate conservatism has been an expensive bust in Washington. But an intriguing alternative is emerging around the country: compassionate capitalism.

Tycoons have traditionally discovered their inner saint only after exorcising the inner capitalist. Carnegie, Ford and Gates made their money and then gave it away. But Google's young founders are already taking on poverty, disease and global warming, and they're not just dispensing cash. They've set up their philanthropy as a for-profit organization.

To many liberals, this sounds dangerously oxymoronic. How can philanthropy be profitable? A robber baron is supposed to cleanse his hands by donating his lucre to a foundation run by enlightened beings untainted by commerce (except for the dividends going into their trust funds).

This new Google venture also makes conservatives suspicious. It sounds like the "corporate social responsibility" mantra used by executives trying to be hip — and impress young trophy wives' friends — by financing politically correct boondoggles with shareholders' money.

But to a new generation of entrepreneurs, there's no conflict between capitalism and compassion. Google's philanthropy is the logical extension of a doing-well-by-doing-good strategy followed by companies like Ben and Jerry's, Starbucks and REI. The movement's philosopher is John Mackey, the co-founder of Whole Foods.

Mackey is a passionate environmentalist, an advocate of animal rights, a promoter of sustainable development — and a self-proclaimed libertarian. Call him a bleeding-heart libertarian. He wants to spread the free-market gospel, but he sees an obstacle.

"Corporations are lifting billions of people out of poverty," he says. "Why are they so hated?"

Mackey's answer is that capitalism has a branding problem: its practitioners are experts at marketing everything except their own system. They justify corporate philanthropy, like donating to the United Way, not because it's virtuous but because it buys public good will and thus contributes to the company's bottom line. To hard-core free-marketeers, the corporation's only mission is to generate profits for shareholders.

To Mackey, that's too narrow a vision. He thinks that socially conscious companies like Whole Foods have flourished because their founders, employees and customers want a corporation to have grander goals than enriching shareholders. Mackey defines his company's mission as improving the health and well-being of everyone on the planet. Before taking the company public, he told investors that he was going to devote 5 percent of the profits to philanthropy, so they can't complain now that he's robbing them.

Nor can Google's shareholders, because its founders also warned investors of their philanthropic plans. As Katie Hafner reported in The Times, they've given $1 billion in seed money to Google.org, and set up the philanthropy as a for-profit organization so it can work with venture capitalists, start companies and use any profits to finance further endeavors. One of its first projects is developing a car that gets 100 miles per gallon.

It's smart of Google's founders to try using capitalist tools to save the planet; the market's discipline should keep their philanthropy from backing too many lost causes. Still, whatever Google.org accomplishes, I'd bet that it will pale next to the social good accomplished by Google.com.

The company's founders may not have set out to help humanity with their search engine, but they have enriched countless lives by spreading ideas and connecting people. Maybe they're also smart enough to come up with a way to save gasoline, but what do they know about cars that Toyota doesn't?

If you read Adam Smith's famous passage about the invisible hand causing capitalists to unwittingly serve the public interest, you might conclude that Google's founders are better off investing their time and money in improving their core business. As Smith wrote, "I have never known much good done by those who affected to trade for the public good."

But I don't think Smith would have any problem with Google.org. He also realized that humans are motivated by more than self-interest. He wrote a long book on moral sentiments. If compassionate capitalism is a more appealing brand, if Google and Whole Foods are using philanthropy to strengthen the invisible hand, even Smith would say they're doing good.

Killing Off The American Future (NYT)

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

America's domination of the global information economy did not come about by accident. It flowed directly from policies that allowed the largest generation in the nation's history broad access to a first-rate college education regardless of ability to pay. By subsidizing public universities to keep tuition low, and providing federal tuition aid to poor and working-class students, this country vaulted tens of millions of people into the middle class while building the best-educated work force in the world.

Those farsighted policies, however, are a thing of the past. Cuts in college aid and soaring tuition at state colleges have made it difficult for young people to educate themselves at a time when a college degree has become the basic price of admission to both the middle class and the global economy.

The warning about American vulnerability, which has been sounded in several reports of late, was underscored yet again in a study by the National Center for Public Policy and Higher Education, a nonpartisan research organization. The report highlights some ominous trends. As the well-schooled boomers march off into retirement, the generation that replaces them is shaping up to be less educated by far. No longer the world leader in terms of the proportion of young people enrolled in college, the country now ranks 16th among the 27 nations examined when it comes to the proportion of college students who complete college degrees or certificate programs.

When judged in terms of college affordability, 43 American states are given F's in the new report. In addition to disinvesting in higher education, the states — and the colleges themselves — have shifted aid once aimed at the poor students to the middle and upper income levels. They are essentially following the lead of the federal government, which has adopted the same strategy, while failing to sustain its commitment to poor students who once could have attended college on the Pell Grant program alone.

Unless America renews its commitment to the higher education policies that made the country great, we could soon find ourselves at the mercy of an increasingly competitive global economy. And if we let ourselves hit bottom, it could take generations for us to dig ourselves out.

In A Replay Of Iraq, A Battle Is Brewing Over Intelligence On Iran (MERCN/mCT)

WASHINGTON - In an echo of the intelligence wars that preceded the U.S. invasion of Iraq, a high-stakes struggle is brewing within the Bush administration and in Congress over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program and involvement in terrorism.

U.S. intelligence and counterterrorism officials say Bush political appointees and hard-liners on Capitol Hill have tried recently to portray Iran's nuclear program as more advanced than it is and to exaggerate Tehran's role in Hezbollah's attack on Israel in mid-July.

The struggle's outcome could have profound implications for U.S. policy.

President Bush, who addresses the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday, has said he prefers diplomacy to stop Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, but he hasn't ruled out using military force.

Several former U.S. defense officials who maintain close ties to the Pentagon say they've been told that plans for airstrikes - if Bush deems them necessary - are being updated.

The leader of a Persian Gulf country who visited Washington recently came away without receiving assurances he sought that the military option was off the table, said a person with direct knowledge of the meetings.

"It seems like Iran is becoming the new Iraq," said one U.S. counterterrorism official.

This official and others spoke on condition of anonymity because the information involved is classified.

But one facet of the dispute broke into public view in recent days.

The International Atomic Energy Agency complained in an unusual letter made public on Thursday that a House intelligence committee report on Iran contains "erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated information."

A top official of the IAEA, which conducts nuclear inspections in Iran and elsewhere, wrote that the report exaggerated advances Tehran has made in enriching uranium, which can be used to fuel nuclear arms if made pure enough. The official, Vilmos Cserveny, said the report also falsely claimed that IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei had removed an inspector from Iran for being too aggressive.

Cserveny's letter was addressed to intelligence committee chairman Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich.

Hoekstra spokesman Jamal Ware said that the reference to weapons-grade uranium in the report was in a photo caption, but that the report makes clear elsewhere that Iran has not yet achieved that capability.

Committee aides say the report was meant to provoke discussion about Iran and wasn't a call for exaggerated intelligence.

The dispute was a virtual rerun of the months before the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, when ElBaradei and his agency questioned claims that Saddam Hussein was aggressively seeking nuclear weapons. Some top U.S. officials sought to discredit ElBaradei, although the IAEA's assessment proved correct.

The IAEA's written protest, dated Tuesday, was echoed privately by U.S. intelligence analysts, who saw the House report as an attempt to discredit the CIA and other agencies on Iran.

The situations with Iran now and Iraq four years ago, when Bush and his aides were making the case for war, aren't completely parallel.

Even officials and foreign countries that were skeptical about Iraq agree that Iran is probably seeking a nuclear weapon. And there is widespread consensus that Tehran is the No. 1 state sponsor of terrorism in the world.

But there are sharp differences over Iran's capabilities and actions.

Some officials at the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the State Department said they're concerned that the offices of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney may be receiving a stream of questionable information that originates with Iranian exiles, including a discredited arms dealer, Manucher Ghorbanifar, who played a role in the 1980s Iran-Contra scandal.

Officials at all three agencies said they suspect that the dubious information may include claims that Iran directed Hezbollah, the Lebanese militant group, to kidnap two Israeli soldiers in July; that Iran's nuclear program is moving faster than generally believed; and that the Iranian people are eager to join foreign efforts to overthrow their theocratic rulers.

The officials said there is no reliable intelligence to support any of those assertions and some that contradicts all three.

The officials said they fear a replay of the administration's mishandling of what turned out to be bogus information from Iraqi exiles in the run-up to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, documented earlier this month in a Senate intelligence committee report.

But they said this time, intelligence analysts and others are more forcefully challenging claims they believe to be false or questionable.

"There's no question that people are less afraid to speak up after what happened in Iraq," said one intelligence official. "There's less of an inclination to let Cheney and Rumsfeld run free."

It is, said a second U.S. intelligence official, "a little more difficult to try to put forward a one-sided view." Analysts "are not willing to be rolled over," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0064493

On Hezbollah, officials say they have fought to tone down administration public statements and internal briefing papers about Iran's complicity in the attack on Israel, which sparked a month-long war.

"They're just basically saying all kinds of wacky stuff," said the first counter-terrorism official. "Now Iran is (said to be) responsible for everything Hezbollah does."

Iran is widely believed to be arming, funding and helping train Hezbollah as its proxy among Lebanon's Shiite Muslims. But a majority of analysts believe Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah maintains quite a bit of independence.

"No one says that Hezbollah is completely independent," said a U.S. intelligence official. But, "I'm not sure anyone thinks Iran ordered the kidnapping of the Israelis."

Adding to the unease, Rumsfeld's office earlier this year set up a new Iranian directorate, reported to be under the leadership of neoconservatives who played a role in planning the Iraq war.

Current and former officials said the Pentagon's Iranian directorate has been headed by Abram Shulsky. Shulsky also was the head of the now-defunct Office of Special Plans, whose role in allegedly manipulating Iraq intelligence is under investigation by the Pentagon's inspector general.

Some officials say they fear the office, whose existence was first reported by the Los Angeles Times, is being used to funnel intelligence from Ghorbanifar, the arms dealer, and an Iranian exile group known as the Mujahedeen Khalq.

A Pentagon spokeswoman didn't return two phone calls seeking comment about the office.

Bill Murray, a retired CIA station chief in Paris who met with a Ghorbanifar associate and found his claims about Iran to be bogus, called the office's establishment "a big bell ringer."

"That is outright manipulation of information to suggest a predetermined policy," Murray said.

European Diplomat Cites Gains In Iran Talks (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

BRUSSELS, Sept. 15 — The European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, offered Friday his most upbeat assessment to date on the nuclear impasse, insisting that talks to persuade Iran to suspend uranium enrichment were progressing.

"I can say honestly that we're making progress," he told reporters. "It doesn't mean that everything has been solved."

In another sign that some headway is being made, a senior Bush administration official said later that Mr. Solana would meet with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, in New York on Sunday. The official, and others cited in this article, insisted they not be quoted by name, following normal diplomatic protocol.

The European Union is softening its previous position that Iran must suspend enrichment before any negotiations can begin. Instead, officials said, there was momentum behind a twin-track approach of starting negotiations before enrichment is halted while simultaneously allowing discussion of possible penalties against Iran to continue at the United Nations.

The United States has insisted that Iran suspend enrichment before any negotiations can take place, though on Tuesday Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the administration might stop seeking to impose sanctions if Iran suspended enrichment. European Union officials said they were still examining an offer by Iran last weekend temporarily to suspend its nuclear enrichment program in return for the beginning of negotiations over a package of economic and political incentives offered by the West.

A senior French diplomat close to the talks said that the mood in European diplomacy toward Iran had shifted. "Things with Iran are not as difficult as they were before," the official said. "There is a growing sense that suspension and negotiations can happen in parallel, and that flexibility is better than a dead end."

The United States acknowledged Thursday that it faced resistance from crucial allies over its attempt to press for sanctions.

President Bush, who will visit the United Nations next week for meetings, said Friday he was worried Iran was trying to drag out the process with the United States and its European allies.

"My concern is that they'll stall, they'll try to wait us out," he said. "So part of my objective in New York is to remind people that stalling shouldn't be allowed. We need to move the process."

Mr. Solana played down the threat of sanctions, saying that Washington was still willing to give diplomacy a chance. "I don't think our American friends will be losing their patience," he said.

But he cautioned that the window for negotiations would not stay open indefinitely. "The United Nations resolution is a track that is still open," he said, but added: "Dialogue will not last forever. That is not our idea."

Solana Sees Hope Of Deal With Iran On Nuclear Enrichment (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0064494

By Daniel Dombey In Brussels

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, yesterday raised expectations of a deal over Iran's nuclear programme when he said that talks were proceeding better than ever.

But he also made clear that the EU still wanted reassurances that the Iranian negotiators' position was fully backed by the leadership in Tehran.

"We are really making progress: never before have we had a level of engagement and a level of discussion . . . as we have now," Mr Solana said of the talks he is carrying out with Iran on behalf of the world's big powers.

The EU has responded positively to the informal proposal, floated by Iran's top nuclear security official Ali Larijani, that Tehran could temporarily halt uranium enrichment once formal negotiations began.

Uranium enrichment can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons material and is the issue at the heart at the dispute over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Previously, the EU had insisted that Iran suspend uranium enrichment before formal negotiations can begin.

The bloc is now watering down its insistence that Iran act first. Yesterday Mr Solana said only that negotiations could not begin if Iran was still carrying out enrichment - a nod to Mr Larijani's idea that the start of negotiations and the suspension of enrichment could be simultaneous.

However, EU diplomats say they can only agree a deal if they are sure that Mr Larijani's initiative is fully backed by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader.

Mr Solana said talks scheduled last Thursday between himself and Mr Larijani had been downgraded because "a little bit more time was needed in order to reach a consensus in his [Mr Larijani's] own country, among his own leadership . . . to convey to me a possible positive answer."

The two men are expected to meet soon. In the meantime, EU diplomats are trying to nail down exactly what Iran means when it refers to suspending uranium enrichment and to win reassurances that Washington would also sign up to a possible deal.

This is important since the US has offered to sit down with Iran at the negotiating table for the first time since the Islamic revolution of 1979 if Tehran suspends enrichment and enters formal negotiations.

Many US officials are thought to be concerned about the temporary nature of any suspension and reluctant to give any further concessions to Tehran, which is already bound by a UN Security Council resolution to halt uranium enrichment.

However, Russia and China, which both hold Security Council vetoes, have long resisted the alternative path of subjecting Iran to UN sanctions and are still less likely to endorse sanctions in the current atmosphere of compromise.

EU Reports Progress In Iran Nuke Talks (AP)

By Paul Ames, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana was optimistic Friday about progress in talks to persuade Iran to bring its nuclear program into line with international demands.

Solana is trying to persuade Iran to accept an offer of economic and political rewards if it agrees to consider a long-term moratorium on uranium enrichment and commits to an enrichment freeze before talks on details of the incentives package.

"We are really making progress," Solana said. "Never before have we had the level of engagement, and a level of discussion of issues which are difficult."

Iran insists it has a right to develop its enrichment program to generate electricity. But there is increased concern it wants to make weapons-grade uranium for nuclear warheads. Its defiance of a Security Council demand that it stop enrichment activities has prompted U.S. calls for a quick move to impose sanctions.

The Europeans are hoping the talks by Solana's team can bring a negotiated end to the nuclear standoff with Iran.

Solana said he hoped for a new meeting with Iran's top negotiator, Ali Larijani, in the coming days. Lower level talks had been going on daily since Sunday, when he and Larijani last met in Vienna, Austria, he said.

"The atmosphere is good," Solana told a news conference. "We don't want to lose the momentum that was created in Vienna."

Officials in delegations familiar with the outcome of Sunday's talks said this week that Larijani had suggested his country was ready to consider an enrichment freeze for up to two months.

Solana did not confirm that. He said a planned meeting with Larijani was postponed Thursday because "a little bit more time was needed in order (for Larijani) to find consensus in his own country, among his own leadership."

DOJ_NMG_0064495

Instead the two men spoke by phone and Solana said he hoped the delay in face-to-face talks would allow Larijani to return with a "possible positive answer" to ideas the European negotiator put forward last weekend.

Iran has balked at a demand issued by the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members and Germany for an enrichment freeze before any talks begin on further de-escalation of the nuclear standoff.

Solana suggested one solution could be to start negotiations at the same time as Iran announces a suspension.

"But we will not negotiate formally with activity on enrichment," Solana said. "That is understood also by the Iranians."

The permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — Russia, China, the United States, France and Britain - along with Germany, have been leading efforts to end the standoff. However the six have not been able to agree on what to do if Iran does not fall into line. China and Russia have refused to follow the tough line sought by Washington.

Bush Warns Iran, Scolds UN On Darfur (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, September 16, 2006

US President George W. Bush said he would push his hard line on Iran next week at the United Nations, and scolded the world body for its inaction on Sudan's violence-wracked Darfur region.

Bush, who will address the UN General Assembly in New York on Tuesday, said he liked UN chief Kofi Annan personally but warned that that many Americans were wary of the United Nations and that he agreed when it came to Sudan.

"I'm frustrated with the United Nations in regards to Darfur," the US president said in a wide-ranging 58-minute press conference in the White House Rose Garden. "The United Nations hasn't acted."

The UN Security Council last month approved the deployment of a 20,000 UN force in Darfur to replace an African Union force, whose mandate runs out on September 30. But the Sudanese government has refused to give its blessing.

"I'd like to see more robust United Nations action. What you'll hear is, 'Well, the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act.' Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a resolution saying, 'We're coming in with a UN force in order to save lives,'" he suggested.

Amid European optimism that talks with Iran are making progress towards defusing the standoff over its nuclear weapons, Bush warned US partners not to take pressure off Tehran, which he suggested was playing for time.

"My concern is that, you know, they'll stall; they'll try to wait us out," he said. "So part of my objective in New York is to remind people that's stalling shouldn't be allowed."

Asked whether he would consider meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on the UN sidelines, Bush replied sternly: "No, I'm not going to meet with him."

"I have made it clear to the Iranian regime that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program, and I meant what I said," the US president said.

Bush denied that there was now a civil war in Iraq, where nearly 2,700 US troops have been killed and many more wounded, and rejected a US intelligence report of a dire picture of al-Anbar province.

US generals and Iraqi leaders "just don't agree with the hypothesis it is a civil war," he said, adding that "this business about 'al-Anbar is lost' is just not the case. That's not what our commanders think."

That was a direct response to a recent US Marines intelligence assessment that reportedly declared prospects for securing Anbar "dim" and warned "there is almost nothing the US military can do" to improve the situation.

The president's comments came with less than two months before November 7 legislative elections, at a time when many of his Republicans fear the unpopular war in Iraq could cost them dearly at the polls.

Bush used his opening statement to mount a forceful defense of some controversial strategies in the global war on terrorism, including warrantless wiretapping of Americans, secret CIA prisons, military tribunals for terrorism suspects, and harsh interrogation tactics some call torture.

Bush warned the US Congress that "time is running out" for lawmakers to pass legislation safeguarding such practices, which he called vital to saving US lives and preventing attacks like the September 11, 2001 strikes.

He grew visibly annoyed when asked whether former US secretary of state Colin Powell was right to warn that "the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

"It's unacceptable to think that there's any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children," said Bush.

On another front, he rejected charges that his administration has not done enough to catch Al-Qaeda mastermind Osama bin Laden as an "urban myth" fueled by political ambitions.

"We have been on the hunt, and we'll stay on the hunt until we bring him to justice," said Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0064496

But he acknowledged telling a conservative journalist earlier this week that he would not send "thousands of troops" into the remote region of the Pakistan border with Afghanistan, where bin Laden is thought to be hiding.

"If he is in Pakistan," said Bush, "Pakistan's a sovereign nation. In order for us to send thousands of troops into a sovereign nation, we've got to be invited by the government of Pakistan."

U.S.: Iran Restricting Religious Freedom (AP)

By Barry Schweid, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

A "threatening atmosphere" in Iran is causing a deterioration in already restricted religious freedom for nearly all minorities despite repeated expressions of concern by the United Nations, the State Department said Friday.

Baha'is and Sufi Muslims especially and other religious groups not recognized by the Iranian constitution are not free to practice their faiths, the department said in its annual report to Congress on religious freedom around the world.

Eight countries, including Iran, were cited for particularly severe violations of religious freedom. The others were Burma, China, Eritrea, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Vietnam.

"We hope this report will serve as a source of encouragement for those whose plight is documented in this report," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

"While democracy and respect for basic freedoms have gained ground throughout the world, many governments still pay no more than lip service to their responsibilities under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international agreements," said John V. Hanford III, U.S. ambassador at large for international religious freedom.

At a news conference, Hanford credited Vietnam with making "enormous progress" on religious freedom, and said in Saudi Arabia "we see things moving in the right direction."

On the other hand, he denounced Uzbekistan for singling out some Muslims and Christians for "brutal treatment" on the grounds that they support terrorism. There are instances of abusing Muslims on the basis of no more than wearing a beard, he said.

Israel's response to terrorist attacks in Palestinian-held territories has severely curtailed access by Palestinians to their places of worship, the report said, although it said the Jewish state for the most part respects religious freedom.

There were credible reports, meanwhile, that the Palestinian Authority colluded with members of gangs to seize land from Christians, it said.

Islam is the official religion in Saudi Arabia and the law requires all citizens to be Muslims. Public practice of other religions is prohibited.

And yet, the report said, the Saudi government continued a campaign against official extremism while King Abdullah and other Saudi officials called for the promotion of tolerance.

Still, there were instances in which imams made intolerant statements toward Jews and other religious groups.

The U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, an independent U.S. government agency, said it was "simply shocked" by what it called an unwarranted softening of the State Department's assessment of Saudi Arabia.

"Freedom of religion does not exist in Saudi Arabia," Felice D. Gaer, the commission chair, said in a statement.

The Saudi government persists in banning all forms of public religious expression other than the government's own interpretation of one school of Sunni Islam and forcefully represses private religious practice, the commission said.

It also said that Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan and Pakistan should be added to the list of the eight most severe violators of religious freedom.

In Sudan, the State Department found some improvement in respect for religious freedom, but in the north of the country the government denied building permits for Christian churches and required all students to study Islam.

In France, some religious groups remain concerned about a 2004 law that bans the wearing of conspicuous religious symbols in public schools. And despite government efforts to stop them, anti-Semitic attacks persisted.

In Pakistan, the report said, reform-minded Muslims were intimidated and Ahmadiyya community continued to barred from practicing their faith.

US Slams Iran, Chides Israel And Other Allies Over Lack Of Religious Freedoms (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, September 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064497

The United States assailed Iran for its worsening treatment of religious minorities, but also chided Israel and some other allies in its annual report on religious freedoms around the world.

The State Department report said there had been a "further deterioration of the extremely poor status of respect for religious freedom" in Iran since the election in June 2005 of hardliner Mahmud Ahmadinejad as president.

Iran, which is locked in confrontation with the United States over its suspected nuclear arms program and its support for radical Islamic movements in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, continued its "harsh and oppressive treatment" of religious minorities.

Targets for abuse, including imprisonment and harrassment, included Zoroastrians, Jews and Christians -- members of the only officially recognized minority religions in the Islamic state.

"Government actions and rhetoric created a threatening atmosphere for nearly all who do not practice ... Shia Islam," it said.

The release to Congress of the "Report on International Religious Freedom" is a precursor to the announcement each year of a blacklist of countries "of particular concern" that are subject to US sanctions.

Iran headed last year's list alongside China, Eritrea, Myanmar, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Vietnam.

The blacklist will be updated in several weeks based on the findings of Friday's report, which covered religious freedoms in 197 countries and territories, officials said.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the government's goal was broader than targeting a handful of repressive regimes.

"Religious freedom is deeply rooted in our principles and our history as a nation," she said. "And it is now integral to our efforts to combat terrorism and the ideology of hatred that fuels it."

The report also complained about the impact of Israel's construction of a controversial wall around the West Bank in response to attacks by Palestinian militants, saying the barrier "limited access to sacred sites and seriously impeded the work of religious organizations" who provide needed social services.

An executive summary of the report singled out 20 countries where the treatment of religious minorities remains of "significant interest" to the US government.

The group included a collection of US foes and allies alike: Afghanistan, Brunei, Cuba, Egypt, India, Israel and the Palestinian territories, Laos, Pakistan, Russia, Sri Lanka, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan.

John Hanford, who oversaw the report as the State Department's ambassador at large for international religious freedom, strongly hinted in a briefing for reporters that this year's blacklist would include Uzbekistan -- which was spared sanctions last year despite the recommendations of an official panel.

"In our assessment, the status of religious freedom declined in the past year in Uzbekistan," he said, noting a "severe" increase in penalties for belonging to unauthorised denominations and "inappropriate arrests" of Muslims on suspicion of terrorism.

At the same time Hanford strongly indicated that Vietnam could be dropped from the black list and also noted important improvements in religious tolerance in Afghanistan, India, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Sudan.

"Vietnam has turned the page and made tremendous progress on religious freedom," he said.

The US was also "very encouraged" by steps taken by the Saudi authorities to reign in the country's "religious police," permit private religious worship and remove anti-Semitic and anti-Christian references from school textbooks, he said.

Those assessments drew a scathing response from the US Commission on International Religious Freedom, a congressionally funded panel that advises the State Department.

"The commission is simply shocked that the department removed longstanding and widely quoted language from its report that freedom of religion does not exist in Saudi Arabia," said Felice Gaer, the panel's chairwoman.

She also said "serious abuses continue against members of all of Vietnam's religious communities" and that Hanoi should remain on the religion blacklist.

Religious Extremism Global Threat, U.S. Warns (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

A rise in fundamentalism around the world poses an increasing threat to religious freedoms and could inspire new sectarian violence, a senior State Department official said yesterday as the U.S. government released its annual global survey on religious freedom.

DOJ_NMG_0064498

John V. Hanford III, State Department ambassador-at-large for international religious freedom, said the new religious fundamentalism could be seen in a number of faiths, but the latest report contained sharp criticisms of a number of Muslim states, including Iran, Saudi Arabia and Uzbekistan.

The rise in fundamentalism "is not restricted to one religion," Mr. Hanford said in a press briefing, saying it could be seen in "certain corners of the Muslim world, the Hindu world and the Buddhist world."

"Followers of this approach to various faiths have increasingly taken efforts either to create sectarian violence and attack people of other faiths, or to try to work through their governments to bring about change that would pass laws highly restrictive on other religions," he said.

Eight countries -- Burma, China, Eritrea, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Vietnam -- are listed as countries of "particular concern" by the U.S. government for their records on religious repression. An updated list of problem countries will be issued in the next few weeks, Mr. Hanford said.

Despite the resentment and diplomatic tensions the report has sparked in the past, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in releasing the report that promoting religious freedom and tolerance abroad "is an essential component of our national security."

In Iran, the report found a "further deterioration of the extremely poor status of respect of religious freedom" in the 12-month period ending June 30, in particular for the Islamic republic's Baha'i and Sufi Muslim minorities.

Mr. Hanford also singled out Uzbekistan for criticism for its recent crackdown on religious minorities, saying the government of President Islam Karimov had stepped up restrictions on both Christian and Islamic groups not registered with authorities.

The most delicate case in the report may be Saudi Arabia, a strict Islamic state but also a critical U.S. ally and oil supplier in the volatile Middle East. The report found no change in the state of religious freedom in the kingdom in the past year, but Mr. Hanford said there were signs of a more tolerant attitude by Saudi leaders.

Miss Rice used her legal authority to waive sanctions against Saudi Arabia despite its record on religious intolerance.

"Some of the issues that would concern us about religious freedom are so endemic to [Saudi] society and to its role within Islam, that these sorts of issues are not going to change in the near future," Mr. Hanford said.

But, he added, "we are very encouraged by the position of the Saudi government ... as well as by a number of statements that have been made by King Abdullah, which I think are forward-leaning."

But the Saudi Arabia section of the report was sharply criticized by the head of the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, an independent federal monitoring agency.

Commission Chairwoman Felice D. Gaer said her panel was "simply shocked" by a softening of the language criticizing Saudi Arabia's record. Previous State Department assessments had flatly stated that freedom of religion "does not exist" in Saudi Arabia.

She said the Saudi government sharply limits religious practice at home and bankrolls activities around the world that promote the kingdom's restrictive brand of Islam.

She added that evidence provided in the new department report justified adding Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan and Pakistan to the list of countries of particular concern when the new designation list is released.

Mr. Hanford said U.S. officials have seen improvements in religious tolerance in some countries, including Laos and Vietnam. He said the United States had refrained from using sanctions against Vietnam despite its designation as a country of particular concern.

"Vietnam has turned the corner and made enormous progress on religious freedom," he said.

Bush Urges U.N. To Act On Sudan (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

President Bush suggested Friday that it may be time to override the objections of the Sudanese government in order to send international peacekeepers into Darfur.

"What you'll hear is, well, the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act," Bush said at a news conference in Washington. "Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a U.N. resolution saying we're coming in with a U.N. force in order to save lives."

"There's genocide taking place in Sudan. . . . Now is the time for the U.N. to act," he said.

President Bush suggested Friday it may be time to send international peacekeepers into Sudan's war-torn Darfur region over the objections of the government in Khartoum.

"What you'll hear is, well, the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act," Bush said. "Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a U.N. resolution saying we're coming in with a U.N. force in order to save lives."

More than 200,000 people have been killed in Darfur and over 2 million have fled their homes since 2003 when ethnic African tribes revolted against the Arab-led government. The government is accused of unleashing brutal Arab militiamen known as janjaweed in the remote western province.

The mandate for a weak African Union peacekeeping force, which hasn't been able to stop the violence, expires next month.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair called the situation unacceptable, and he urged international pressure on the Sudanese government and rebels to stop fighting immediately.

"Last May, we hoped the signature of the Darfur Peace Agreement by the government of Sudan and one rebel group would set Darfur on the road to peace," Blair said in a statement released early Saturday in London. "The non-signatory rebel groups must now accept it. And the government of Sudan must stop its military campaign."

Meanwhile, the resistance by some rebel groups to sign on to a May peace agreement to end the long conflict has prompted the government to ratchet up the fighting again. As the crisis deepens, many believe Darfur is poised for a catastrophic escalation in atrocities.

A Security Council resolution passed in August, aimed at strengthening the peacekeeping force, would hand it over to a better-funded, larger and more well-equipped U.N. mission. But the resolution is unlikely to take effect without the consent of the Sudanese government, something nations including the United States have worked — without success — to acquire.

Sudan's President Omar al-Bashir says a switch in command would violate the country's sovereignty and has warned that his army would fight any U.N. forces sent to Darfur.

At the State Department, Assistant Secretary Kristen Silverberg said the United States insisted that last month's resolution permit deployment of new peacekeepers over Sudanese objection.

"We think that the likelihood of ending the violence is much better if we have support and cooperation from the government of Sudan," she told reporters. "But it's not required."

But Bush, bringing up the subject as an example of general frustration with the world body, appeared angry that "the United Nations hasn't acted" on Darfur and wants to see a "more robust" effort. His comments suggested the possibility of a new, tougher resolution that would explicitly bypass approval from the Sudanese government.

"There's genocide taking place in Sudan. And it breaks our collective hearts to know that. ... I'm troubled by reports I hear about escalating violence," the president told reporters during a Rose Garden news conference. "Now is the time for the U.N. to act."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will gather diplomats from several countries to discuss Darfur during the United Nations General Assembly session that begins next week, Silverberg said. The participants and the agenda are not yet set.

It is generally thought that the United States does not support including American troops in the peacekeeping force, instead favoring the participation of NATO forces which would provide logistical and other support to any stepped-up mission.

Blair Says Darfur Situation In Sudan Is "Completely Unacceptable" (AFP-Y)

AFP, September 16, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticised the Sudanese government over the "completely unacceptable" situation in Darfur and accused it of breaking ceasefire agreements signed with rebels.

"I am committed to stepping up international efforts to bring a change of mind and action from the government of Sudan," the premier said, adding that the international community could not "just watch as this tragedy deepens."

Speaking on the eve of International Day for Darfur Sunday, Blair insisted that the crisis was "at the top" of his agenda as a number of human rights campaigners wrote an open letter to him in Britain's Independent newspaper.

"I have already talked to (Chinese) Premier Wen and President George Bush about Darfur in the last few days," he said.

"In the coming weeks, I will talk to other leaders to agree an initiative that sets out the help Sudan can expect if the government lives up to its obligations and what will happen if they don't."

He added that he "did not understand" Khartoum's rejection of the peacekeeping force authorised by a UN Security Council resolution last month.

"The government of Sudan must agree to the continuation of the African Union force and transition to the UN," Blair said.

Blair's comments echo those by Bush Friday that he was "frustrated" with the UN for failing to get a robust 20,000-strong force into the war-wracked province, again calling the situation in Darfur a "genocide."

DOJ_NMG_0064500

Oscar-winning Hollywood star George Clooney and Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel pleaded with the Security Council Thursday to act, with the actor calling the situation "the first genocide of the 21st century".

Darfur has been in the throes of a civil war since 2003 which has pitched rebel groups against the Khartoum government and allied Arab militia.

The conflict has killed around 300,000 people and displaced more than 2.5 million, according to the UN.

A peace accord signed in May between the Sudanese government and the main rebel groups was meant to end the conflict in the region but incidents between rebel factions in recent months have led to more deaths.

Senior members of the British Muslim, Jewish and Christian faiths will on Sunday gather outside Blair's Downing Street residence in central London to call for an end to the suffering in the troubled region.

Prayers written by the spiritual leader of the worldwide Anglican community, Archbishop of Canterbury Dr Rowan Williams and Britain's Chief Rabbi, Dr Jonathan Sacks, and leading British Muslim scholar Sheikh Ibrahim Mogra will be read out.

Mogra said: "The world must not stand by and witness another Holocaust, another Rwanda or another Bosnia."

The letter in the Independent -- which devoted its front page and four inside pages to the crisis -- urged Blair to "move Darfur to the top of its priority list until a UN force is deployed and the people of Darfur are protected".

It was signed by a number of religious leaders, including the former archbishop of Canterbury George Carey, musician and anti-poverty campaigner Bob Geldof, and the actress and UNICEF ambassador Mia Farrow.

Singer Elton John and his film producer partner David Furnish were also signatories.

"'Never again' is a well-worn phrase. Now is the time to show we mean it," they said.

Join Me To Help Save Darfur (LAT)

By Kofi A. Annan, Kofi A. Annan Is Secretary-general Of The United Nations.

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

The U.N. secretary-general asks for help in pressuring Sudan to accept more international troops.

TOMORROW, SEPT. 17, people around the world will be taking part in a "Global Day for Darfur" to show support for the people of Darfur and to put pressure on governments to protect innocent civilians. They are right, and I hope their call will be heard.

The glimmer of hope that many of us felt when the Darfur peace agreement was signed four months ago — albeit by only two of the warring parties — is being extinguished by renewed fighting among the factions. In violation of the agreement, the Sudanese government has sent thousands of troops to Darfur and renewed its bombing.

I strongly condemn this escalation. The government of Sudan should stop its offensive immediately. All parties should perform what they have promised and abide by the resolutions of the United Nations Security Council.

These latest clashes have brought yet more misery to the people of Darfur, who have already endured far too much. The total number of displaced people stands at 1.9 million. Nearly 3 million people depend on international aid for food, shelter and medical treatment, while aid workers have increasingly become the targets of violence — 12 have been killed just in the last two months.

A year ago, world leaders meeting at the U.N. agreed that all states have the responsibility to protect their populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity. The government of Sudan, if it fails in this sacred responsibility, will face opprobrium and disgrace throughout the world. Neither those who decide such policies nor those who carry them out should imagine that they will not be held accountable.

Once again, I urge Sudan to avoid this by accepting the Security Council's decision to deploy a U.N. peacekeeping operation, which would be better equipped and funded than the current African Union mission and have a clearer mandate to protect those in danger.

About 10,000 U.N. troops are already in Sudan. For more than a year, they have been helping to implement the peace agreement between northern and southern Sudan. On Aug. 31, the Security Council, while reaffirming its commitment to the sovereignty, unity, independence and territorial integrity of Sudan, authorized the deployment of up to 17,300 additional troops to Darfur to implement the peace agreement. There is no hidden agenda, no other ambition than to help the people of Darfur to live in peace and in dignity. But the government of Sudan has refused.

Putting the extra U.N. troops in place will in any case take time. Therefore, the Security Council also called for strengthening the African Union mission, or AMIS, so that it can carry on until the U.N. arrives. The Africans have repeatedly asked for this transition but say that in the meantime their troops, who have performed valiantly in very difficult conditions, need help.

The U.N. has agreed to support AMIS during the crucial transition period. But AMIS will also need increased support from donors — including the League of Arab States, which has offered vital backing and wants AMIS to stay until the end of the year.

I have tried repeatedly to explain the transition to the government of Sudan and to clear up any misconceptions or myths. In public and in private I have stressed the humanitarian situation and appealed to the government's own pragmatic good sense.

But my voice is not enough. Whoever, in Africa or beyond, is in a position to influence the government of Sudan must do so without delay.

The Security Council, and especially its five permanent members — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — have a particular responsibility to ensure that the message to the government of Sudan is strong, clear and uniform. But every voice raised makes a difference, and therefore the responsibility is shared among us all. I urge everyone to join their voices with mine in asking the government of Sudan to embrace the spirit of the Security Council's resolution, to consent to the transition and to pursue the political process with new energy.

There can be no military solution to the crisis in Darfur. All parties should have understood by now, after so much death and destruction, that only a political agreement — in which all stakeholders are fully engaged — can bring real peace to the region.

Twelve years ago, the United Nations, and the world, failed the people of Rwanda in their time of need. Can we now, in all conscience, stand by and watch as the tragedy deepens in Darfur?

For Darfur Women, Survival Means Leaving Camp, Risking Rape (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

GRAIDA, Sudan, Sept. 15 -- The tall, light-skinned man reeking of sweat and cigarettes often gallops his horse right into the nightmares of Darelsalam Ahmed Eisa, 18. Each time, she said, he throws her to the ground, pushes up her skirt and forces himself inside her while muttering: " Abdah. Abdah. Abdah ."

Slave woman. Slave woman. Slave woman.

He was in her dreams just last night, she recalled, as real and horrifying in his green camouflage uniform as he was the day he raped her two months ago. But when Eisa awoke this morning, there was no time for terror, no time for tears. She covered herself in an orange and blue cloth, grabbed the family's ax and departed for the perilous Darfur countryside, out of the relative safety of a sprawling camp for people displaced by the violence in this region of western Sudan.

In the wilderness, Eisa can find grass for the donkeys and firewood for cooking. But it is also where government-backed militias known as the Janjaweed roam, terrorizing villagers. Violence and disease in Darfur have killed as many as 450,000 people since 2003, and an estimated 2 million have been forced to flee their homes.

The government and a rebel group reached a cease-fire agreement in May, but since then, rapes in and around camps for people displaced by the fighting have surged, aid groups and residents say. The International Rescue Committee has recorded more then 200 sexual assaults among residents of a single camp near Nyala, a town in South Darfur state, during a five-week period in July and August.

More and more often, women in Darfur face the starkest of choices: risk being raped by leaving the camps in search of firewood and grass, or starve. If they invite their brothers or husbands along to protect them, the Janjaweed will still rape the women, they say, and kill the men.

"It is better for me to be raped than for my brother to be killed," said Eisa, soft-spoken and round-faced, with hair braided into tight rows beneath her head scarf. She has two children, ages 2 and 5, but no husband. He divorced Eisa last year, she said, after she quarreled with one of his elder wives.

But Eisa is not alone. On this morning, as she walked with the ax on her shoulder, her sister, Aziza, 15, was just a few paces behind. Other women and girls, on foot and on donkeys, soon joined them in a haphazard convoy of mothers, daughters and sisters flowing west, away from the low morning sun.

They passed braying donkeys and smoky wood fires in the camp. They passed children playing soccer and rolling pot lids with sticks. And they passed an African Union military base, close enough to hear a sputtering generator there that powers satellite televisions. On the screens, images of slinky Bollywood dancers entertained the lonely men who are posted at the base to monitor the cease-fire but rarely venture beyond the double-coiled razor wire of their perimeter.

Eisa, her sister and an 18-year-old friend had followed the same path on the day in July that they were attacked.

But that day, they had gone farther -- about two hours west instead of one -- in search of a variety of grass that fetches a higher profit at the camp's makeshift markets, about 75 cents per sack rather than the 50 cents paid for the grass collected near the camp. They had four donkeys with them that day, so 25 cents more per pack meant maybe a couple of dollars more in earnings for the day.

After walking for about two hours, they had nearly reached the better grass when dozens of Janjaweed militiamen on horses and camels suddenly appeared, surrounding the young women.

Aziza tried to run but was caught within seconds and struck in the face. Eisa froze. Quickly and roughly, the men separated the two sisters and their friend, with a man taking each one to a secluded spot.

The tall, light-skinned man was riding a reddish-brown horse, Eisa said. He was clean-shaven and armed with a machine gun. "I will take you," the man told Eisa. "My wife needs a slave."

He then ordered Eisa to lie on her back, but she refused. She knew that if he raped her and the community learned of the attack, she would probably never be able to remarry.

Her defiance enraged the man. He aimed the gun at Eisa and shouted: "I will shoot you! I will shoot you!"

At that moment, a second Janjaweed man stepped in. "Don't waste a bullet on a woman!" he said. "Just throw her."

The tall man hurled Eisa to the dirt and crawled atop her.

A few minutes later, the rapes were over but not the ordeal. The Janjaweed tied the young women together at their wrists and beat them with their fists and the butts of their guns.

Then, the militiamen ordered the women to lead them to a place where they could find some animals to steal. If they found enough, the men said, they might free them.

Terrified, Eisa helped lead their captors to a place where people water their animals. But before they arrived, they came upon two men relaxing with their animals. One mounted his horse and rode off in a panic as the Janjaweed approached, leaving 40 cows behind for them to steal. The second man, having only a donkey, was unable to escape.

The Janjaweed shot him dead, Eisa said, and took his donkey.

As the group approached the watering place, most of the Janjaweed men decided to ride ahead on their horses and camels, leaving the captives in the custody of one man who appeared to be their leader.

The man appeared to know Eisa's friend and fellow captive. He asked about her father, then untied the women and ordered them to flee, she said.

They raced toward safety, sprinting right out of their flip-flops. After 90 minutes, Eisa said, they had arrived at the outskirts of their camp, with thorns embedded in the soles of their feet.

The young women told their friends and relatives about the attack but not about the rapes. But over the next few weeks, gossip began to spread. Neighbors assumed the worst, about the attack, about Eisa, her sister and their friend.

"They scorn you. They laugh at you," Eisa said. "They look at you as if you are strange, as if they haven't seen you before."

The only good news came about two weeks later. After living in fear that the rape might have made her pregnant, Eisa's period arrived. The relief, she said, was overwhelming.

By the time Eisa reached the end of her story, she and her sister had arrived at the spot where they planned to collect firewood. With expert swings of the ax -- so hard Eisa's head scarf fell to her shoulders -- she and Aziza cut the largest branches off two trees, stripped the bark and bundled the still-moist wood.

With their donkeys long gone -- stolen in the Janjaweed attack -- the sisters hoisted the bundles onto their heads and began the long walk back to the camp beneath the relentless Darfur sun.

Lebanon Must Disarm Hezbollah, Israeli Foreign Minister Warns (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

The Lebanese government must fully implement a recent U.N. resolution requiring the disarming of the militant Shiite group Hezbollah or Israel will be less reluctant to attack the Lebanese state if Hezbollah resumes hostilities, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said yesterday.

Livni, in an interview with editors and reporters of The Washington Post, said that when the fighting began in July after Hezbollah seized two Israeli soldiers, Israel heeded calls from world officials not to undermine the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora because the formation of the government and the subsequent withdrawal of Syrian troops was an "achievement of the international community."

Israel launched attacks across southern Lebanon, Hezbollah's base, and it demolished bridges to Syria and bombed Beirut's airport. Livni said Israel's efforts to keep the military campaign limited made it more difficult to achieve its objectives.

"The result is it was more difficult to find these terrorists among civilians, compared to attacking a weak Lebanon," Livni said. "We could have done Lebanon in a few days, I think, if we had decided to attack Lebanon as a state."

"Now there is a need to implement fully and completely 1701," Livni said, referring to the resolution passed by the U.N. Security Council that led to the cease-fire between Israeli and Hezbollah forces. "If Israel will be attacked, this is the Lebanese responsibility."

DOJ_NMG_0064503

Since passage of the resolution, 4,000 international troops have moved into southern Lebanon, as has the Lebanese army, and U.S. officials say arms shipments have been halted. But Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, said this week that Hezbollah fighters are still in southern Lebanese towns near the border with Israel.

If Israel is attacked again, "we are not looking again to find these terrorists among the civilian population," Livni added. "We are going to face a state which does not implement its responsibility or maybe does not exercise its sovereignty. And so in French, they say tant pis " -- which translates as "too bad."

Asked specifically if Israel would attack Lebanon, Livni replied: "It is the responsibility of the state of Lebanon. I don't want to say so clearly that next time this is what we will do. But we will take it into consideration that this is part of their responsibility."

Separately, Livni expressed concern that a proposed unity government in the Palestinian territories will not explicitly recognize Israel. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who supports peace talks with Israel, is attempting to reach a deal with the radical Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, which won legislative elections earlier this year. The victory of Hamas led to a broad cutoff of international aid, leaving much of the Palestinian territories increasingly destitute.

Hamas won on a platform of reform against the increasingly corrupt Fatah movement, which had long led the Palestinians. But Livni said the aid cutoff has greatly weakened the appeal of Hamas -- which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel -- making it imperative for other nations to insist that the new government renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist.

The Quartet -- a coordinating group for Middle East peace made up of the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia -- will meet on Wednesday at the United Nations. Livni said next week will be an important test of the international community's resolve.

"Hamas has to decide what they will do. Abu Mazen has to take some decisions," Livni said, using Abbas's nom de guerre. "They are looking outside; and if the international community will show some hesitation, we will face a unity government, which will be the most dangerous situation."

Livni said "it is easy for us to see something black, Hamas, and white, Abu Mazen, but sometimes the in-between, the gray, is sometimes the most dangerous" because it will appear legitimate through the presence of Abbas while Hamas continues to be an anti-Israeli militia movement. "They can get legitimacy and get the checks, but we cannot end the conflict."

Asked if the Israeli government would refuse to deal with a unity government, Livni said: "The question is not the formation of the government but its platform."

Livni said it was a mistake to believe that elections would transform terrorist groups. "I believe deeply in democratization, but the question is what is the best way to implement it," she said. "The idea is not only voting, one vote for one person, but the acceptance of the values of democracy."

She said that some have argued that governing will transform militants into responsible parties, but she noted that she believes that "if you are political party which believes in an extreme Islamic ideology, when you have the power you will use it in order to force your ideology. It will look like something which is legitimate because it won the election."

She noted that many nations are working to strengthen the Lebanese army in an effort to transform Lebanon into a normal state. But Hezbollah is a minority in the Lebanese government now, she said, so one day "we may face Hezbollah winning the election and it would have the legitimate control of the Lebanese army."

Israeli Official Hopeful On Arms Embargo (AP-Y)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 16, 2006

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, heading home after talks with the Bush administration, said Friday she expects the Lebanese government to prevent the re-arming of Hezbollah.

"Enforcing the arms embargo is crucial," Livni said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press as she headed for the airport. "We know that Hezbollah is weak in terms of arms."

Maintaining the embargo and disarming the Iranian-backed militant group with which Israel fought a costly war this summer "is the test of the Lebanese government and the international community," she said.

"Lebanon has to exercise its sovereignty and disarm Hezbollah," Livni said. "It is our expectation" that Lebanon will follow through.

This week, Assistant Secretary of State David Welch told the Senate Foreign Committee smuggling of weapons across Syria's border with Lebanon had been halted.

And on Friday, a State Department official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to make statements, said there were no indications of new infusions of weapons into Lebanon for Hezbollah.

Livni declined to provide estimates of how much of Hezbollah's arsenal was wiped out by Israeli air and ground assaults.

DOJ_NMG_0064504

During the war, Israel reported 70 to 80 percent of Hezbollah's long- and medium-range missiles, which were considered a strategic threat, were destroyed. Much of Hezbollah's short-range arsenal survived.

A Cease-Fire Drives Into A Mirage On A Border That Disappears As It Gets Closer (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

HAWSH BEIT ISMAIL, Lebanon, Sept. 10 — There is no fence, no marking, no sense of a border at all in the broad track-crossed swaths of open land and rugged mountains that lie between Lebanon and Syria.

A large concrete block bars cars from crossing a small bridge over a narrow irrigation canal here, beyond which stands a cinderblock guardhouse flying a Syrian flag. But when asked, some local residents say the land west of the canal is Lebanon, others insist it is Syria. Most agree that it does not really matter.

"It's not a border," said Hussein al-Hajj Hassan. "I am here. Mmy brother is there."

Among the most volatile flashpoints in the fragile cease-fire between Israel and Hezbollah is the question of arms crossing this fuzzy border. Israel is concerned that Hezbollah, the Shiite group whose militia set off the war, will continue to receive missiles and other sophisticated weapons from Iran across the 205-mile long, sparsely guarded frontier.

Local residents say it would be a simple matter requiring only the barest collusion of either side for a tractor or truck to haul weapons from one side to the other.

Israel wants the expanded United Nations peacekeeping force, already deploying along Lebanon's southern border with Israel, to monitor the Syrian border as well as to keep weapons out. But Syria says it would consider that a "hostile act" and the Lebanese in this region warn that any foreign presence would face stiff resistance.

"We will consider the U.N. soldiers as occupying troops, and we will have the right to resist them," said Abdul Nasser Asahili, a mukhtar, or local leader, in Hermil, the district's capital. "We advise them to stay south of the Litani River.''

In Hermil District, paved roads crossing the border are blocked with stones or concrete barriers to prevent vehicles larger than motorcycles from passing. Cars, trucks and buses must use one of four main border crossings between the two countries. Lebanon has put more than 8,000 soldiers along the border to monitor traffic, but few people here believe the Lebanese Army is capable of stopping the arms flow.

"Without international observers along the Lebanese-Syrian border, there will be no solution," the Lebanese Druse leader Walid Jumblatt told a rally of his supporters last week. "It will be impossible to stop trucks loaded with arms, ammunition and explosives from entering Lebanon."

He said earlier in a television interview that he had heard of tunnels beneath the border in the northern Akkar District through which weapons can pass.

Mr. Asahili, the Hermil official, said he did not believe that weapons had crossed in his district, but that they had elsewhere. He favors the idea.

"Hezbollah has the right to bring in weapons," he said. "The Israelis are bringing in a lot of weapons from the U.S., and Hezbollah has the right to defend Lebanon."

He says rather unconvincingly that the sparse Lebanese Army presence along the border should be enough to reassure Israel and the West that no more weapons will reach Hezbollah. But at the new army checkpoint in nearby Al Qasr, one of many hastily constructed since the cease-fire, half a dozen soldiers idle away the day in a freshly built cinder-block building beside a blue metal sign reading, "Stop. Lebanese Army." The cars and trucks slow down but rarely stop.

More to the point, Mr. Asahili echoes the widely held view in Lebanon that Hezbollah neither needs nor wants to import arms, for the time being anyway. The group's deputy secretary general, Naim Qassem, said in an interview with the London-based Asharq Al-Awsat newspaper last week that the group used fewer than a quarter of its rockets during the summer's 34-day war. "Rebuilding the party's arsenal is not a priority, since it still has enough weapons," he said.

Elias Hanna, a retired general and security specialist in Beirut, said he believes the claim because of the sustained daily rate at which Hezbollah was firing rockets until the cease-fire. "When you start to run short, you economize," he said.

But Israel insists that it destroyed as much as half of Hezbollah's arsenal and wants the world to make sure it is not restored.

Like so many borders in the Middle East, the line separating Lebanon from Syria is arbitrary, drawn in the 1920's by France when it carved Lebanon from its share of the defunct Ottoman empire.

The border left 15 Lebanese villages in Syria and 9 Syrian villages in Lebanon. Local residents largely ignored the imaginary line even after the two countries won independence in 1943. Their currencies were interchangeable, and land holdings bled into one another.

"It's like New York and New Jersey; there's no difference," said Mr. Asahili.

DOJ_NMG_0064505

The real division came in the early 1950's when the two countries separated their customs regimes and the value of their currencies began to diverge. Yet Lebanese living in Syria continued to register births and deaths in the Lebanese administrative seats. Abdullah Sakr, for example, was born in Zaita, a Lebanese village several miles inside Syria, but he carries a Lebanese passport because his birth, like his father's and grandfather's, was registered in Hermil.

The border region is dominated by Shiites, who have a strong allegiance to Syria, crediting its army with stopping the country's brutal civil war, from 1975 to 1990. That relationship grew even stronger during the years that followed, with Syrian troops stationed in the Bekaa Valley.

Shiite towns in the area are festooned with banners urging Hezbollah fighters toward martyrdom and dotted with portraits of Iranian ayatollahs and even Hafez al-Assad, the Syrian president who died in 2000.

"In war, the martyrs are like the sons of God," reads stenciled writing on a concrete wall in Hawsh Beit Ismail beside a stylized image of a soldier planting Hezbollah's flag. A nearby wall is painted with careful calligraphy that reads, "America is God's enemy."

While the Lebanese Army has remained independent of sectarian tensions pulling the government apart, its rank and file are also largely Shiite and sympathetic to Hezbollah.

"For the last 30 years this border was open for everything — gasoline, arms — it was like no border at all," said Mr. Hanna, the retired general. He added that during the years the Syrian Army was in the country, weapons moved freely from one country to the other.

After Syria was forced to withdraw in 2005, though, weapons shipments became clandestine. Mr. Hanna said "a torrent" of weapons was smuggled across the border before the Hezbollah raid that started the war on July 12, but that the government lacked the unity and political will to stop it.

Mr. Asahili, the Hermil official, said smuggling was a fact of life, pointing to several plastic five-gallon containers of gasoline that he fills up in Syria because it costs half the price there. The roadblocks cut down on larger-volume commercial smuggling, but everyone knows there is a brisk, illicit border trade.

"Even if they put soldiers side by side all along the border they couldn't stop it," Mr. Asahili said. "People in this region don't believe in dividing into two countries. To them it is one country."

Israel Army In Disarray Over Lebanon Failures (AFP)

AFP, September 16, 2006

A general resigns, a colonel is disciplined and a military command battered by an unrelenting storm of criticism: the Israeli army is in disarray as it struggles to cope with the failures of the war in Lebanon.

A month after the 34-day war against Shiite militia Hezbollah ended, nothing has halted the flood of criticism against the military and political leadership over their handling of a deadly conflict that failed to achieve its main aims.

Two days after Israel's northern army commander resigned, it emerged that embattled army chief Dan Halutz disciplined the head of an armoured brigade for criticising a superior in front of his subordinates during the war.

Colonel Amnon Eshel, head of the seventh brigade, reportedly complained that his immediate boss, General Gal Hirsh, was "completely cut off from realities on the ground" as his badly-prepared men battled to counter Hezbollah rockets.

Halutz "severely reprimanded" Eshel for disrespecting the military hierarchy and suspended him from promotion for two years, an army spokesman told AFP.

The latest incident, revealed two days after General Udi Adam resigned, underscored the level of disarray in the military.

The war left 162 Israelis dead and failed to achieve either main objectives of retrieving two soldiers captured by Hezbollah in a raid on July 12 or halting the guerrillas' barrage of more than 4,000 rocket attacks on the north.

Israel has also weathered heavy criticism abroad for its devastating use of force in Lebanon, where more than 1,200 people were killed and thousands of homes and infrastructure targets were bombed.

Adam's departure as the first official to step down as done little to quell discontent amid calls for further heads to roll calls such as for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Halutz and Defence Minister Amir Peretz to go.

In an interview published Friday, former chief of staff Moshe Yaalon urged them to step down, charging that the entire conflict was misconceived and mismanaged from start to finish.

"Going to war was scandalous and he is directly responsible for that. The management of the war was a failure and he is responsible for that," Yaalon was quoted as saying in the Haaretz daily when asked if Olmert had to resign.

"The final operation was particularly problematic and he was directly involved in that. He was warned and he did not heed the warnings. Therefore he must resign," Yaalon said.

"Halutz created lack of clarity that rattled the forces in the field, caused a loss of trust and generated chaos. He did not give the commanders in the north backing... He managed the campaign arrogantly and shallowly," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0064506

On Sunday, cabinet ministers are expected to approve a five-man government commission into the war, chaired by retired judge Eliyahu Winograd and made up of two university professors and two retired major generals.

"It is high time that a commission of inquiry gets underway," Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told army radio from Washington, amid unease over the late start to a proper investigation.

The committee is to examine how the government and defence establishment dealt with the Hezbollah threat in the years before the war as well as during the conflict from July 12 to August 14.

But its powers fall short of a state commission, Israel's most authoritative inquiry that could subpoena witnesses and order police searches.

Last week, up to 30,000 Israelis in Tel Aviv called for a state commission, but Olmert has said such an inquiry would "completely paralyse" the leadership at a time of serious threat, including from arch-foe Iran.

An interim report drawn up by a parliamentary sub-committee has accused the government and homefront command of serious failures in everything related to the care and protection of civilians in the north.

Palestinian Intelligence Official Is Killed (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 15 — A senior Palestinian intelligence officer and four others were shot to death in their car in Gaza on Friday as political leaders continued to squabble over a possible new national unity government.

The daylight shooting, 200 yards from the home of Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, and the escape of the killers, were indications of the continuing lawlessness in Gaza. The shooting was seen by some local officials as more likely to be a robbery, and by some as part of the conflict between rival security forces of Fatah and Hamas.

The dead senior officer, Brig. Gen. Jad Tayeh, 55, was the international coordination chief in the Palestinian intelligence services and was well known to foreign envoys. A briefcase and the officers' weapons were taken. The immediate speculation in Gaza was that the briefcase contained money.

Progress appeared to be slow on the national unity government announced Monday by the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah. He said that Fatah and Hamas had agreed on a political platform for a new government that he expected to meet international requirements sufficiently to restore funding that was cut off after Hamas took power in March.

But the platform has not been published, the parties disagree about portfolios and Mr. Abbas has delayed dissolving the current government. The United States and some members of the European Union have expressed doubts about whether the new platform will satisfy the West's three requirements: to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

In Brussels on Friday, European Union foreign ministers agreed to support a new Palestinian government, but heeded American warnings that it was too early to abandon the aid restrictions before a new government was formed and its platform published.

On Thursday, Mr. Haniya accused the United States of undermining efforts to form the new government and called on Europe to take the lead in lifting international sanctions against the Palestinians. "The U.S. administration does not want the Palestinians to be unified," Mr. Haniya said. "It puts obstacles in the way of this political coming together. It wants to extort the Palestinian people and the Palestinian government."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a meeting on Wednesday with the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, said that the United States would insist on the three conditions, including an explicit recognition of Israel's right to exist, as agreed upon by the "quartet" of the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations that had been trying to promote peace negotiations.

Hamas will not do that, its leaders say, but is trying to draw a distinction between a political platform designed for a coalition government and the beliefs of the Hamas movement itself.

Still, Mr. Haniya and Mr. Abbas have been appealing to European anxieties about the severe economic depression that the cutoff in funding and aid has produced in the Palestinian territories, and in particular in Gaza, which the United Nations has called "a ticking time bomb."

United Nations agencies have sharply increased their aid, including basic foodstuffs, to prevent malnutrition in Gaza, where 40 percent of the work force is employed by the Palestinian Authority and has received less than two months' salary in the last seven months.

The Europeans want to end the stalemate and use the conclusion of the war in Lebanon as a springboard to renewed Israeli-Palestinian talks. Some European countries want to restore the aid in stages, after specific benchmarks are met, like an end to rocket attacks on Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0064507

But the Europeans are split. The external relations commissioner of the European Union, Benita Ferrero-Waldner, said that it should show flexibility provided that a new government "reflected" the three demands. "It is clear we want to be firm on principles, but we should be flexible about the form this government chooses in the text," she said.

The Slovenian foreign minister, Dimitrij Rupel, told reporters: "We are happy about the government of national unity. We are trying to help it, also financially."

But such a government does not yet exist, as Britain's minister for Europe, Geoff Hoon, pointed out, saying that "there is still some further clarification as to precisely what is the underlying agreement involving Hamas."

Ben Bot, the Dutch foreign minister, said that support depended on meeting the three demands. Asked about the prospects, he said, "So far not very positive, I must say."

In a joint statement, the foreign ministers "welcomed" a new Palestinian government and "expressed the hope that its political platform will reflect the quartet principles and allow for early engagement." They also "expressed deep concern at the humanitarian situation in the Palestinian territories," again called on Israel to hand over to the Palestinians nearly $400 million in taxes and duties collected since February and urged Israel to reopen all crossings to and from Gaza.

Mr. Abbas is hoping that a new government will be accompanied by a series of developments: the release of a captured Israeli soldier, the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Gaza, the release of Hamas legislators and ministers held by Israel, a renewed cease-fire, a meeting between himself and the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, the release of about 600 Palestinian prisoners, the handover of the withheld taxes and duties, and the resumption of American and European aid.

That complicated chain of events would get Israeli-Palestinian relations closer to where they were at the end of last year, but would not move the two sides much closer to a final peace agreement.

Also on Friday, Israeli forces bombed a house in Rafah that the army said contained the entrance to a tunnel used to smuggle arms. The Israelis said that they had warned inhabitants to leave, and that there were secondary explosions suggesting that arms were in the tunnel.

Intelligence Official, Aides Slain In Gaza (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Maj. Gen. Jad Tayeh had ties to President Abbas and Fatah. He led global coordination for agency.

JERUSALEM — Masked gunmen shot and killed a senior official in the Palestinian intelligence service and four aides Friday near the home of Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh.

Palestinian officials said Maj. Gen. Jad Tayeh and the aides were in a vehicle in the Shati refugee camp, on the northern edge of Gaza City, when masked men in a sport utility vehicle cut them off and opened fire.

The attackers fled after taking weapons and cellphones from the dead, as well as a briefcase containing documents, according to the intelligence service. At least three victims were described as bodyguards.

Authorities said they had opened an investigation but made no announcement about possible suspects.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility.

"It's a crime against the innocents. They were killed after they had performed the Friday prayer," said Gen. Mohammed Masri, a senior officer in the intelligence service.

The intelligence service is under the jurisdiction of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Tayeh, who was in charge of the agency's international coordination, was affiliated with Abbas and the president's Fatah movement.

It was not known whether the attack was part of sporadic strife between the once-dominant Fatah faction and Hamas, the radical Islamic group that won control of parliament in January elections. Many clashes have involved gun battles, often between rival security agencies.

Fatah and Hamas announced this week that they would form a coalition government. The move is aimed mainly at restarting the flow of international aid, but it also could help ease some of the street violence, which has been especially severe in the Gaza Strip.

The United States and the European Union cut off most aid to the Palestinian Authority after the elections because they classify Hamas as a terrorist group. Palestinian officials hope that a unity government involving Fatah, which supports negotiations with Israel, will prompt at least some donors to renew aid and relieve a financial crisis.

The EU on Friday said it welcomed the formation of the unity government, the Associated Press reported from Brussels.

In other developments, Haniyeh joined a chorus of criticism over Pope Benedict XVI's comments Tuesday on Islam that many Muslims consider an attack on their religion.

DOJ_NMG_0064508

"We strongly condemn the pope's offensive remarks about Islam, which totally contradict the true nature of Islam and its shining history," he said. "The pope should reconsider his proclamations and stop attacking Islam, the religion of 1.5 billion people of the world."

Some Muslim Leaders Want Pope To Apologize (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

ROME, Sept. 15 — Pope Benedict XVI drew rising anger on Friday over comments he made Tuesday about Islam, as Muslim leaders around the world accused him of dividing religions and demanded an apology.

In Britain, Gaza, Iraq, Syria and Indonesia, Muslim leaders registered their protest. The Parliament in Pakistan passed a resolution against the pope's statements, and the government later summoned the Vatican envoy to express official displeasure. In Lebanon, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, the most senior Shiite cleric, demanded "a personal apology — not through his envoys."

And emotion spilled over in Turkey, which Benedict is scheduled to visit in November, as a top official in the Islamic-rooted ruling party said that the pope was "going down in history in the same category as leaders such as Hitler and Mussolini."

"He has a dark mentality that comes from the darkness of the Middle Ages," the official, Salih Kapusuz, deputy leader of Turkey's governing party, was quoted as saying on the state-owned Anatolia news agency. "It looks like an effort to revive the mentality of the Crusades."

Reaction to the pope's remarks — in which he quoted a description of Islam in the 14th century as "evil and inhuman" — has presented Benedict with the first full-blown crisis of his papacy.

Some in Turkey have questioned whether he should make the visit, the pope's first to a Muslim country. Many Muslims are also comparing his comments to the unflattering cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad that had stoked deep anger among Muslims earlier this year.

The Vatican did not release an official comment on Friday. On Thursday, as Benedict returned from a six-day trip to Germany, his chief spokesman said that he had not intended to "offend the sensibility of Muslim believers."

Other top Vatican officials also sought to tamp down the anger.

"I am convinced the pope did not mean to assume a position against Islam," a top German cardinal, Walter Kasper, told the Italian daily newspaper La Repubblica.

Archbishop Dominique Mamberti, a French prelate with experience in the Islamic world, was appointed on Friday as the Vatican's new foreign minister. He told Agence France-Press: "The dialogue between different civilizations, cultures and religions — which nobody can hide from — will be one of the great questions which I will tackle in my new job."

In a major speech on Tuesday at Regensburg University, Benedict delivered a long, scholarly address on reason and faith in the West. But he began his speech by recounting a conversation on the truths of Christianity and Islam that took place between a 14th-century Byzantine Christian emperor, Manuel II Paleologus, and a Persian scholar.

"The emperor comes to speak about the issue of jihad, holy war," the pope said.

"He said, I quote, 'Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached,' " the pope said.

While making clear that he was quoting someone else, Benedict did not say whether he agreed or not. He also briefly discussed the Islamic concept of jihad, which he defined as "holy war," and said that violence in the name of religion is contrary to God's nature and to reason.

He also suggested reason as the basis for "that genuine dialogue of cultures and religions so urgently needed today."

Benedict, a respected theologian, is said to write many speeches himself, and some in the Italian news media speculated that the Vatican would be forced into a more stringent review of his statements.

The controversy came as a new Vatican hierarchy was being put in place. In addition to appointing a foreign minister, the pope installed as secretary of state — the highest position after the pope — Cardinal Tarcisco Bertone, 71, an Italian and longtime colleague of the pope's.

Remarks By Pope Prompt Muslim Outrage, Protests (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

BEIRUT, Sept. 15 -- A medieval reference in an academic lecture by Pope Benedict XVI unleashed a wave of denunciations, outrage and frustration across the Muslim world Friday, with officials in Turkey and Pakistan condemning the pontiff, Islamic activist groups organizing protests and a leading religious figure in Lebanon demanding that he personally apologize.

The reception to the pope's speech in Germany on Tuesday was a reminder of the precarious, suspicious state of affairs between a West that often views Islam as a faith in need of reform and a Muslim world that feels besieged in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Some of the criticism evoked the Crusades; others accused the Vatican of joining a Western-led war on Islam.

"We ask him to offer a personal apology -- not through his officials -- to Muslims for this false reading" of Islam, said Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, one of the world's leading Shiite Muslim clerics, who lives in Beirut.

The pope began his lecture at the University of Regensburg by quoting from a 14th-century dialogue between the Byzantine emperor, Manuel II Paleologos, and a Persian scholar. In a passage on the concept of holy war, Benedict recited a passage of what he called "startling brusqueness," in which Manuel questioned the teachings of Islam's prophet, Muhammad.

"Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached," Benedict quoted the emperor as saying.

The pope neither explicitly endorsed nor denounced the emperor's words, but rather used them as a preface to a discussion of faith and reason. The Vatican said the pope did not intend the remarks to be offensive to Muslims.

"It was certainly not the intention of the Holy Father to undertake a comprehensive study of the jihad and of Muslim ideas on the subject, still less to offend the sensibilities of Muslim faithful," Vatican spokesman Federico Lombardi told Vatican Radio.

But the reaction was quick, and though it was largely peaceful, it evoked the storm of violent protests that erupted in most Muslim countries after a Danish newspaper published a series of cartoons a year ago that lampooned Muhammad. In some ways, the denunciations seemed even more pronounced, given the pope's stature and authority over the world's 1.1 billion Roman Catholics.

Pakistan's parliament adopted a resolution Friday condemning the pope for what it called derogatory comments and seeking an apology. The Foreign Ministry summoned the Vatican's ambassador to express regret over Benedict's remarks.

In Turkey, where Benedict planned to visit in November in his first trip as pope to a Muslim country, the deputy leader of Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's Islamic-inspired party called Benedict's remarks the result of ignorance or a provocation.

"He has a dark mentality that comes from the darkness of the Middle Ages. He is a poor thing that has not benefited from the spirit of reform in the Christian world," Salih Kapusuz told state media. "It looks like an effort to revive the mentality of the Crusades."

Even the country's secularist opposition party demanded the pope apologize before his visit to Turkey, which has long been one of the least ostensibly religious of Muslim countries. News agencies reported that another party led a demonstration outside the largest mosque in the capital, Ankara, and about 50 people placed a black wreath outside the Vatican's diplomatic mission.

About 100 people protested in Egypt, the Arab world's most populous country, where demonstrators chanted, "Oh Crusaders, oh cowards! Down with the pope!" Mohammed Sayed Tantawi, the sheik of al-Azhar University, a leading seat of religious scholarship, said the pope's remarks indicated "clear ignorance of Islam," and the Muslim Brotherhood, one of the Middle East's largest and oldest Islamic groups, called on Muslim governments to sever relations with the Vatican if the pope does not apologize.

Thousands of Palestinians protested Friday night in Gaza City after Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, who belongs to the Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, said the pope's lecture had offended Muslims everywhere.

"This is another Crusader war against the Arab and Muslim world," Ismail Radwan, a Hamas official, told the crowd.

The criticism of the pope's remarks was often twofold: at the reference of the prophet Muhammad's legacy as "evil and inhuman" and at the idea that Islam was spread by the sword. Much of the conversion that followed the prophet's life in the 7th century was a gradual, centuries-long process that left a remarkable degree of diversity -- albeit faded -- in parts of the Muslim world.

In Iraq, where religious differences have fueled much of the country's crippling violence, a Catholic representative warned that the pope's remarks were being distorted to "sow a crisis of chaos and enmity between the one family of Christians and Muslims."

A statement posted at mosques in Anbar province, a center of the insurgency, warned that a previously unknown group would begin killing Iraqi Christians in three days unless the pope apologized. In Basra, a bomb exploded at the Assyrian Catholic Church on Friday evening, causing damage but no injuries, according to a church leader who said the attack stemmed from the pope's remarks.

Across Iraq's sectarian Sunni-Shiite Muslim divide, clerics called the remarks another campaign against Islam. "Last year, and in the same month, the Danish cartoons assaulted Islam," Sheik Salah al-Ubaidi, a representative of Moqtada al-Sadr's radical Shiite movement, said in the group's stronghold of Kufa.

Muslim Anger Over Papal Comments Grows (AP)

Pakistan's legislature unanimously condemned Pope Benedict XVI. Lebanon's top Shiite cleric demanded an apology. And in Turkey, the ruling party likened the pontiff to Hitler and Mussolini and accused him of reviving the mentality of the Crusades.

Across the Islamic world Friday, Benedict's remarks on Islam and jihad in a speech in Germany unleashed a torrent of rage that many fear could burst into violent protests like those that followed publication of caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad.

By citing an obscure Medieval text that characterizes some of the teachings of Islam's founder as "evil and inhuman," Benedict inflamed Muslim passions and aggravated fears of a new outbreak of anti-Western protests.

The last outpouring of Islamic anger at the West came in February over the prophet cartoons first published in a Danish newspaper. The drawings sparked protests — some of them deadly — in almost every Muslim nation in the world.

Some experts said the perceived provocation by the spiritual leader of more than a billion Roman Catholics could leave even deeper scars.

"The declarations from the pope are more dangerous than the cartoons, because they come from the most important Christian authority in the world — the cartoons just came from an artist," said Diaa Rashwan, an analyst in Cairo, Egypt, who studies Islamic militancy.

On Friday, Pakistan's parliament adopted a resolution condemning Benedict for making what it called "derogatory" comments about Islam, and seeking an apology. Hours later, the Pakistani Foreign Ministry summoned the Vatican's ambassador to express regret over the pope's remarks Tuesday.

Notably, the strongest denunciations came from Turkey — a moderate democracy seeking European Union membership where Benedict is scheduled to visit in November as his first trip as pope to a Muslim country.

Salih Kapusuz, deputy leader of Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's Islamic-rooted party, said Benedict's remarks were either "the result of pitiful ignorance" about Islam and its prophet or, worse, a deliberate distortion.

"He has a dark mentality that comes from the darkness of the Middle Ages. He is a poor thing that has not benefited from the spirit of reform in the Christian world," Kapusuz told Turkish state media. "It looks like an effort to revive the mentality of the Crusades."

"Benedict, the author of such unfortunate and insolent remarks, is going down in history for his words," Kapusuz added. "He is going down in history in the same category as leaders such as Hitler and Mussolini."

Even Turkey's staunchly pro-secular opposition party demanded the pope apologize before his visit. Another party led a demonstration outside Ankara's largest mosque, and a group of about 50 people placed a black wreath outside the Vatican's diplomatic mission.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said the pope should explain and "tell us what exactly did he mean. ... It can't just be left like that."

Vatican spokesman Federico Lombardi has tried to defuse anger, saying the pope did not intend to offend Muslim sensibilities and insisting Benedict respects Islam. In Pakistan, the Vatican envoy voiced regret at "the hurt caused to Muslims."

But Muslim leaders said outreach efforts by papal emissaries were not enough.

"We do not accept the apology through Vatican channels ... and ask him (Benedict) to offer a personal apology — not through his officials," Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, Lebanon's most senior Shiite cleric, told worshippers in Beirut.

Rashwan, the analyst, feared the official condemnations could be followed by widespread popular protests. Already there had been scattered demonstrations in several Muslim countries.

"What we have right now are public reactions to the pope's comments from political and religious figures, but I'm not optimistic concerning the reaction from the general public, especially since we have no correction from the Vatican," Rashwan said.

About 2,000 Palestinians angrily protested Friday night in Gaza City. Earlier, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of the Islamic militant group Hamas, said the pope had offended Muslims everywhere.

DOJ_NMG_0064511

In Cairo, some 100 demonstrators stood outside the al-Azhar mosque chanting: "Oh Crusaders, oh cowards! Down with the pope!"

The pope quoted from a book recounting a conversation between 14th-century Byzantine Christian Emperor Manuel Paleologos II and a Persian scholar on the truths of Christianity and Islam.

"The emperor comes to speak about the issue of jihad, holy war," Benedict said. "He said, I quote, 'Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached.'"

The pope did not explicitly agree with nor repudiate the comment.

In Britain, the head of the Muslim Council, a body representing 400 Muslim groups, said the emperor's views quoted by the pope were bigoted.

"One would expect a religious leader such as the pope to act and speak with responsibility and repudiate the Byzantine emperor's views in the interests of truth and harmonious relations between the followers of Islam and Catholicism," said Muhammad Abdul Bari, the council's secretary-general.

Many Muslims accused Benedict of seeking to promote Judeo-Christian dominance over Islam.

Even Iraq's often divided Shiite and Sunni Arabs found unity in their anger over the remarks, with clerics from both communities criticizing Benedict.

"The pope and Vatican proved to be Zionists and that they are far from Christianity, which does not differ from Islam. Both religions call for forgiveness, love and brotherhood," Shiite cleric Sheik Abdul-Kareem al-Ghazi said during a sermon in Iraq's second-largest city, Basra.

Few in Turkey, especially, failed to pick up on Benedict's reference to Istanbul as Constantinople — the city's name more than 500 years ago — before it was conquered by Muslim Ottoman Turks.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel defended the German-born pope, saying his message had been misunderstood.

"It is an invitation to dialogue between religions and the pope has explicitly urged this dialogue, which I also endorse and see as urgently necessary," she said Friday. "What Benedict XVI makes clear is a decisive and uncompromising rejection of any use of violence in the name of religion."

In the United States, a Muslim group, the Council for American-Islamic Relations, asked for a meeting with a Vatican representative and urged more efforts at improving understanding between Muslims and Catholics.

"The proper response to the pope's inaccurate and divisive remarks is for Muslims and Catholics worldwide to increase dialogue and outreach efforts aimed at building better relations between Christianity and Islam," the group said.

Muslim States Denounce Pope Over Remarks (WT/AP)

By Benjamin Harvey

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

ISTANBUL -- Pakistan's legislature unanimously condemned Pope Benedict XVI. Lebanon's top Shi'ite cleric demanded an apology. And in Turkey, the ruling party likened the pontiff to Hitler and Mussolini and accused him of reviving the mentality of the Crusades.

Across the Islamic world yesterday, Benedict's remarks on Islam and jihad in a speech in Germany unleashed a torrent of rage that united Shi'ites and Sunnis and threatened to burst into violent protests like those that followed publication of caricatures of the prophet Muhammad.

The pope did not condemn modern-day Islam. But by citing an obscure medieval text that criticizes teachings of Islam's founder for advocating a faith "spread by the sword," Benedict inflamed Muslim passions and aggravated fears of a new outbreak of anti-West protests.

The last outpouring of Islamic anger at the West came in February over the prophet cartoons first published in a Danish newspaper. The drawings sparked protests -- some of them deadly -- in almost every Muslim nation in the world.

Muslims Demand Apology From Pope (FT)

By Ft Reporters

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Religious and political leaders across the Muslim world on Friday demanded that Pope Benedict XVI apologise for a speech he made this week indirectly criticising the Islamic concept of “holy war.” Muslim clerics said the speech reflected ignorance of Islam and was insulting to Mohammed.

The latest flare-up of tensions between Christian and Muslim faiths has raised fears in the Vatican about the pope’s safety and cast further doubts over his plans to visit mainly Muslim Turkey in November. The proposed trip had already stirred controversy because of the Pope’s public opposition to Turkey’s ambitions to join the European Union.

Ali Bardakoglu, Turkey’s director of religious affairs, said the Pope’s most recent speech was “an extraordinarily worrying, saddening and unfortunate statement.” He added: “Biased and hostile assessments of Islam and the Prophet Mohammed are common in the western world.”

“It looks like an effort to revive the mentality of the Crusades,” said Salih Kapusuz, a senior figure in the ruling Justice and Development party, which has its roots in political Islam.

The Pope made his controversial remarks in a speech on Tuesday evening at Regensburg university, where he was a theology professor in the late 1960s. The leader of the Catholic church quoted from a book that recounted a conversation between 14th century Byzantine Christian Emperor Manuel Paleologos II and a Persian scholar on the truths of Christianity and Islam. “The emperor comes to speak about the issue of jihad, holy war,” the Pope said. “He said, I quote: ‘Show me just what Mohammed brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached.”

According to the text of the speech, the Pope did not explicitly distance himself from the remarks, but noted positively that the emperor as “erudite” and the unnamed scholar as “educated”.

Elsewhere in the 30-minute speech, which was greeted with a standing ovation, he condemned violence, arguing “violence is incompatible with the nature of God and the nature of the soul.” Throughout his six-day trip to Germany the Pope had stressed the need for a closer dialogue between the Christian and Muslim faiths.

DOJ_NMG_0064513

A Vatican spokesman said the Catholic leader had not intended to provide "an in-depth study of jihad and Muslim thinking" but had hoped to "cultivate an attitude of respect and dialogue toward other religions and cultures".

"The Pope's words are being extrapolated and disconnected from the context in which he said them and then used for ulterior purposes," said Monsignor Luigi Padovese Apostolic Vicar for Anatolia.

Theologians noted that the highly academic speech was focused not on Islam but on the relationship between reason and faith in the Christian church. Islamic scholars said the Pope should have been more aware that, even with this focus, he needed to present a more differentiated view of Islam.

Abel Theodor Khoury, a Germany-based Islam professor, from whose book the Pope took the controversial passage, said on Fridayday: "I would have wished for a one or two words of differentiation (in the speech). Two or three lines would have been very effective."

Edmund Stoiber, conservative state premier of Bavaria, on Friday defended the Pope, arguing that the latter's "clear rejection of religiously motivated violence should be taken seriously around the world."

At Friday prayers, Muslim clerics in Pakistan, Lebanon, Egypt and Iran and elsewhere denounced the Pope's comments. The latest controversy comes six months after Muslim protests against a Danish newspaper that published cartoons of Mohammed.

The Pope's Words (NYT)

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

There is more than enough religious anger in the world. So it is particularly disturbing that Pope Benedict XVI has insulted Muslims, quoting a 14th-century description of Islam as "evil and inhuman."

In the most provocative part of a speech this week on "faith and reason," the pontiff recounted a conversation between an "erudite" Byzantine Christian emperor and a "learned" Muslim Persian circa 1391. The pope quoted the emperor saying, "Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

Muslim leaders the world over have demanded apologies and threatened to recall their ambassadors from the Vatican, warning that the pope's words dangerously reinforce a false and biased view of Islam. For many Muslims, holy war — jihad — is a spiritual struggle, and not a call to violence. And they denounce its perversion by extremists, who use jihad to justify murder and terrorism.

The Vatican issued a statement saying that Benedict meant no offense and in fact desired dialogue. But this is not the first time the pope has fomented discord between Christians and Muslims.

In 2004 when he was still the Vatican's top theologian, he spoke out against Turkey's joining the European Union, because Turkey, as a Muslim country was "in permanent contrast to Europe."

A doctrinal conservative, his greatest fear appears to be the loss of a uniform Catholic identity, not exactly the best jumping-off point for tolerance or interfaith dialogue.

The world listens carefully to the words of any pope. And it is tragic and dangerous when one sows pain, either deliberately or carelessly. He needs to offer a deep and persuasive apology, demonstrating that words can also heal.

Raúl Castro Speaks Out Against U.S. At Summit Talks (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 15 — Raúl Castro, who is standing in as Cuba's leader while his brother, Fidel, recuperates from surgery, railed at the United States during a summit meeting in Havana of nonaligned nations on Friday, urging them to unite against "unacceptable acts of aggression essentially motivated by insatiable appetite for strategic resources."

Mr. Castro's first public speech since taking power in July was just as stridently anti-Washington as those offered by his elder brother. He spoke of the Bush administration's "irrational pretensions for world dominance" and called "absurd" its aggressive military spending now that the cold war is over.

"With regard to international relations, we are not the decisive force that we could be," Mr. Castro, 75, told members of the 118-member group of developing nations. "The Non-Aligned Movement now has to wage courageous battles against unilateralism, double standards and the impunity granted to those in power, for a fairer and more equal international order."

The United States declined observer status at the summit meeting. In Miami, however, the Bush administration's top Cuban-American official, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, delivered his own rebuke to Cuba's government.

DOJ_NMG_0064514

Condemning repression on the island and calling Raúl Castro "simply another military dictator," Mr. Gutierrez called on Cuba to hold a referendum on its future leadership, a proposal that the Communist government would surely dismiss.

"Why not ask the people?" Mr. Gutierrez said at conference on Latin America's economic future, which attracted leaders from throughout the region. "Let the Cuban people speak. Let the Cuban people determine their own destiny."

Noticeably absent from the fray in Havana was Fidel Castro, 80, who continued his recuperation. Cuban newspaper photographs showed him clad in pajamas while meeting with Secretary General Kofi Annan of the United Nations, and President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela.

"Despite the rigor and will with which he pursues his treatment and physical therapy, the doctors have insisted that he continue to rest," Felipe Pérez Roque, Cuba's foreign minister, told reporters on Friday.

The Non-Aligned Movement began during the cold war, when many nations were firmly allied with either the United States or the Soviet Union. The group has lived on, and now has 118 members that see themselves as the voice for the developing world.

U.S. Proposes Cubans Vote On Raul Castro (APY)

By Jessica Gresko

AP, September 16, 2006

The Bush administration proposed Friday that Cubans hold a referendum to decide if they want to be ruled by Raul Castro, who is acting leader of the communist nation while brother Fidel recovers from surgery.

Fidel Castro has long fiercely resisted any attempts by the U.S. to interfere with his government, and Cuba is highly unlikely to accept the proposal, announced in Florida by U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez.

"I would say to the Cuban regime, 'why not ask the people?'" Gutierrez said at The Miami Herald's Americas Conference. "Why would a real leader be so insecure about giving his people a voice?"

Gutierrez aides said the administration wanted the Organization of American States to organize the referendum. OAS officials had no immediate comment. Cuba has been excluded from participating in the group since the early 1960s, after Castro took power.

Castro handed over power temporarily on July 31 because of his intestinal surgery. The government has treated the exact illness as a state secret, although Castro has been shown this week in pictures talking to visiting leaders in Cuba for a Nonaligned Summit.

Gutierrez, who was born in Cuba, said a referendum is not a "U.S.-only idea" but one many countries around the world support.

He cited Chile as an example of a country that rejected a military dictatorship and showed "what can happen under freedom and democracy."

"They were asked a simple yes or no to dictatorship, very simple, and the people said 'no,'" Gutierrez said.

Cuba Steers Non-aligned Nations Against US (FT)

By Marc Frank And Agencies In Havana

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Delegations from the Non-Aligned Movement on Friday began negotiations over a final document sharply critical of Israel and supportive of Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Cuba – the host country of the movement's 14th summit – and its close ally Venezuela sought to steer the group towards more a more radical anti-US line.

Meeting in Havana, the summit has also allowed Cuba to advertise the recovery of President Fidel Castro, who underwent stomach surgery for intestinal bleeding at the end of July, and has served to highlight Cuba's strengthening ties with Venezuela under its controversial president, Hugo Chávez.

With large numbers of international journalists in Cuba to cover the event, the authorities have streamed pictures and video from the secret clinic where an apparently jovial Mr Castro is recovering, well enough to work on a book of interviews entitled One Hundred Hours with Fidel and hold a stream of meetings with conference participants.

Although Mr Castro was on Friday not expected to make a formal appearance it has been claimed that he has orchestrated events from behind the scenes. Raúl Castro, his 75-year old brother, who temporarily took over as head of state last month, hosted Friday's opening session.

"When Castro first announced his illness it appeared that hosting the NAM summit would pose an unwanted task at an inconvenient moment. Saturday, with Castro recuperating and Cuba playing host to hundreds of influential well-wishers from across the world, top Cuban leaders now think that the summit was exquisitely timed after all," said Dan Erikson, Caribbean expert at the Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington.

Mr Chávez, who will host a visit to Caracas by the Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad on Sunday, described the summit as the most important event in recent years "because it takes place when the US empire is experiencing decline.

"Nobody can deny this; it is visible. It will end up being as Mao Zedong said: a paper tiger."

Many observers, however, believe it will be impossible to link the movement, formed in 1961 by developing countries anxious to define themselves as independent equally of the Soviet Union and of the US, to such a radical geopolitical agenda.

"The NAM is a political forum but not a movement, because its members do not act as a bloc," said Phil Peters, vice-president of the Virginia-based Lexington Institute policy group. "Regardless of the resolutions passed, these countries will follow their own interests and make their own coalitions on issues such as trade, nonproliferation, and terrorism."

However, Venezuela was also using the summit to lobby for votes to win a seat on the United Nations' Security Council in the face of US opposition, and may have more success in that area.

"The Arab League says yes, the US says no, almost all of Africa says yes, the US says no, Russia says yes, the US says no, China says yes, now that's already a big victory, let's just wait for the results," Mr Chávez said late on Thursday.

Developing-country Leaders Meet In Havana Without Ailing Castro (AFP-Y)

By Patrick Moser

AFP, September 16, 2006

Developing-world leaders, including virulent US foes, have met at a Havana summit without Cuba's communist strongman Fidel Castro, whose convalescence kept him away from the spotlight he cherishes.

"Doctors insisted that he continues his rest," Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said at the opening of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) summit, adding that Castro's brother Raul would represent Cuba at the gathering.

Raul Castro, 75, officially heads Cuba while his bearded sibling recovers from gastrointestinal surgery he underwent in July. "Once he is fully capable of resuming his duties, Fidel will be the chairman of the Non-Aligned Movement," Perez Roque said.

Among the prominent leaders speaking at the two-day summit was Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who insisted Tehran's controversial atomic program had strictly peaceful objectives, and claimed the United States was the real nuclear threat.

"Why should people live under the nuclear threat of the United States?" he asked at the summit of the 118-member NAM.

"What is the UN Security Council waiting for to react to those threats?"

He urged his counterparts to help "counter attempts to prevent Iran from developing its peaceful nuclear activity." Washington is pushing for sanctions to force Tehran to stop producing enriched uranium, which can be used both for nuclear power and for atomic weapons.

Raul Castro, and Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez, also delivered blistering condemnations of the United States, while Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh called for "moderation, harmony and reason."

Singh also urged NAM leaders to make a priority of countering terrorism.

"If NAM is to be relevant in today's circumstances, it cannot afford to equivocate on the subject of terrorism," he said.

Singh planned to hold talks on the sidelines of the summit with Pakistani President Pervez Musharaf, who on Friday said the two countries had a "historic opportunity" to restart negotiations on the Kashmir dispute.

"Leaders who cannot grasp fleeting opportunity are no leaders," Musharaf said.

Talks over the Himalayan region, divided between the two countries but claimed in its entirety by both, have been stalled since July, when 183 people were killed in bomb attacks in Mumbai.

New Delhi had pointed the finger at Islamabad and a Pakistan-backed Islamic rebel group for the blasts.

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, an invited guest at the summit, urged NAM leaders to respect human rights and prevent crimes against humanity.

The movement includes several states that face harsh criticism for their human rights records, including North Korea, Zimbabwe and Belarus.

"We need governments of the South to fulfill their obligations to their people at home ... Ending suppression of opposition groups and the media. Taking serious and sincere measures against corruption," Annan told the leaders.

He said governments also had a duty to "protect populations from genocide, warcrimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity."

The summit was due to conclude on Saturday with the adoption of a draft statement fine-tuned during four days of preparatory meetings.

DOJ_NMG_0064516

The document statement calls for a reform of the UN Security Council and stresses the need for increased cooperation among developing countries in order to counter overwhelming US influence. It also condemns what it terms Israel's "unlawful" policies in the Palestinian territories and its recent military intervention in Lebanon.

Several of the leaders paid tribute to Fidel Castro for his historic role in the NAM, a movement created at the height of the Cold War.

The 80-year-old communist leader met some of the dignitaries over the past days, and Cuban media showed pictures of a pajama-clad Castro chatting with Chavez in a hospital-like room and, in a separate meeting, with Annan.

Raul Castro insisted his brother was keeping close tabs on the summit. "He has listened intently to the statements and the debate," he said.

Raul Slams U.S. As Non-Aligned Summit Chairman (WT/AP)

By Vanessa Arrington

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

HAVANA -- Raul Castro stood in for ailing brother Fidel yesterday as Cuba took over the leadership of the Non-Aligned Movement, but a top official didn't rule out the possibility the recovering revolutionary might still appear at the meeting.

After acknowledging his brother's illness, Raul unleashed a stream of anti-American rhetoric in his inaugural speech, saying the world today is shaped by the United States' "irrational pretensions for world dominance."

"When there no longer is a Cold War, the United States spends $1 billion a year in weapons and soldiers and it squanders a similar amount in commercial publicity," he said. "To think that a social and economic order that has proven unsustainable could be maintained by force is simply an absurd idea."

Raul earlier accepted Cuba's three-year chairmanship of the Non-Aligned Movement to a round of applause by leaders from two-thirds of the world's nations, saying "Comrade Fidel has asked that I transmit to you his most cordial greetings."

But while Fidel is under doctors' orders not to preside at the summit, the iconic leader could make an appearance, Cuba's foreign minister told the assembly.

"Despite the rigor and will with which he pursues his treatment and physical therapy, the doctors have insisted that he continue to rest," Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said. "His health improves continually and his convalescence is satisfactory."

Many are wondering whether the 80-year-old Fidel will be able to guide the group formed during the Cold War in its search for relevance in this era of globalization.

And in the United States, the Bush administration has tried to hasten the end of the Castro brothers' rule. Yesterday, it proposed that Cubans hold a referendum to decide if they want to be ruled by Raul -- a suggestion certain to be rejected by the island's communist leadership. There was no immediate mention of the U.S. proposal at the summit.

Fidel temporarily ceded Cuba's leadership to his 75-year-old brother and a handful of other top officials after emergency intestinal surgery in July. He's remained out of sight this week, appearing only in photos and video in state press and television, wearing pajamas in meetings with his close friend Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

Mr. Chavez, who like Fidel is famous for giving long speeches, spoke well beyond his allotted time, saying that because the ailing Mr. Castro wasn't there, he would take that liberty.

It was the second such statement in as many days by Mr. Chavez, who has moved forcefully to assert himself as an heir to the ailing Cuban leader. "Homeland or death, we will overcome," he thundered, echoing Fidel's favorite slogan.

Mr. Chavez also upstaged Raul at a side meeting of the "Group of 15" developing nations while pledging Venezuela's support for Iran if it is invaded because of its nuclear dispute with the U.N. Security Council.

"Iran is under threat; there are plans to invade Iran. Hopefully it won't happen, but we are with you," Mr. Chavez told Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

"Under any scenario, we are with you just like we are with Cuba," Mr. Chavez told Mr. Ahmadinejad. "If the United States invades Cuba, blood will run. ... We will not have our arms crossed while bombs are falling in Havana or they carry Raul off in a plane."

It was not clear what Mr. Chavez would do for Iran. He's previously vowed to cut off Venezuelan oil supplies to the United States if it invades Cuba.

Mr. Ahmadinejad told the assembly yesterday that "Cuba's fight for liberation from imperialism has been a source of inspiration for the world's peoples."

The Non-Aligned Movement was formed during the Cold War to establish a neutral third path in a world divided by allegiances to the United States and the Soviet Union. It now counts 118 members with the addition of Caribbean nations Haiti and St. Kitts this week.

U.S. Foes Meet At Nonaligned Summit (AP-Y)

By Anita Snow

AP, September 16, 2006

Cuba took over leadership of the Nonaligned Movement Friday, but with Fidel Castro too sick to promise an appearance, his younger brother and his close friend Hugo Chavez of Venezuela were left to mete out the anti-American invective.

The meeting hosted by Cuba brought together some of the staunchest U.S. foes - the presidents of Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe.

Cuba's Acting President Raul Castro, who was presiding over the meeting of more than 50 leaders, said the world today is shaped by irrational American desires for world dominance.

"When there no longer is a Cold War, the United States spends one billion dollars a year in weapons and soldiers and it squanders a similar amount in commercial publicity," he said. "To think that a social and economic order that has proven unsustainable could be maintained by force is simply an absurd idea."

In the United States, President Bush's administration tried Friday to hasten the end of the Castro government, proposing that Cubans hold a referendum to decide if they want to be ruled by Raul Castro. The suggestion faced certain rejection by the island's communist leadership, but they did not immediately address it at the summit.

The big question was whether the 80-year-old Castro would be healthy enough to show up for the summit dinner, let alone guide the group during Cuba's three-year chairmanship. The ailing revolutionary leader was under doctors' orders not to preside over the summit, and he did not appear in a closed-circuit television feed showing leaders arriving for the meal Friday night.

Castro temporarily handed power to his 75-year-old brother and a handful of other top officials after emergency intestinal surgery in July. And while Cuban officials raise expectations of a return to power, Fidel has appeared only in photos and video in state media, wearing pajamas while meeting Venezuelan President Chavez and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

Raul Castro has settled into his new leadership role, giving several speeches calling for unity against U.S. policies. And Chavez, still campaigning for Venezuela's bid to join the U.N. Security Council, has repeatedly asserted himself as the natural heir to Castro, who remains a hero to leftists around the world.

"To be radical is not to be insane, it's to go to our roots. Let's go to our roots, let's be truly radical," Chavez told diplomats and leaders from two-thirds of the world's countries. He concluded by chanting "Patria o Muerte!" — "Fatherland or Death!" — a favored Castro rallying cry.

The 118-nation group gave Raul Castro a round of applause, and Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi expressed satisfaction that the movement "will once again be in Cuba's very capable hands."

"Cuba's fight for liberation from imperialism has been a source of inspiration for the world's peoples," Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told the assembly.

Zimbabwe's President Robert Mugabe also attended the summit. The Bush administration charges that Mugabe's authoritarian government is a serious violator of human rights.

Annan told the group the world has changed dramatically since Cuba last hosted the movement in Havana 27 years ago, and that developing nations have new responsibilities to promote democracy, protect human rights and develop civil societies.

"The collective mission of this movement is more relevant than ever," Annan said.

With next week's U.N. General Assembly session in New York looming, Chavez and Ahmadinejad called on Nonaligned nations to support Venezuela's Security Council bid and provide more balance at the U.N. Both said the veto power of the United States has made the council a toothless promoter of U.S. policy.

"The U.S. is turning the Security Council into a base for imposing its politics," Ahmadinejad complained, according to the official translation of his speech in Farsi. "Why should people live under the nuclear threat of the U.S.?"

Guatemalan Vice President Eduardo Stein told The Associated Press in an interview Friday that his country has secured 90 of 128 necessary votes, and denied that U.S. support for Guatemala's bid has made his country a "puppet" of Washington. Venezuela, however, is confident it will win the seat.

Guatemala has stressed its conciliatory foreign policy in the U.N. campaign, while Chavez has made it clear if chosen for the security council, Venezuela would support Iran in its high-stakes standoff over its enrichment of uranium.

On Thursday, Chavez pledged his country would stand with Iran if the Middle Eastern country is invaded, just as it has pledged to defend Cuba.

The Nonaligned Movement was formed during the Cold War to establish a neutral third path in a world divided by the United States and the Soviet Union. It now counts 118 members with the addition of Haiti and St. Kitts this week.

Indian PM Urges NAM Make Priorities Of Terror, Mideast (AFP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0064518

By Michael Langan

AFP, September 16, 2006

Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has urged Non-Aligned Movement leaders to take a conciliatory tone as they work to counter terrorism, and try to keep the Mideast peace process on track.

"If NAM is to be relevant in today's circumstances, it cannot afford to equivocate on the subject of terrorism," Singh told more than 55 leaders of state and government from the NAM's 118 developing-country member states.

"A message must emanate from us that we are united in our desire to fight and eliminate the scourge of terrorism. We cannot allow the forces of intolerance and extremism to distract the world's attention from the vital concerns of our people -- the problems of poverty, ignorance and disease," Singh stressed.

At a summit that has been rife with sharp words on US policy Singh appealed for a new "inclusive globalization."

He and also argued that "as a group we have rejected extremes. We must spread the word of Gandhiji, the apostle of peace.

"Our voice must then be one of moderation, harmony and reason," Singh said. "If such is the voice of more than half of the people of the world, it will prevail."

The Indian premier also pressed for NAM members to work to bolster efforts to achieve peace in the Middle East.

"The emerging fault lines of the new ideological divide are nowhere more apparent today then in West Asia," Singh said.

"We have just been witness to a tragic and pointless war in Lebanon. It has only sharpened the sense of alienation and resentment brutalizing a country that had just begun to reclaim its heritage of inter-ethnic and inter-religious harmony after years of conflict," he said.

"I would recommend that we constitute a suitable high level group for West Asia. This group could undertake a sustained mission to promote understanding in the region and assist in the implementation of the agreed roadmap toward a comprehensive peace," he said.

On the energy front Singh also proposed a NAM working group on energy security which he said his country would be prepared to coordinate.

Singh argued that the United Nations should be at the forefront of progress in international relations.

"The United Nations played a creative and critical role in shaping the international agenda in the past," he said. "It has to do so again.

"Reforming the UN and revitalizing the General Assembly is a pressing imperative. The developing world must find its due representation among the permanent members of the Security Council," Singh said. They five permanent council members are the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China.

Singh also said he would work to launch a new NAM initiative on nuclear disarmament. "We would invite fellow members of NAM to join us in our efforts to achieve universal nuclear disarmament, and a world free of all nuclear weapons."

Nuclear powers India and Pakistan were expected to play a key role during the NAM's meeting of national leaders on Friday and Saturday.

Singh and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, who both arrived on Thursday, planned to meet on the sidelines of the summit in a bid to restart negotiations on the decades-old conflict over Kashmir, a Himalayan territory shared by the two countries but claimed in its entirety by both.

Financial Leaders Gather, A Bit Tensely (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

SINGAPORE, Sept. 15 — The world's finance ministers gathered Friday for their first annual meeting in East Asia since the region was gripped by an economic crisis in the 1990's, with their most urgent order of business being to overhaul the institutions that safeguard the global economy and help the poor.

As tropical rains drenched this busy and prosperous island nation and snarled its downtown traffic, thousands of economists and financial officials gathered in hotels and meeting halls for the annual meeting of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund in what appeared likely to be one of the most contentious sessions in years.

There was even tension between Western leaders and the government of Singapore, their host, over Singapore's last-minute denial of visas to some of the leaders of the "civil society" groups that were invited to participate in the meetings.

In years past, there have been sometimes violent protests at these sessions, focused on criticism that the rich countries of the world are indifferent to the poor and to the environment. Singapore has banned demonstrations and has kept the city in a tight security grip.

DOJ_NMG_0064519

About 500 nongovernment groups are taking part in some of the sessions here and issuing reports critical of their hosts' policies. Paul D. Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, was especially embarrassed by the visa problem because he has repeatedly called on developing countries to open their political processes to dissent.

He said Friday that it was "unfortunate that the government of Singapore seemed not to be honoring" the agreement made to hold the meetings here. He also said that Singapore leaders told him they would review the cases of those denied entry.

As it turned out, the government relented at the last minute, allowing 22 of the 27 advocates who had been denied visas to enter the country.

Mostly, Mr. Wolfowitz and others sounded a note of optimism about the world economy by saluting the records of Singapore and other Asian countries in recent decades.

"Being here is symbolically important," Mr. Wolfowitz said Friday. "The success that we see around us in Singapore and more broadly in East Asia is a reminder that there is a path out of poverty, there is a path from poverty to prosperity."

But the success of prospering countries in East Asia, many of them reeling from financial crises only a decade ago, has also created tensions, with many of them demanding more of a voice in the institutions created after World War II to help avoid a repeat of the economic disasters of the 1930's.

Mr. Wolfowitz has also stirred a furor inside the World Bank with proposals to crack down on corruption in bank lending. Many leaders of donor countries in Europe have joined with some developing countries to resist the policy paper that Mr. Wolfowitz wants approved at meetings here.

The critics charge that Mr. Wolfowitz's anticorruption plan could lead to cutbacks in lending to the poorest countries.

But the main issue of contention is a proposal backed by the Bush administration to change the governance of the International Monetary Fund to give more votes to China and three other developing countries, and to give dozens of other countries more votes in a restructuring over the next two years.

Both American and I.M.F. officials say that while they were optimistic that it will be approved by 85 percent of the fund's board by Monday, the votes were not there yet. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. was due to arrive in Singapore Friday evening for a final round of lobbying with countries resisting the plan.

Several countries are skeptical of the proposal, among them Brazil, India, Argentina, Indonesia and Malaysia, who all fear that they could be left out as the fund is reconfigured. Many poor countries also fear that their influence will be reduced in the rush to reward countries that have prospered in recent years.

Some European countries are also resisting the proposal, concerned that they will be marginalized.

Rodrigo de Rato, the managing director of the International Monetary Fund, said he realized that "most industrialized countries in the world" will have to "restrain" themselves as other, newer economic powers like China are given more of a voice and as poor countries in Africa and elsewhere get additional voting rights themselves.

"There is a consensus that we need a new formula," Mr. de Rato told reporters Friday, but he suggested that it had not been translated into a precise long-term plan.

China, South Korea, Japan and other East Asian nations are sitting on huge dollar-denominated reserves flowing from their surpluses in trade with the United States. The American fear is that they will try to set up their own Asia-only fund to help bail out countries in the future.

The American fear of a fracturing of the International Monetary Fund is an echo of the administration's concern over the failure of the recent round of global trade talks, which collapsed over the summer in recriminations involving the United States, Europe and several developing countries.

All of these countries blamed one another for not lowering tariff barriers enough to jolt the talks toward success, and administration officials say plainly they cannot afford to have another debacle involving another global economic institution.

U.S., Allies Seek Currency Crackdown (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

SINGAPORE -- The U.S. and its major allies are working to give the International Monetary Fund greater power to crack down on countries that meddle with exchange rates to gain an edge in international trade.

At a series of meetings here this weekend, top financial officials from the Group of Seven major industrial nations are expected to press for new IMF rules that would make it easier for the global economic watchdog to brand a country for manipulating its exchange rate -- and, in theory, embarrass it into stopping.

The U.S.-led push comes at a time when the Bush administration faces enormous pressure from Congress, manufacturers and unions to confront China over its currency practices. Beijing, they argue, keeps the yuan artificially weak against the dollar, giving Chinese firms a huge competitive advantage over their American counterparts by making Chinese exports cheaper.

DOJ_NMG_0064520

As a result, markets will likely parse every currency-related comment that the new U.S. Treasury secretary, Henry Paulson, utters both in Singapore and when he makes his first official visit to China next week. Mr. Paulson, a former chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. with long experience in China, has promised a patient approach to the Asian powerhouse, but has also said it is imperative that Beijing loosen its grip on the yuan.

Amid the controversy over China's currency practices, Timothy Adams, undersecretary of the U.S. Treasury for international affairs, says there is a "strong emerging consensus" among the big countries that it is time to rewrite the international rules of the road regarding exchange rates.

Those rules should establish, Mr. Adams says, "in a modern world, what do beggar-thy-neighbor policies look like? What is and is not acceptable behavior?"

Brazil, Egypt and some other developing nations, however, are resisting the effort by the G-7, whose members include the U.S., Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Canada and Japan. Developing countries see the initiative as an attempt to hand the IMF, which provides rescue loans to troubled countries and often demands austere economic policies in return, yet another stick with which to force its will on those too weak to resist.

MORE

· Issue Briefing:1 IMF and World Bank officials convene in Singapore this weekend. Some big changes are on the agenda.

"It's important for the IMF to exercise its mandate in an evenhanded manner, and not be influenced by one or two countries," says Khor Hoe Ee, assistant managing director for economics at the Monetary Authority of Singapore. "The IMF needs to engage the Asian region to get the rich diversity of views that could contribute to the multilateral surveillance issues."

Singapore, which itself regularly intervenes in the market for Singapore dollars to combat domestic inflation, is playing host to the IMF annual meetings.

For the past two years, the IMF has been pondering how to sharpen its monitoring of the exchange-rate practices of its 184 member nations. Mr. Adams, however, jump-started the process a year ago with a speech accusing the IMF of being "asleep at the wheel" when it comes to exchange rates.

Currently, the IMF follows a set of rules, originally drafted in 1977 following the 1973 collapse of the international gold standard and fixed-exchange-rate system. Those rules generally require the IMF to discern whether a country intends to cheat the system through its exchange rate. Among the warning signs the IMF is supposed to look for are official restrictions on capital flows and unsustainable government borrowing.

"If these are the only things you're looking at, you haven't got a very good handle on a country's foreign-exchange policy or whether it's manipulating" its currency, a senior IMF official says.

Under U.S. trade law, every six months the Treasury must issue a report identifying any country that manipulates its currency, using the IMF definition. Despite complaints about China's practices, the Bush administration has never listed it. The decisions have a large foreign-policy component, but Treasury officials have also blamed their decision on their inability to prove Beijing intends to manipulate the yuan.

Now IMF Managing Director Rodrigo de Rato is championing a plan that would define manipulation by looking at whether a country's actions leave its exchange rate out of whack with economic realities. The IMF would then identify offenders and exert public pressure for changes.

Mr. Adams says the IMF is now on the right track and that he hopes that member governments at Sunday's IMF board meeting will offer at least general support for the idea of rewriting the old rules. The details would then be negotiated in coming months.

Germany Eyes Free-trade Zone To Rival China (FT)

By Bertrand Benoit In Berlin

Financial Times, September 16, 2006

Spurred by concern about China's growing economic might, Germany is considering a plan for a free-trade zone between Europe and the US.

A senior aide to Angela Merkel said the chancellor was "interested" in promoting the idea as long as such a zone did not create "a fortress" but rather "a tool" to encourage free trade globally, "which she is persuaded is a condition of Germany's future prosperity".

Separately, on Friday, the US, Canada and the European Union complained to the World Trade Organisation about China's tariffs on car parts, raising the prospect of Beijing facing its first WTO dispute.

The three said they had lost patience with Beijing's refusal to further open the $19bn-a-year market.

DOJ_NMG_0064521

News that the free trade zone, last pursued by Sir Leon Brittan, when European trade commissioner in 1998, is being debated in the German chancellery testifies to the rapprochement between Washington and Berlin since Ms Merkel's election last November.

This convergence of views was underlined this week when Wen Jiabao, Chinese premier, was politely chided by Ms Merkel for China's poor human rights record and recent restrictions on foreign news agencies, during an official visit to Berlin.

As German perceptions of China have grown more American, Washington's approach has shifted too. Speaking before his first trip to Beijing, Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, this week outlined a more balanced policy mixing traditional US criticism with praise for China's reforms.

Ms Merkel's aide said it was "far too early" to tell whether the project of a transatlantic free-trade zone would be part of Germany's priorities when it assumes the six-month presidency of the European Union and chairs the G8 group of leading industrial nations from January.

Two of Ms Merkel's most senior advisers, Jens Weidmann on economic policy and Christoph Heusgen on foreign policy, have warned her the initiative could be construed as protectionism.

Yet the notion has struck a chord with Ms Merkel, who has often called for "a global framework of rules" – minimum social, environmental and ethical standards – to prevent competition from sophisticated yet authoritarian low-wage economies eroding western achievements in these domains.

"The west needs to pull together," Gabor Steingart, Berlin bureau chief for the Spiegel weekly, told the FT yesterday. His book, World-War for Prosperity, a warning about the dangers of globalisation published this week, is credited with influencing the debate in the chancellery.

"What Nato did for the west under the cold war, Tafta (Transatlantic free-trade area) can do in the current battle."

Pressure Mounts For China To End Auto-Part Tariffs (WSJ)

By John W. Miller And Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

Teaming up with Europe and Canada, the Bush administration moved to turn up pressure on Beijing to end tariffs that critics say put foreign-made auto parts at a competitive disadvantage in China's domestic market.

The Western economic powers filed a request Friday for a formal investigation of the tariffs by the World Trade Organization, which is based in Geneva. The filing raised stakes significantly in the long-simmering dispute over auto parts, which first boiled over during the spring when the U.S. and European Union filed a preliminary complaint with the WTO on the issue. Canada later joined the case. That initial filing prompted a series of negotiations, but no progress was made toward diffusing tensions.

"China has demonstrated no willingness to remove its unfair charges," said U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab. "While we are open to settling this dispute, China's current stance leaves us no choice but to proceed with our WTO case."

At issue are complicated rules under which Beijing charges an average 25% tariff, instead of the usual 10%, on imported parts when a company making cars in China buys less than 40% of its components from local suppliers. The rules are problematic for auto makers with plants in China, such as General Motors Corp. and Volkswagen AG. Those companies all buy Chinese-made parts, but rely on some parts made outside of the country, exposing them to tariffs that ultimately raise the cost of their vehicles sold in China.

A GM spokesman said the company views Friday's filing as "a government-to-government action" and hopes for an "amicable and successful resolution."

The action reflects a tougher U.S. trade stance toward China, and comes a few days before Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson arrives in China, where he is expected to press complaints over China's currency practices. Critics say those practices distort trade flows and create unfair advantages for Chinese companies in the world market.

More broadly, the heightened tensions on auto parts reflects a dynamic that has helped stall the Doha Round of trade negotiations. In those talks, suspended during the summer, the U.S. and EU have pushed developing countries to lower barriers to trade in manufactured goods produced in the developed world. Developing countries, by large, have resisted those calls.

Friday's filing may lead to creation of an investigative panel as soon as next month. A Chinese official in Brussels told Dow Jones Newswires that "we will follow the legal proceedings to the end."

The U.S. exported $539.82 million in auto parts to China last year, a small part of China's estimated market at $19 billion. The EU says its auto-parts exports to China are valued at about €3 billion, or roughly $4 billion. Canada says it exports about $256 million annually in parts to China.

China Faces WTO Complaint Over Foreign-made Auto Parts (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab announced a trade action Friday that's designed to force China to open its fast-growing market to American-made auto parts.

In a conference call early Friday, Schwab said the United States, European Union and Canada together were lodging a complaint at the Geneva-based World Trade Organization about China's treatment of foreign-made auto parts.

It's the first high-profile trade complaint against China since the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative conducted a top-to-bottom review of bilateral trade earlier this year. It signals that the United States may begin taking a tougher stance on China, whose rapid economic growth is sending shock waves across the global economy.

With November congressional elections approaching, Schwab's help for the American auto industry carries political overtones in battleground states such as Ohio, Indiana and Michigan. Her announcement came as Ford - the world's third-largest carmaker - sought to cut another 10,000 jobs in the United States, Canada and Mexico by the end of 2008.

It also came days before Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson arrives in Beijing for meetings next week and as the Senate weighs trade sanctions against China for failing to liberalize its currency regime.

Her move sent China a good cop-bad cop message from the Bush administration, since Paulson, a former head of banking giant Goldman Sachs & Co., on Wednesday used his first speech on the international economy to call for patience with China. He said relations were "truly generational" and shouldn't suffer because of current disputes.

Schwab said her action had nothing to do with Paulson's trip, and she focused on defending U.S. jobs.

"In the U.S. alone, 700,000 workers produce over $200 billion in auto parts," Schwab said, noting that about a quarter of those products are exported. It's "not appropriate for our exports to be barred from that market, particularly in view of Chinese commitments to the WTO."

World trade in auto parts exceeded $445 billion last year. U.S. makers exported about $700 million in auto parts to China last year, a fraction of the $55 billion in total American exports of auto parts. U.S. companies complain that the figure is low because China is trying to force them to manufacture in China.

"What they're doing in essence is, if a car produced in China has too many imported parts, then we're going to duty (tax) those parts the same as if it was a whole imported car," said Frank Vargo, the vice president-international affairs for the National Association of Manufacturers.

If a Chinese-made vehicle has more than a certain amount of imported auto parts, China levies a 25 percent duty on the imported parts to favor domestic producers.

"We negotiated a 10 percent rate, and that's what our companies deserve," Vargo said.

The dispute is really about China moving up the value chain, shifting from simple assembly and low-tech production to the kind of high-tech manufacturing done in the United States, Mexico and Canada.

U.S. companies complain that they're being strong-armed into manufacturing in China. For example, auto industry data suggest that about 60 percent of the auto-parts manufacturing in China is done through joint ventures with foreign firms.

"This is the tip of the iceberg. It's unfortunate that we're not bringing 10 of these cases instead of one," said Peter Morici, a business professor at the University of Maryland.

Some want the Bush administration to get tougher on China.

"Taking them to the WTO is being a little more than a doormat, but I don't think this signals a particularly new aggressive policy," said Clyde Prestowitz, a former Reagan administration trade official and the author of "Three Billion New Capitalists," a book that warns of an economic power shift to Asia.

Paulson signaled Wednesday that the administration will treat the rising Asian power as an equal and expects it to begin behaving like a developed - not a developing - nation.

"China deserves recognition for what it has become, but at the same time China must be more than a beneficiary of open markets," Paulson said. "As a global economic leader, China should accept its responsibility as a steward of the international system of open trade and investment."

China's Selection For Nuclear Job Is Expected Soon (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

BEIJING -- China will announce by year end which company has won a contract potentially worth $8 billion to build four nuclear-power plants, said a top U.S. energy official.

DOJ_NMG_0064523

"They are getting very close to deciding which path they will go down," Assistant Secretary of Energy Karen Harbert said Friday in Beijing, a day after meeting with her Chinese counterparts.

"We hope we see an award of that bid in very short order. There's no indication of a date certain," she added. "But we certainly hope to see something by the end of this year at the very latest."

Pittsburg-based Westinghouse Electric Co. and France's state-owned Areva SA are considered the top contenders for the contract to build four 1,000-megawatt reactors, valued at $1 billion to $2 billion each. The reactors will use third-generation technology that differs from what is in place in most of the world's nuclear-power plants that use older, second-generation designs. Russia's AtomStroyExport is also bidding.

China plans to build as many as 32 nuclear reactors by 2020, in addition to the 10 already in use or under construction. The country aims to boost its nuclear-power generation capacity to 4%, or 40 gigawatts, of its overall generation capacity, from 1.5% currently, as part of plans to diversify its energy supply.

Industry observers had expected a decision on the contract as early as December 2005. But Chinese officials have said they needed more assurances about what they describe as untried technologies. Areva and Westinghouse say they have already proved the safety and efficiency of their new reactors.

Japanese electronics firm Toshiba Corp. is in the process of buying Westinghouse. The deal still needs to pass regulatory approval.

Ms. Harbert met Wednesday with Chen Deming and Zhang Guobao, vice chairmen of the National Development and Reform Commission, where they share the energy portfolio. Mr. Zhang is set to retire in coming months.

During the talks, the U.S. invited China to join a consortium of 10 nations working to develop a fourth-generation nuclear-power-plant design. "We believe it's very important for the world for China to be a part of this" Generation IV International Forum, Ms. Harbert said.

The U.S. sees nuclear power as an environmentally viable alternative to burning fossil fuels, which emit carbon dioxide and other gases associated with global warming and rising pollution rates.

Economic growth topping 10% has sent China scrambling for energy. The country is now the world's biggest consumer and producer of coal -- and the biggest emitter of sulfur dioxide, which causes acid rain, among other problems. China's growing wealth has also made it the world's second-biggest user of oil after the U.S.

The growing demand has brought the issue of energy security to the fore among China's policy planners and raised concerns among U.S. leaders fearful of competition for scarce resources.

"We want them to understand that energy is a global market. Energy security is not derived by ownership of oil assets but by building a variety of sources, a diversity of supply, and energy type," Ms. Harbert said.

Outsourcing: It's Been Good To Him (NYT)

By Saritha Rai

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

Azim H. Premji, 61, is chairman of Wipro, India's third-largest outsourcing firm, with $2.39 billion in revenue last year. Mr. Premji, whose 81.4 percent ownership stake makes him India's richest man, is known for his austere style, whether providing visitors recycled drinking water at the company's Bangalore headquarters or flying himself and his top executives in economy class.

He talked recently about outsourcing, competition and education. Following are excerpts:

Q. Has the furor over outsourcing cooled down?

A. The debate in the United States is significantly more balanced. But what is not getting adequate focus is that globalization is a two-way street. If the United States wants access to Chinese, Indian or Vietnamese markets, we must get access to theirs. U.S. protectionism is very subtle but it is very much there.

The important thing about outsourcing or global sourcing is that it becomes a very powerful tool to leverage talent, improve productivity and reduce work cycles. The West is not producing enough engineers. The United States will produce 75,000 engineers this year; they will produce more sports therapists than engineers. Germany, the great engineering power of Europe, will produce 35,000 engineers this year; they will produce more architects than engineers. Western companies want access to Indian talent, that is why they outsource, that is why they come to India to set up base.

Q. Wipro began as a company making cooking oil and is now the third-largest outsourcing firm in India, but you still make cooking oil?

DOJ_NMG_0064524

A. Being in the consumer business helps us groom talent in areas like marketing, finance and logistics. We can benchmark our outsourcing business to our consumer business and its best practices. Plus, our consumer business is independent, profitable, growing at 25 percent annual growth rates and is now of a respectable size.

Q. In 1977, India's socialist government sent I.B.M. packing. Was that the turning point for Wipro's technology business?

A. Their leaving gave us a chance to build the business from the start and we also learned to have a high degree of sensitivity to the customer. I.B.M. was not really bringing their best technologies to India. They were dumping old machines in the country that had been thrown away in the rest of the world 10 years before. Now they have a vastly changed attitude and they are back with a frenzy.

Q. You came into managing the company recently, after several executives had brought your outsourcing business to a level of success. Do you enjoy being so hands-on?

A. We have transitioned; we have collapsed the corporate office into the business office and de-layered our structure. We have four presidents who run the four businesses; each of these businesses is under a billion dollars in revenue. We continue to see it working well.

Q. Now global consulting firms like I.B.M. and Accenture are your competitors and they are investing billions of dollars in India. Is that a threat to your business model?

A. The fact that I.B.M. and Accenture are cannibalizing our model is a rubber-stamp endorsement of the global delivery model. It legitimizes our business from the customer point of view. But in terms of the quality processes, business model changes and fulfilling employee career goals, our domestic competitors and we are two to three years ahead of global consultancy firms.

Q. Is finding talent an increasing challenge for firms like Wipro?

A. Talent is in short supply everywhere. At Wipro, we are training nonengineers to be engineers. We hired 2,500 of them last year and coach them on the job. Thus, we are supplementing engineering talent on a significant scale.

Q. You dropped out of graduate school at Stanford to take charge of Wipro when your father died in 1966, but you have since made education your cause. How has it become so important to you?

A. Because education is the fulcrum for an equitable society. A girl child who is even a little bit educated is more conscious of family planning, health care and, in turn, her children's own education. Thus, we are killing three birds with one stone. I am particularly interested in primary education because the state of affairs in primary education in this country is a cause for concern.

W.H.O. Supports Wider Use Of DDT Vs. Malaria (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 — The World Health Organization on Friday forcefully endorsed wider use of the insecticide DDT across Africa to exterminate and repel the mosquitoes that cause malaria. The disease kills more than a million people a year, 800,000 of them young children in Africa.

Dr. Arata Kochi, who leads the group's global malaria program, unequivocally declared at a news conference on Friday that DDT was the most effective insecticide against malaria and that it posed no health risk when sprayed in small amounts on the inner walls of people's homes. Expanding its use is essential to reviving the flagging international campaign to control the disease, he said.

Dr. Kochi has powerful allies on DDT and, more broadly, on using insecticide sprays, in Congress and the Bush administration — an odd bedfellows coalition for an agency of the United Nations, which has often been at odds with the White House.

At the news conference, Adm. R. Timothy Ziemer, who leads President Bush's $1.2 billion malaria undertaking, stood at Dr. Kochi's side and described spraying with insecticides as a tool "that must be deployed as robustly and strategically as possible."

The health organization's news release quoted Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma.

"Finally, with the W.H.O.'s unambiguous leadership on the issue, we can put to rest the junk science and myths that have provided aid and comfort to the real enemy — mosquitoes," said the senator, a medical doctor.

Dr. Kochi said the most substantive change in the W.H.O.'s guidelines on the use of insecticides would extend the reach of the strategy. Until now, the agency had recommended indoor spraying of insecticides in areas of seasonal or episodic transmission of malaria, but it now also advocates it where continuous, intense transmission of the disease causes the most deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0064525

Dr. Kochi's new policies and abrasive style have stirred the small world of malaria experts. Dr. Allan Schapira, a senior member of the W.H.O. malaria team who most recently oversaw its approach to insecticide spraying, resigned last week.

Reached Thursday on his cellphone, Dr. Schapira declined to comment on his reasons, except to say that they were professional. He did not return messages left Friday.

His successor, Pierre Guillet, a medical entomologist, said Dr. Schapira quit because he was uncomfortable with the new approach on insecticide spraying.

There are fierce debates among experts over when it is best to use indoor spraying or mosquito nets impregnated with insecticides that last up to five years, though most agree that both spraying and nets are important tools.

Dr. Kochi said in an interview that half the professional staff of the W.H.O.'s malaria program has left "one way or the other" since he took over in October. He described Dr. Schapira as the "main brain" behind the past approach.

"He was professionally insulted by me," Dr. Kochi said.

In answer to a question, Dr. Kochi acknowledged that he had indeed told members of the staff in meetings that they were stupid. "They are very inward looking, and they do not communicate outside the malaria field," he said. "It's ridiculous."

Dr. Kochi earlier headed the W.H.O.'s tuberculosis campaign until he was forced out after his blunt manner alienated important partner organizations.

He has brought the same in-your-face approach to malaria. In January, he demanded that 18 drug companies — all named — stop selling some forms of a new malaria drug he believed could speed up drug resistance. If they did not comply, he threatened to try to disrupt sales of their other medicines.

In April, he accused the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, through which rich countries finance health campaigns, of ignoring W.H.O. rules that forbid treating malaria with herbal-based therapy alone — a charge that Dr. Bernard Nahlen, a senior adviser at the Global Fund, called "outlandish" on Friday.

There are now 17 African countries using at least some indoor spraying of insecticides to combat malaria. Only 10 of them use DDT — Eritrea, Madagascar, Ethiopia, Swaziland, South Africa, Mauritius, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Namibia and Zambia — the W.H.O. said. Too many countries in Africa have shied away from DDT, Dr. Kochi said, because of the nasty environmental reputation it earned in an earlier era when it was widely sprayed on crops — dangers that do not apply when spraying small amounts indoors.

DDT has carried a special stigma since the publication in 1962 of Rachel Carson's "Silent Spring," which helped set off the environmental movement in America by documenting how mass spraying of DDT entered the food chain, causing cancer and genetic damage and threatening to wipe out some bird species, including bald eagles.

The nonprofit group, Beyond Pesticides, distributed news releases on Friday opposing the W.H.O.'s new policy, saying a dependence on pesticides like DDT "causes greater long-tem problems than those that are being addressed in the short-term."

Dr. Kochi said some African countries had also been reluctant to use DDT because of fears that European countries would block food exports if crops were tainted by even minuscule amounts of DDT. In an interview, he called on leaders of the European Union to publicly encourage African countries to use DDT against malaria. Uganda, for one, has not used it because of what Dr. Kochi called "a bureaucratic standoff between the ministry of health and the ministry that oversees trade."

A spokesman for the European Union, Alain Bloedt, said Friday that it was too late in the afternoon to get a reply.

Dr. Kochi said he himself did not worry about whether he would lose his job if he took on too many influential players. Success will require many difficult changes, he said. "I don't want to fail."

WHO Backs DDT To Rid Malaria (WT)

By Tom Carter

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

The U.N. World Health Organization (WHO) reversed 30 years of policy yesterday, giving DDT a "clean bill of health" for controlling malaria, and it asked environmental groups to support limited use of the insecticide to save the lives of African babies.

"DDT presents no health risk when used properly indoors," said Dr. Arata Kochi, director of the WHO's malaria program. "Well-managed indoor spraying programs using DDT pose no harm to wildlife or humans."

Malaria rivals AIDS as the leading killer in sub-Saharan Africa. The mosquito-borne parasite kills an estimated 1 million people each year, mostly women and children under age 5.

"Help save African babies as you are helping save the environment," Dr. Kochi urged environmental groups at the National Press Club yesterday. "African babies ... need your help."

Swiss inventor Paul Hermann Muller won the Nobel Prize for medicine in 1948 for discovering DDT, or dichloro-diphenyl-trichloroethane. The insecticide helped wipe out malaria in the developing world.

DOJ_NMG_0064526

With the publication of Rachel Carson's 1962 anti-pesticide tome, "Silent Spring," DDT became the world's most vilified pesticide. It was banned from use in the United States in 1972 and abandoned in much of the world.

Dr. Kochi said WHO stopped promoting DDT in the early 1980s. As its use declined, mosquito populations soared, and malaria deaths in Africa and Asia skyrocketed.

An estimated 500 million become sick from malaria each year, making the disease one of the biggest obstacles to economic development in poor nations.

Yesterday, the WHO revised its recommendations and saidDDT is safe for humans and "remarkably effective" when a small amount of DDT is sprayed in the indoor walls of houses and huts.

The spraying, which lasts about six months, keeps mosquitos from entering a building and kills them if they do..

The WHO said DDT is a powerful weapon and should be used in combination with bed nets, better malaria medicines and other pesticides.

Environmental and anti-pesticide groups said safer and more effective alternatives to DDT were available such as pyrethrum and recent studies suggest DDT is harmful to humans, especially children.

"It is about time the international community focused on combating malaria, but this approach takes us exactly in the wrong direction," Dr. Paul Saoke, director of Physicians for Social Responsibility in Kenya, said in a statement released by the Pesticide Action Network, which opposes the reinstatement of DDT.

But those who campaigned for years to reinstate the use of DDT in the battle against malaria called yesterday's announcement a tremendous victory.

"We are finally in a position to provide the maximum amount of protection to poor people in poor countries," said Dr. Donald Roberts, professor of tropical medicine at Uniformed Services University of Health Sciences in Bethesda.

He said pyrethrum insecticides are more expensive and are far less effective over time. He called recent studies that imply DDT may impair development in breast feeding babies "bogus."

"It is a choice between a proven benefit, saving millions of lives, and a hypothetical, speculative and minor risk," he said.

Richard Tren, director of Africa Fighting Malaria, agreed.

"DDT is the most studied of man-made chemicals, and there is no evidence that it is unsafe for humans. Remember we are not spraying for fun. Malaria is a deadly disease," he said.

But the WHO specialist responsible for indoor spraying, or "vector control," said more study is required.

"We do not feel the product is toxic, but we want to take all necessary precautions," said Dr. Pierre Guillet.

According to U.S. Agency for International Development figures, the United States has spent about $25 million on indoor spraying in the 2005 and 2006, but very little of that money has gone to purchase DDT, which is currently made only in India and China.

Dr. Kochi said the new WHO recommendation met with some resistance within WHO, and since he took over the program, he has replaced about 50 percent of his professional staff.

"The malaria program was a failure and the WHO decided to go in a strong new direction," said Dr. Kochi. "We had to ask, does our staff have enough expertise and will they contribute in a meaningful way or not."

He said there is also resistance in some European countries to importing food and agricultural products from African nations that might begin using DDT.

Ugandan exporters recently came out against using DDT in their nation where malaria is epidemic, fearing the loss of millions in agricultural exports if Europe bans Ugandan products.

Dr. Kochi said those fears are unwarranted, noting that the European Commission supports the WHO recommendations.

In A Shift, Annan To Fill Out A U.N. Form Disclosing His Finances (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 15 — Secretary General Kofi Annan reversed course on Friday and said he would file a new financial disclosure form. Although completing the form is not mandatory in his case, his top aides considered it advisable to avoid misunderstanding.

“He has nothing to hide and does not want to cause embarrassment to the organization or to himself, so he has decided to voluntarily submit a financial disclosure form to the U.N. ethics office,” Mark Malloch Brown, the deputy secretary general, said in an interview on Friday night.

Mr. Malloch Brown said that Mr. Annan had communicated the decision to him on the telephone from Havana, where he was attending the conference of nonaligned nations.

"His lawyers had clearly advised him that he both does not need to sign the form and indeed that he might be imprudent to do so because he would be tying the hands of his successor," Mr. Malloch Brown said. Mr. Annan leaves office on Dec. 31 after two five-year terms.

Mr. Annan's earlier decision not to supply the form emerged Wednesday in a news conference and exposed him to criticism that he was not living up to the standards of openness that he was demanding of others in the organization.

Filling out the form is required of most United Nations staff members under new procedures put into effect last year as part of the management overhaul that Mr. Annan has championed.

The push for management change was accelerated by findings of mismanagement and corruption revealed in the reports by Paul A. Volcker, the former Federal Reserve chairman, into abuses of the oil for food program.

Mr. Annan is technically not a staff member and therefore not covered by the rules. Asked at the news conference whether he had submitted the form, he said, "I honor all my obligations to the U.N., and I think that is as I've always done."

Two United Nations officials confirmed afterward that he had not filled out the form, despite advice to do so from aides including Mr. Malloch Brown, and the undersecretary general for management, Christopher B. Burnham.

The news proved to be particularly awkward since Stéphane Dujarric, his spokesman, told reporters in early May that although Mr. Annan was not obliged to comply, he would do so "to show an example, to be an example to the rest of the staff who need to fill it out."

At a briefing on Thursday held to present the first-ever consolidated financial and program report — a management advance that Mr. Annan said in a foreword would produce "greater transparency and clearer accountability" — Mr. Burnham commented indirectly on Mr. Annan's action.

"I believe that we all should fill out annual financial reports," he said, "and I encourage everyone to do so in a timely fashion."

Mr. Malloch Brown said that in the aftermath of the Volcker report, Mr. Annan "feels that his private and public finances have had the most public scrutiny of any secretary general."

Mr. Dujarric, reached in Havana, said, "The Volcker commission had an exhaustive look at his finances and clearly wrote in its report last September that the examination of his finances did not raise any concern."

The report, published Sept. 7, 2005, examined Mr. Annan's financial information for the period Jan. 1, 1998, through Dec. 31, 2004, and concluded that it did not "reveal any payments or transactions that appear suspicious or improper."

Japan's Charismatic Leader To Leave A Lasting Mark (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 16, 2006

TOKYO - During five dynamic years in office, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi revived Japan's economy, nurtured a new self-assurance in his countrymen and cemented uncommonly good relations with the United States.

Now that he's about to leave his job, commentators are casting him as one of the most influential leaders in Japan's postwar history.

With a take-no-prisoners political style and a penchant for sunglasses, long hair, direct language and Elvis, "cool Koizumi" has shaken the pillars of politics in Japan.

Will his nation ever be the same?

On Wednesday, the long-ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) will pick Koizumi's successor as party leader, who will then become prime minister on Sept. 26. Koizumi, 64, will head off to retirement. He's changed Japan in ways that could be long lasting, but Shinzo Abe, the likely new prime minister, will face pressures to ease off some of the reforms.

Koizumi's biggest achievement "is that he instilled confidence in the Japanese nation," said Jesper Koll, chief economist at Merrill Lynch in Tokyo. "Japan is back, and people here again think, `We deserve to be the second most important economy in the world.'"

When Koizumi came to office in 2001, Koll said, "Japan was desperate. The banks were bankrupt. ... You had an economy that was on the brink of depression."

Five and a half years hence, the economy purrs, major corporations once again build factories, land prices edge upward, and Japan contemplates its resurgent role as the U.S. deputy sheriff in East Asia, where China's power is rising and North Korea is going nuclear.

Koizumi's departure will be felt in Washington. The Japanese leader bucked his nation's decades-old pacifist tradition and stretched long-unused military muscle by deploying troops to Iraq in 2004. Despite public opposition, the troops stayed until July of this year, offering symbolic support that the White House hugely valued.

Koizumi shared an unusually strong bond with President Bush, who took him in late June on a personal tour of Graceland, the Memphis home of Elvis Presley, an idol of Koizumi.

"His personal relationship with President Bush ... has been fundamental in bringing the U.S.-Japan alliance to its high-water mark," said Brad Glosserman of the Honolulu-based Pacific Forum of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Much of what made Koizumi unique, though, involved his penchant for smashing plates in domestic politics. Unlike his predecessors in the LDP, Koizumi wasn't beholden to a system of opaque negotiations among faction leaders, which has marked postwar Japanese politics.

After decades of colorless politicians, Japanese voters ate it up. Koizumi's command of the sound bite and direct style of speaking endeared him to the masses.

"Koizumi didn't care much about the status quo and personal relationships," said Tsuneo Watanabe, a senior fellow at the Mitsui Global Strategic Studies Institute in Tokyo.

He largely shunned party bosses for his Cabinet and expanded the functions of his job, adopting an unusual presidential style of governance. For chief economic minister, he brought in an outsider, Heizo Takenaka, who helped slash public works projects.

That was particularly evident last year when Koizumi called snap national elections to thwart renegades in his own party blocking privatization of the $3 trillion postal system. Analysts coined the term "political theater" to describe how Koizumi lured outsiders to challenge and drum out of office the 38 LDP legislators who defied him.

It was a remarkable triumph. His allies won a landslide victory in September 2005, which revived the fortunes of the LDP. Analysts said a new political style had emerged.

"Japanese are more comfortable with this kind of maverick or individualistic politician," Watanabe said.

Indeed, Koizumi has the support of an astonishing 64 percent of Japanese, according to a nationwide poll published Friday by the newspaper Mainichi Shimbun.

Not all was rosy. Relations with China and South Korea, two of Japan's most important trading partners, are tenser than ever. To fulfill a campaign promise, Koizumi has gone every year to worship at Yasukuni, the shrine where the nation's 2.5 million war dead are honored, including more than a dozen convicted Class-A war criminals. The visits have enraged Beijing and Seoul.

Ultra-nationalism is on the rise, and it's not just guys in sound trucks blaring patriotic slogans. Some academics report anonymous threats, and a legislator saw his home burned to the ground on Aug. 15 after he criticized Koizumi for visiting Yasukuni. A lesser candidate as party chief, Sadakazu Tanigaki, said the atmosphere is "not dissimilar to the 1930s," when the country was racked by "narrow-minded nationalism."

Moreover, Koizumi's pro-market economics weakened a sense of an egalitarian state, widening the gap between rich and poor. The rural economy remains vulnerable, and many elderly are trapped in poverty from deep cuts in welfare assistance.

Even so, it's in the economic sphere that Koizumi achieved what few expected, given Japan's dire situation when he took office. Back then, Japan was sputtering at an anemic 0.4 percent growth rate per year, and Japan Inc. appeared mired in deflation.

When Koizumi slashed spending, private businesses started tackling structural problems. Slowly, reforms took effect. By 2004, Japan chalked up 2.3 percent growth, and last year it sped up to 2.8 percent growth. Similar growth is expected this year.

Ironically, Japan's newly steady economic course may slow momentum on reform, and some experts say the Koizumi era could be an intermission in politics-as-usual.

Abe, the Koizumi Cabinet chief who's his likely successor, is far less charismatic than Koizumi, and faces challenging Upper House elections next year. Abe will struggle to hang on to power and is likely to bring back the LDP rebels Koizumi ousted from the party and revive pork barrel spending.

In some sectors, fatigue with painful cost cutting has set in.

"The golden age of pro-market reforms is over," predicted Koll, the Merrill Lynch economist.

Abe, who at 51 is a generation younger than Koizumi, faces other challenges. In fundamental ways, Koizumi postponed key issues, including whether Japan will alter its pacifist constitution to turn the self-defense forces into a normal army and modernizing a longstanding U.S.-Japanese security alliance to reflect Japan's stronger role.

"We haven't seen any explanation to the Japanese people and to the world about ... where Japan is going," Glosserman said.

Far-right Parties Making Inroads In East Germany (WT)

By David Crossland

The Washington Times, September 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064529

BERLIN -- A far-right party that shares Iranian President Mahmud Ahmadinejad's doubts about the Holocaust and wants to deport foreigners is expected to make strong gains in elections in an eastern German state tomorrow.

Opinion polls indicate the National Democratic Party (NPD), which calls for the repatriation of foreigners and opposes immigration, will get the minimum 5 percent needed to enter the assembly in Chancellor Angela Merkel's home state of Mecklenburg-Vorpommern, an economically depressed rural region known chiefly for its beautiful Baltic coastline.

"The opinion poll results appear to be unsettling the media cartel and the mainstream parties to such an extent that they can only resort to lies," said Udo Pastors, the NPD's leading candidate.

He was referring to charges that NPD backers intimidate opponents and disrupt campaign events.

The party made international headlines in 2004 when voters elected it to the regional parliament in Saxony, another eastern state, with 9.2 percent of the vote.

The NPD and another far-right party, the German People's Union (DVU), are now represented in two of Germany's five former communist eastern states -- embarrassing a country that has spent decades atoning for the Holocaust. Their nationwide support, however, remains marginal.

There is little awareness or guilt about the Holocaust among the party's supporters because Germany's Nazi past wasn't addressed under the communist regime in the east.

"The NPD is well organized and is tapping into people's feelings that they have lost out as a result of unification," said Manfred Gullner, director of the Forsa polling institute. Unemployment in the state, Germany's most sparsely populated one, is 18.2 percent, the highest among the 16 states and far above the national rate of 10.5 percent.

The failure of the mainstream parties to cope with the mass unemployment and social upheaval after unification made people more receptive to the radical right, said professor Hajo Funke of Berlin's Free University, an analyst of far-right trends. "Many people have the feeling that they're superfluous," he said.

Eastern anger has provided fertile ground for the NPD, especially among young people, he said.

Like all other parties, the NPD receives state funding because it is a legal party. An attempt to ban it failed in 2002 when Germany's Supreme Court rejected the case because some of the NPD members accused of stoking racism turned out to be informants for the intelligence service.

Hardly A Revolution, But Swedes Could Evict Leaders (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

STOCKHOLM, Sept. 14 — Relaxing with a dish of ice cream at the Gallerian shopping center, a profusion of trendy clothes, fancy cellphone accessories and expensive coffee in the center of town, 54-year-old Christina Jonsson was speaking like a political revolutionary — or at least what passes for one in Sweden.

“I’m fed up with Goran Persson and his men,” Ms. Jonsson said crossly of the Swedish prime minister, whose Social Democratic government has held power since 1994. “They’ve done nothing about jobs. They haven’t created any more jobs, and they say they have, and I don’t trust them anymore.”

Ms. Jonsson, a lifelong Social Democrat who runs a day care center, has a chance to help evict Mr. Persson on Sunday, when Sweden holds its most closely contested national election in years. But like someone at the hairdresser who wants a jazzy new style as long as it is not really different from the old one, Ms. Jonsson is not sure whether to take the plunge and vote for the alternative candidate, Fredrik Reinfeldt. “I haven’t decided yet,” she said.

Swedes revel in stability and moderation. The Social Democratic Party, with its policies of high taxes, big government and generous benefits, has run the country, alone or in coalitions with other parties, for 65 of the past 74 years. Economic growth is high, at a projected annual rate this year of 4.1 percent. Unemployment, according to the national statistics bureau, is 5.7 percent, one of the lowest in Europe. (Eurostat, Europe’s statistics agency, calculates the figure differently and puts it at 7.1 percent.)

Meanwhile, the conservative party, which Mr. Reinfeldt leads, wants so much to appear not to be extreme that it calls itself the New Moderate Party. The father of three children, one of whom he looked after at home for nine months while his wife was working, Mr. Reinfeldt, 41, comes across as friendly, self-assured and reasonable.

“He’s hard to dislike, because in policy terms he has been ultracautious,” said Nicholas Aylott, a political scientist at Sodertorn University College here. “His whole strategy, ever since he took over the leadership in 2002, has been what I would call an office-seeking strategy, to pull the party back into taking office.”

But Mr. Reinfeldt has found the government’s Achilles’ heel in the issue of unemployment, arguing with some success that the government’s rosy figures hide a much darker reality. The Economist recently called Sweden “a world champion at massaging its jobless figures,” and Mr. Reinfeldt agrees. If you take into account the number of working-age people who are neither working nor studying — including early retirees, people in job-training programs and those on long-term disability leave — the figure is more like 21 percent, he says.

Mr. Reinfeldt's criticisms are echoed by many Swedes, who offer anecdotal evidence of friends without work and job openings flooded with overly qualified applicants.

"A lot of people who go to university find that when they graduate, there aren't any jobs," said 18-year-old Linus Kullanger, who, having delayed higher education himself, is working as a supermarket clerk. "I have so many friends who are just sitting home playing poker on the Internet, trying to get money."

To tackle the problem, Mr. Reinfeldt is proposing to cut unemployment benefits, decrease payroll taxes for low-income workers and provide tax breaks to businesses that hire the chronically unemployed.

Mr. Reinfeldt makes a virtue of presenting his proposals as incremental rather than radical, saying he has learned from bitter experience that most Swedes will not support traditional conservative causes like huge cuts in taxes, benefits and government spending. In the last election, four years ago, his party got just 15 percent of the vote.

This year, it is running in an alliance with the other three center-right parties, which will govern as a coalition if they collectively win the election.

"This is an election campaign of small words," Mr. Reinfeldt said in an interview in his office. "I'm not asking for a revolution. If I were to do that, then we would never win, never."

But Mr. Persson's Social Democrats are portraying him, essentially, as a traditional conservative hiding behind a falsely mild facade.

"They're trying to do what Karl Rove and George W. Bush did in the first election campaign; they're the Swedish equivalent of compassionate conservatives," the country's genial finance minister, Par Nuder, said in an interview in his office, casual in a jacket and blue jeans. "They know they're not electable if they show their real face."

Mr. Nuder accused Mr. Reinfeldt of playing with the numbers, saying he was disregarding, for instance, the 93,000 jobs that have been created since August 2005. Unemployment has actually been falling for the last year, Mr. Nuder said.

"He's trying to manipulate the statistics and make unemployment an issue to show that the glass is half empty rather than half full," he said. "I state — and I state very strongly — that the glass is getting more and more full."

Polls show that the race is neck and neck, with a huge pool of undecideds whose votes are still up for grabs. A series of debates on radio and television, with Mr. Persson appearing forceful and authoritative, Mr. Reinfeldt calmer and milder, have not proved decisive.

One voter, a 58-year-old woman who works for the Stockholm city government and who asked that her name not be used because as a civil servant she is supposed to be politically neutral, pronounced herself flummoxed.

"I'm a little bit red," she said, meaning that her instinct is to vote Social Democrat, whose color is red (the Moderates are blue), "but the Social Democrats have made the gap between social classes greater. They promise and promise and promise, but which promises are they going to keep?"

But whether she is ready for a change is another matter entirely.

"I don't know Reinfeldt, and I don't feel too safe about him," she said. "I'm not sure he knows what he's talking about. I'm an old, experienced woman, and he's not an old, experienced man."

U.N Officials Support Forum On Migration (AP-Y)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

Top officials from dozens of countries supported a U.N. initiative to create a new global forum on migration on Friday, but the U.S. said the international community should rely on the arrangements already in place to deal with the problem.

The first-ever General Assembly meeting on international migration wrapped up Friday with calls for increased cooperation and dialogue to promote the positive aspects of migration while minimizing the dangers such as human trafficking and smuggling.

With nearly 200 million international migrants recorded last year, many making dangerous crossings to escape poverty or repression, dozens of speakers at a General Assembly meeting supported a U.N. initiative to create a new global forum to address the sensitive issue which has become a high priority for countries on the sending and receiving ends.

"We are convinced that international migration cannot be handled unilaterally," Spain's top immigration official Consuelo Rumi said.

Thousands of people try to reach Europe through Spain each year, an increasing number of them setting off in small boats from Mauritania and Moroccan-controlled Western Sahara. The government says it catches virtually all of them.

DOJ_NMG_0064531

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan has proposed a Global Forum on Migration and Development as an informal, non-binding way for countries to debate the issue and come up with solutions. Belgium has offered to host the first meeting next year.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey said the United States is committed to confronting the challenges of migration but prefers to do so via existing forums and agreements with neighboring countries.

"We are not interested in grand and elaborate global dialogues simply because we have seen the inherent weakness that results from their size and scope," she said. "They lumber under the great weight of rounds and rounds of conversation, far removed from immediate problems and realistic solutions."

She said the U.S. believes that "the international community, including the U.N. system, already has adequate capacity to address migration issues, and that creation of additional structures will hinder, not help, international cooperation on these issues."

Among the proposals raised Friday in speeches and roundtable discussions was the need for international cooperation to maximize the benefit of remittances — the money sent home by migrants — with suggestions including ending double taxation on the funds or reducing fees for transferring them.

Annan said Thursday that remittances amounted to an estimated $167 billion last year.

Sauerbrey said it also was important to encourage countries of origin to undertake economic and social reforms to enable people to use the money more effectively in "building, entrepreneurship and investment."

Delegates also stressed the need to end the brain drain that plagues many developing countries as their most talented doctors and other professionals seek higher wages and better opportunities in wealthier foreign countries.

"While celebrating the importance of remittances, we need to be reminded that countries of origin certainly lose human capital through the emigration of skilled professionals and unskilled laborers," said Richard Msowoya of Malawi.

Europe is host to nearly 34 percent of all migrants, North America 23 percent and Asia 28 percent. Approximately one-third of migrants move between developing nations; the same proportion move from developing nations to developed nations, the U.N. Department of Economic and Social Affairs reported.

Latvian Joins Race For U.N.'s Top Post (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2006

Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga joined the race to become the next U.N. secretary-general on Friday, becoming the first woman vying for the U.N.'s top post.

The former psychology professor who has led the Baltic nation since 1999 became the sixth candidate to replace Kofi Annan when his second five-year term ends Dec. 31.

Vike Freiberga faces an uphill struggle because most members states generally agree that the next secretary-general should come from Asia, part of a tradition to rotate the job between regions. U.S. Ambassador John Bolton, however, has argued that the job should go to the best qualified candidate regardless of nationality.

In an informal poll of the 15 Security Council members on Thursday — before Vike-Freiberga entered the race — South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon came in first followed by India's Shashi Tharoor, the U.N. undersecretary-general for public affairs, and Thailand's Deputy Prime Minister Surakiart Sathirathai.

Jordan's U.N. Ambassador Prince Zeid al Hussein, the only Muslim candidate, came in fourth and former U.N. disarmament chief Jayantha Dhanapala of Sri Lanka was last.

The secret poll is largely meant to indicate whether the candidates should remain in the race, and some diplomats say the person who will become the eighth secretary-general in the United Nations' 60-year history may not yet have come forward.

Vike-Freierga is likely to face difficulty because China — a veto-wielding council member — has repeatedly said it wants an Asian candidate.

Philanthropy At Clinton Fest, Trust But Verify (WSJ)

By Laurie McGinley

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2006

On Wednesday, more than 1,000 people will gather in New York at the second annual Clinton Global Initiative, a project led by former President Clinton, to tackle problems involving global health, poverty, religious strife and threats to the environment.

Setting the meeting apart from other gabfests, in part, is its steep price: An admission ticket costs $15,000. More than that, most participants -- who include government leaders, corporate executives, heads of nonprofit organizations and an array of big names like Christiane Amanpour, Shimon Peres, Katie Couric and Rupert Murdoch -- must pledge to fund and carry out an initiative to help address one of the problems. And therein lies a dilemma.

A few participants at last year's fest "pledged" to carry out programs that already were under way. In other words, the initiatives weren't specifically generated by the CGI. Moreover, not all participants followed through on their commitments. That's a no-no.

So this year, the Clinton folks have adopted a Reaganesque principle: Trust but verify. "We have an even greater focus on ensuring that the commitments are specifically for CGI and that the commitments are real," says spokesman Jay Carson.

To that end, CGI's 10-person "commitments team" has been working with participants to develop pledges for this year's conference. Some commitments were made months ago. Others will emerge at the meeting itself, as attendees rub elbows and drink cocktails with 60 heads of state and celebrity philanthropists such as Bill and Melinda Gates and Warren Buffett.

Those who don't follow through on their pledges won't be invited back. "Just under 20" participants from last year's conference weren't invited to this year's session, says Mr. Carson.

The event is a cross between a Hollywood premiere and a tent-revival meeting. Sessions at the three-day meeting have ambitious goals -- "Presenting and Resolving Deadly Conflicts," for example, is on Thursday's agenda. Last year's meeting generated 300 pledges valued at $2.5 billion, ranging from initiatives to increase the number of people tested and treated for HIV to efforts to help women in the Middle East develop business skills. This year, Laura Bush, who will conduct the opening session with Mr. Clinton, is expected to announce an administration pledge to help provide clean drinking water to Africa.

The long-term impact of the CGI is yet to be seen. But ensuring that promises made are promises kept increases its chance of success. "It's one thing to say, 'I have planted two million seedlings' and another to see how many trees are growing up and whether it's more than have been cut down," says S. Prakash Sethi, a professor of management at Baruch College in New York, who attended CGI last year but this year will be out of the country.

Gordon Brown Dances, Delicately, With Bush (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

LONDON

Britain's "stable and orderly transition," the Labour Party's favored phrase, has turned into the "Tony and Gordon Show," a TV soap opera mixing farce and venom and featuring two middle-aged men who've used a decade of intimacy at the pinnacle of power to rehearse the finer points of mutual loathing.

It would be very funny if it wasn't so serious - the strenuous assertions through pursed lips that they are really friends, the surreal little dance of their family movements at 10 and 11 Downing Street, the legend of Tony's broken promise to Gordon (as if promises ever meant anything in politics), the tiffs and tantrums.

But of course this unstable and disorderly transition from Tony Blair, the prime minister, to, in all likelihood, Gordon Brown, his once-trusted chancellor of the Exchequer, is serious. It involves British-American relations, Iraq, Afghanistan and the future conduct of what President George W. Bush calls the war on terror.

A spot of history is in order here. Back in the last century, at some joint in Islington, or so the legend has it, Blair promised Brown that in exchange for his loyalty he'd one day get a crack at the top job. Since then, more or less uninterruptedly, the remote Brown - not a man to pick up the phone himself - has been chafing.

Britain, under Blair's New Labour, went along swimmingly. London completed its transition from fog-bound fish-and-chip parlor to cosmopolitan metropolis. Even the likes of Liverpool and Leeds got a face-lift. Football matches stopped being an excuse for a pint and a punch-up and became coveted boardroom perks complete with sauvignon blanc. The helipads multiplied across England's green fields. Prosperity fairly oozed.

So Brown, who as chancellor had a substantial share of responsibility for all this, had to wait. Blair was popular and, as we all know, power addicts. Until the prime minister got himself into an unpopular mess in Iraq and into an even more unpopular relationship with Bush that has earned him the unkind epithet of "poodle."

Which allowed the Scottish terrier Brown to pounce. In a moment of weakness before the last election, Blair, who did after all win that election easily, allowed himself to say this would be his last term in office. That was it. Brown and his restive cronies started baying until, facing a virtual putsch and muttering blackmail under his breath, Blair said this month that he'd be gone within a year. Read by June, 2007.

Moral of story: If you're going to fire your rival for the top job, do it while that rival is weak and you're still strong. Blair might have ousted Brown at any moment until the Iraq shadow fell, but it seems his dislike of conflict and a moralist's nagging conscience - that Islington promise - got in the way of his killer instincts.

So here we are, with Brown getting ready to take what he considers his due, Cherie Blair in an even worse temper than her husband, and the prime minister sounding positively giddy with the absurdity of his situation.

"One of the good things about being in my position is that I can give people advice, and it is up to them whether they take it or not," Blair told a trade union conference this week.

That would be funny if it were not serious. The word of the leader of a major European power whose soldiers are getting killed in Afghanistan and Iraq should not be a take-it-or-leave-it proposition.

But Blair is a much-reduced figure, his halo, history. The "Yo-Blair" episode at the St. Petersburg summit in July seemed to capture, for his electorate, all the more poodle-like aspects of the Blair-Bush relationship, whose central mystery is that it seems to have given the prime minister so little in return for his loyalty.

Which brings us to Brown's central conundrum. That he can outmaneuver his Labour Party rivals and get Blair's job seems probable. That he can tone down his impatience, suffer fools more easily, and inject a touch of humanity into his zombie-Presbyterian image seems possible.

But what does he do about marking his distance from Bush and Iraq, moves that seem critical to his chances in the next election?

"I can't think of another moment when relations with the United States were the central question in the transfer of power from one prime minister to another within the same party," said Jonathan Eyal, a foreign policy expert at the Royal United Services Institute. "But that's the seminal issue today."

Here's the puzzle for Brown. If he doesn't turn Britain into a more critical ally, and doesn't demonstrate that he's not in the pocket of the most unpopular politician here (Bush), he's in deep trouble.

But if he gets too critical of the United States, he will be branded a left-winger, which would suit the resurgent Conservatives. He would also appear to move closer to the European Union, a direction he dislikes.

So the answer would appear to be constructive criticism of Bush, establishing some distance while avoiding anything as draconian as the removal of troops from Iraq.

The problem is that David Cameron, the Conservative leader, has already staked out that position, in a speech on the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attack.

In it, Cameron said: "We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America." He criticized the amalgamating of diverse threats into "a single global jihad." He called for "a new multilateralism." He criticized "disproportionate Israeli bombing in Lebanon" and the "stoop to illiberalism" at Guantánamo Bay.

Those are words designed to make the ice-cool Brown sweat. For where then does he take British foreign policy, a subject on which taciturnity has been his favored, but now inadequate, mode?

The cover this week of Private Eye, the satirical magazine, featured Britain's unhappy pair. "You've got to name your successor," says Gordon. "O.K. It's David Cameron," says Tony.

That would be funny if it were not serious.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush, GOP Senators Remain At Odds Over Terrorist Interrogation Rules. President Bush in his radio address reiterated his call for Congress to pass a bill clarifying rules for interrogating terrorists. Bush and Senate Majority Leader Frist signaled their expectations that common ground could be reached, but GOP opposition to Bush's proposal was described as increasing in the Washington Post and New York Times. The Post, Times and Los Angeles Times all published editorials staunchly opposed to Bush's counter-terrorism policies Sunday morning and echoing the same them that Bush had overstepped his authority and suggesting he was using national security as an election issue.

The AP (9/17, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush is standing firm in his battle to get Congress to approve the White House plan for detaining, interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists. The Senate, though, isn't backing away from its plan either." In his radio address he "said his proposal provides clear rules for U.S. personnel involved in detaining and questioning alleged terrorists held by the CIA" and described how interrogation had been used to successfully prevent terrorist attacks.

Bloomberg (9/17, Dodge) reports Bush "urged Congress to pass two measures he called essential to winning the war on terrorism." Bush said, "There is debate about the specific proposals in this bill, and my administration will work with Congress to find common ground."

The AP (9/17, Davenport) reports, "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist…said Saturday he has to do more to get Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in line with other Republicans and the White House on how terrorist suspects should be prosecuted." The AP notes, "Getting his GOP members in line 'is a fundamental challenge from a leadership standpoint,' said Frist, a potential candidate for president in 2008. He said he expects a compromise to emerge in the next two weeks, even though McCain and Graham haven't budged."

GOP Opposition To Bush Over Interrogations Seen As Growing. While the wire services noted Bush's radio message, other prominent newspapers ignored it and focused on the political debate, describing GOP opposition to Bush's interrogation policies as stronger than expected. The New York Times (9/17, A1, Hulse, Zernike, Stolberg, 1.21M) in a front page story reports that "Bush seems equally determined to win provisions he says are needed to interrogate and prosecute terrorism suspects.. … Warner, like his two colleagues, has a network of high-ranking current and retired military officers who provide regular guidance and support. While he has been consulting them privately, some are expected to weigh in publicly in the days ahead. One aide said on Saturday that the number of Senate Republicans behind the three senators was widening beyond the 8 or 10 they had anticipated, with lawmakers -- heavily influenced by Mr. Powell's stance -- preparing to soon go public with their views." And "two senior Bush administration officials acknowledged that the White House had underestimated the depth of opposition Mr. Bush's proposal would provoke. They also said they had focused mostly on gaining Mr. Graham's support and mistakenly believed they had it, based on statements he made about the Geneva Conventions in Senate hearings. A Republican senator separately described the clash between the White House and Mr. Warner's group as 'a train wreck.'"

And the Washington Post (9/17, A5, Weisman, 748K) in an article titled "Tribunal Dispute Could Ruin GOP Strategy" says the debate between the White House and GOP opponents "could ruin" the GOP "legislative strategy" to use national security as a campaign issue. House Majority Leader John Boehner said "It's the legislative process. It's never predictable" and he "and other Republicans remain confident that they are on the right track. Republicans point to recent polls showing a slight uptick in the president's popularity and say that the focus on national security issues is working." Yet "misgivings over the agenda set out by the president and GOP leaders are growing. Rep. Steve Buyer (R-Ind.) said he told Bush on Thursday that he should heed the military's top uniformed lawyers, who have opposed some provisions of the president's tribunal plan. Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.), one of several moderate Northeasterners in tough reelection campaigns, said he has no problem with Bush's bills. He is likely to vote against them." Meanwhile "the showdown between Bush and McCain is grabbing the spotlight from Republican initiatives that were supposed to undergird their case that they are the stronger party on national and homeland security."

DOJ_NMG_0064539

Top House Armed Services Democrat Will Seek To Amend Bill To Reflect Senators' Concerns. The AP (9/17, Riechmann) notes, "Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, supports a House bill that takes the administration's position to move the process along, but he said he will attempt to amend the measure next week to look more like the McCain-Warner-Graham measure. He said the Senate bill would be less likely to be challenged by the Supreme Court as unlawful and violating the nation's treaty obligations. 'I don't want to give any terrorist a free pass or get-out-of-jail-free card,' Skelton said."

Romney Supports Bush Terrorist Interrogation Plan. Meeting with GOP officials in Columbia, SC the AP (9/17, Davenport) quotes Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney saying "I'm foursquare behind the president on this. … We need to provide to the interrogators the definitive rules that they need."

CIA Action On Hold During Political Debate Over Interrogations. The AP (9/17, Shrader) reports that while the "CIA believed it was operating lawfully in detaining and interrogating 96 suspected terrorists" the Supreme Court ruling has "demolished that legal foundation" and for "Bush, the CIA and their allies, the law urgently needs to be changed to protect the interrogation program, which they consider one of the most important ways to deter attacks against the United States." The AP continues, "Bush administration officials say the Justice Department has deemed the CIA's practices lawful. In addition, the senior U.S. official said the House and Senate Intelligence committees have now been told everything about the CIA's overseas prisons and interrogation program, except the countries where the prisons were." Yet "a congressional aide disputed that. The aide said briefings for the Senate committee took place only recently and that the administration has denied the committee access to materials it needs to fulfill its oversight role of the CIA. For example, the committee's top Democrat, West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, has not been able to see the Justice Department's legal opinions."

Future Of Detainees At Guantanamo Remains Uncertain. Investigative reporter Tim Golden in a 10,464 word article in the New York Times Magazine (9/17) chronicles the service of Col. Mike Bumgarner as "warden of Guantanamo Bay," starting in April 2005. When "Bumgarner took command at Guantánamo, information had emerged to suggest that many of the detainees were not, in fact, the hardened terrorists whom Pentagon officials had claimed to be holding there. Bumgarner did not doubt that his new prisoners were dangerous, but neither was he wary of getting to know them better." He "moved quickly to try to reduce tensions in the camp" but the "detainees did not respond as the military authorities hoped." After a disruption caused by a Saudi named Shaker Aamer, Baumgarner sought to defuse the situation in a meeting. Their "conversation centered on Aamer's thoughts on the detention operation and what could be done to improve it. The Saudi's ideas, it seemed, were perhaps not so far from Hood's. 'His implication was that if you applied the Geneva Conventions fully, everything would be just fine in the camps,' Bumgarner recalled." After "Bush announced broad changes in policies for the detention and prosecution of terror suspects on Sept. 6, he said the government 'will move toward the day when we can eventually close the detention facility at Guantánamo Bay.' But by sending 14 important C.I.A. captives there and pushing to try prisoners before reconstituted military tribunals, he appeared to be extending the life of the detention center for the foreseeable future."

Former US POWs Offer Mixed Reaction To Bush Interrogation Proposal. Howard Goodman in his column in the South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/17, 265K) titled "Don't Jettison Geneva Conventions, Ex-POWs Say" writes that at the "National POW/MIA Recognition Day…about 35 people gathered in the chapel of the VA Medical Center in West Palm Beach." 17 were former POWs. Goodman notes, "We live in a complicated time, when the Bush White House is pressing for permission to loosen time-honored rules regarding our treatment of war captives. There's some logic to this. As Bill Acuri, a Vietnam POW, noted, the Geneva Conventions make sense in terms of opposing armies. 'And the terrorists don't have an army.'" But other Veterans disagreed an Goodman trusts "ex-POWs on this more than a president and vice president who never were imprisoned and never went to war."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/17, 399K) reports, "The fact that the U.S. government has virtually abandoned the designation POW has raised the ire of some former POWs and activists who are keeping alive the issue of missing Americans from all wars." And "Retired Army Col. Ben Purcell of Clarkesville, who spent more than five years in North Vietnamese prison camps, said he never considered himself anything other than a POW, despite the best efforts of his interrogators to convince him otherwise." Purcell said, "I became a prisoner at war. I argued with my interrogators, I went on hunger strikes and I tried to escape." Yet "he found strength in knowing he was a POW and should have been treated according to the articles of the Geneva Conventions."

Bush Accused Of Not Seeking Consensus On National Security. Ron Brownstein in his column titled "Bush Fails To Recapture The Nation's Post-9/11 Unity" in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K) argues that "the degree of division over national security five years after Sept. 11 is extraordinary." Unlike the Vietnam War, "the fight against Islamic extremism is much more like World War II, when almost all Americans condemned the goals, methods and beliefs of our fascist enemies." Brownstein states, "Bush's decision to invade Iraq amid ambivalence at home and widespread resistance abroad was obviously a critical fork in the road." But "Bush simply hasn't placed a high priority on establishing consensus for his national security strategy." Bush "has provided Democrats and even skeptical Republicans little voice in shaping his national security strategy. Bush has also shown himself to be willing, even eager, to frame national security debates in ways that maximize their political impact." The loss after the 9/11 attacks "is now matched by the tear in the sense of common purpose that inspired so much of the country five years ago."

Yoo Defends Bush Effort To Expand Executive Authority. University of California at Berkeley law school professor John Yoo, a deputy assistant attorney general from 2001 to 2003, in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) defends Bush's policies arguing that "the founders intended that wrongheaded or obsolete legislation and judicial decisions would be checked by presidential action, just as executive overreaching is to be checked by the courts and Congress." Yoo concludes, "Congress has for years been avoiding its duty to revamp or repeal outmoded parts of bygone laws in the light of contemporary threats. We have needed energy in the executive branch to fill in that gap. Congress now must act to guide our counterterror policy, but it should not try to micromanage the executive branch, particularly in war, where flexibility of action is paramount."

Three Top US Newspapers Oppose Bush Counter-Terrorsim Policies. The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) in an editorial argues Bush has the authority to monitor and interrogate terrorists under current laws and writes it is "struck by how often" Bush "acts as though there were not two sides to a debate. We have lost count of the number of times he has said Americans have to choose between protecting the nation precisely the way he wants, and not protecting it at all." Bush "is following a script for the elections: terrify Americans into voting Republican. But behind that seems to be a deeply seated conviction that under his leadership, America is right and does not need the discipline of rules. He does not seem to understand that the rules are what makes this nation as good as it can be."

The Washington Post (9/17, B6, 748K) editorializes, "Rather than admit that he wants to legalize disappearances and torture, Mr. Bush ominously warns that 'the program' won't continue unless Congress passes his bill. He says 'time's running out,' even though it's not. There are no detainees in the CIA prisons at the moment, according to the president, and the only clock running out is that measuring the midterm election campaign. There is no need for Congress to act in the next two weeks. But if it does, the clear answer to Mr. Bush's question, endorsed by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), former secretary of state Colin L. Powell and a host of other responsible Republican and military leaders, is 'no.' For both moral and practical reasons, the country should reject this fundamental violation of its principles."

The Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K) in an editorial writes, "Bush made full use of the 9/11 anniversary last week. In his speeches and remarks, he reminded the nation of the stakes involved in what he calls the war on terror, and he conveyed a renewed sense of urgency to prevent attacks and bring those responsible for 9/11 to justice. Yet if his goal was also to pressure Congress into acting as a rubber stamp for the administration's questionable legal tactics in conducting this war, it was a disappointing week for the president -- and a heartening one for anyone outside the White House."

Former Detainee Urges Congress To Defend Detainees' Rights. Former Guantanamo detainee Abu Bakker Qassim now in Albania in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) writes, "I was locked up and mistreated for being in the wrong place at the wrong time during America's war in Afghanistan. Like hundreds of Guantánamo detainees, I was never a terrorist or a soldier. … Pakistani bounty hunters sold me and 17 other Uighurs to the United States military like animals for $5,000 a head. The Americans made a terrible mistake." Qassim concludes, "I feel great sadness for the families who lost their loved ones on that horrible day five years ago. And I would be sadder still to see the freedom-loving American people walk away from their respect for the rule of law. I want America to be a strong and respected nation in the world. Only then can it continue to be the source of hope for the hopeless — like my people.

Yemen Arrests Militants. The AP (9/17, Abu-nasr) reports, "Four suspected al-Qaida members who were plotting attacks for Yemen's capital were arrested Saturday, a day after security forces foiled near-simultaneous attempts to blow up two oil installations." The Yemeni interior minister "said the suspects had links to the four suicide bombers who tried to strike the oil installations Friday but were killed during the attacks." He linked the attacks to a videotape by Al Qaeda No. 2 leader Ayman al-Zawahiri that threatened "attacks in the Persian Gulf region and on facilities he accused of stealing Muslim oil."

Tribesmen Pressure Yemen Through Well-Treated Hostages. The AP (9/17, Abu-nasr) reports, "Captives in Yemen get hospitality. While militants in places like Iraq hold and sometimes murder prisoners, Yemeni tribes take hostages to pressure the government for relatively simple demands, such as freeing clan members from jail or improving roads, hospitals and schools." Former hostages "tell of sightseeing trips, parting gifts of pendants, incense or traditional curved daggers, wine served with dinner despite a ban on liquor and afternoons spent shooting — a popular sport among tribesmen."

Definition Of "Moderate" Muslim Debated. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Watanabe, 918K) reports, "Who is a moderate Muslim? … The question has come under intense debate since 9/11 as the public struggles to distinguish peaceful Muslims from Al Qaeda terrorists, and is at the heart of two Southern California skirmishes over who represents moderate Islam." According to the report, "In a dinner scheduled for tonight, the American Jewish Congress plans to honor" Tashbih Sayyed, a journalist based in Alta Loma, Calif., who praises Israel's behavior toward Palestinians as tolerant and criticizes Muslims for corrupting Islam. Also, four other will be honored "for what it sees as their friendly attitudes toward Israel and courageous efforts to reform Islam. Gary Ratner, executive director of the Congress' Western region office in Los Angeles, said the tribute is part of the organization's global efforts to reach out to moderate Muslims in Pakistan, Indonesia, Albania and elsewhere, including sponsoring a dinner in New York last year for Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf." According to the report, "The organization's choice of honorees, however, has offended some Muslims, in part because three of them no longer practice the faith. In contrast, a different award has offended some Jewish sensibilities: the decision by the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission to honor" Maher Hathout, a Los Angeles Muslim leader who has promoted interfaith relations and women's equality but denounced Israel as a brutal apartheid regime, "as a model of harmonious interfaith relations."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Extensive Intelligence Outsourcing Raises Concerns. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Miller, 918K) reports, "Largely because of the demands of the war on terrorism and the drawn-out conflict in Iraq, U.S. spy agencies have turned to unprecedented numbers of outside contractors to perform jobs once the domain of government-employed analysts and secret agents." Concern has arisen out of the fear "that using contractors to do spying work carries security risks and higher costs."

Abraxas Corporation Epitomizes Today's Intelligence Contractors. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Miller, 918K) reports on Abraxas, a company "that has assembled a deep roster of CIA veterans to handle a wide range of clandestine assignments -- including secret work for an elite team of overseas case officers." Some critics question its role in the CIA's nonofficial cover (NOC) program, saying "that whatever talent Abraxas had assembled, outsourcing any work in such a sensitive program posed an inherent security risk."

Scholar Faults Lack Of Intell Reform Since 9/11. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), professor Amy Zegart writes, "Five years after the most devastating terrorist attack in U.S. history, all our worst intelligence deficiencies remain. Intelligence is spread across 16 agencies that operate as warring tribes more than a team." Despite the creation of a director of national intelligence, "the Pentagon has quietly expanded its intelligence activities at home and abroad." Those Pentagon units operate "without warrants, presidential authorizations or meaningful supervision by the director of national intelligence and Congress." The CIA and FBI have not mended their ways. Zegart warns, "We should not confuse luck with effectiveness."

Anthrax Investigation Has Yielded Few Results. The Houston Chronicle (9/17, Rosenberg, 535K) reports, "Five years after anthrax killed five people and introduced America to high-tech bioterrorism, one of the biggest crime mysteries of our times remains unsolved. FBI agents and U.S. postal inspectors have pursued hundreds of leads and interviewed scores of scientists who work with the deadly anthrax bacteria, but the investigation now appears to be languishing." According to the report, "The murders-by-germ in the weeks immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks added to the nation's anxieties and triggered a massive hunt for the perpetrator who used the mail to spread the bacteria. Hundreds of FBI personnel worked the case at the outset, struggling to discern whether the Sept. 11 al-Qaida attacks and the anthrax murders were connected before eventually concluding that they were not." According to the report, "A senior law enforcement official familiar with the investigation insisted that 'the investigation is still ongoing and intensely active.' The official, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly, said there 'are a number of pending and very important leads that are being pursued.'"

Federal Transportation ID Card Initiative Stalls. The Washington Post (9/17, A3, Hsu, 748K) reports, "A Bush administration initiative to secure the nation's ports is bogged down in industry opposition, technology flaws and evidence that it fails to safeguard workers' privacy, according to industry and government analysts. The rocky launch of the Transportation Worker Identification Credential threatens to delay what Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff declared his highest priority after the Dubai port controversy in February: starting by year's end to screen the backgrounds of 750,000 U.S. workers at critical sea, air and land transportation facilities, and issuing them microchip-equipped ID cards." According to the report, "More broadly, the long-overdue ID program foreshadows concerns that hundreds of millions of Americans soon may encounter as the government starts issuing similarly equipped driver's licenses, passports, federal-worker badges and immigrant-guest-worker cards in coming years."

Proposed 'Freedom Tower' At Ground Zero Closer To Reality, Though Questions Remain. The New York Times (9/17, Bagli, 1.21M) reports, "The federal and New York State governments have tentatively agreed to become anchor tenants in the Freedom Tower, the tallest, most symbolic and most scrutinized skyscraper project at ground zero, under a plan expected to be announced today by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and the governors of New York and New Jersey. The agreements, which would cover about 1 million of the 2.6 million square feet in the building, are a significant step forward in the development of the tower, which is seen by Gov. George E. Pataki and others as a symbol of the city's resilience, but regarded by some critics as folly." According to the report, "The building has been bedeviled by squabbling and delays, as well as questions about design and security and whether there would be enough demand for office space downtown to keep it financially sound. The Freedom Tower, which would rise to the emblematic height of 1,776 feet, including the antenna, is one of four office towers planned for the 16-acre site." According to the report, "The leading candidate to succeed Mr. Pataki, Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic attorney general, has questioned the economic viability of the tower, calling it a 'white elephant.' … Final approval of the project by the Port Authority may be months away, which could put it in the hands of the next New York governor, who takes office in January."

Federal Aid Bypasses Renters In New Orleans. The New York Times (9/17, Saulny, Rivlin, 1.21M) reports, "As billions in housing aid begins to flow here [New Orleans] in the next few weeks, most of it will go to homeowners, who have been appointed by city officials as the true architects of this city's recovery, despite the fact that roughly half the city's residents rented housing before Hurricane Katrina. The renters of New Orleans, it seems, are on their own. Rents are skyrocketing across the city, up an average of 39 percent since Hurricane Katrina. The city has announced that it plans to refurbish only a small fraction of its traditional public housing units. … Though some aid has been set aside for landlords, many lower-income residents who say they are unable to return have been priced out."

National Guard Remain In New Orleans Due To Rising Crime Rates. The AP (9/17) reports National Guard troops and state police will patrol New Orleans "through December, Gov. Kathleen Blanco said Saturday at a summit of law enforcement officials and crime experts called to address a spate of killings marring the recovery from Hurricane Katrina. … Police are on pace to recover as many illegal firearms this year as they did in the two previous years -- even though half as many people live in the city now, said Robert Browning, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. But in a positive sign, court and prison repairs should be done next month, an official said, which means the city's crippled criminal justice system will be able to process its influx of suspects more efficiently."

WAR NEWS:

Jim Baker Said To Lead "Last Hope" Of Salvaging Iraq. The Washington Post (9/17, A23, Abramowitz, 748K) reports, "Is Jim Baker bailing out the Bushes once again?" Former secretary of state James A. Baker III "visited Baghdad two weeks ago to take a look at the vexing political and military situation," as co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is "widely viewed" by "foreign policy elites" as "perhaps the last hope for a midcourse correction in a venture they generally agree has been a disaster" – and only due to "the involvement of Baker." While "Baker has offered some hints of his thinking -- and his dismay with the way the Iraq occupation has been handled by the administration," he "is not revealing much of his hand."

Professor Argues Against "Fallacy" Of Citing Sunk Costs To Stay In Iraq. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), psychology professor Barry Schwartz argues, "Psychologists, decision scientists and economists ... tell us that it's a mistake to continue with a project or an activity because of what you have already invested in it." Therefore, whatever the US ultimately decides to do in Iraq (stay or leave), it "is unacceptable to justify continued involvement in Iraq or any other conflict on the grounds that we 'owe' it to those who have already fallen."

Andrew Krepinevich Urges Bush To Use "Basic Military Smarts." In the New York Daily News (9/17, 729K), military pundit Andrew Krepinevich writes, "The sad but simple truth: In many ways this war is still being fought with a 'business as usual' approach, and that's hurting our chances of victory." There is no single individual "in overall control of the war effort," nor is there a "war cabinet" that meets daily. Krepinevich warns, "Fixing the problems of unity of command, of playing merry-go-round with generals, of taking a pickup team approach to the adviser effort and of refusing to demand some sacrifices here at home may not guarantee success, but the administration's failures on all fronts are a down payment on failure."

Training Iraqi Forces Is A Logistical Challenge. The AP (9/16, Santana) reports, "While the U.S. training program has made great progress teaching Iraqi soldiers how to fight, the force still relies on American help for distributing supplies — a dependency that is another obstacle to sending U.S. troops home." Iraqi forces, ironically, lack fuel for their tanks, as well as ammunition and spare parts. In addition, their logistical units "are still understaffed," because of an earlier emphasis on training combat units to fight Sunni insurgents.

More Troops Would Help "Somewhat" In Anbar. In a Week in Review piece for the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), reporter Thom Shanker writes that, if the US indeed sent more forces to violent Anbar province, "The answer is, they would help, in the short term. But many military analysts also warn that sending in another division — anywhere from 12,00 to 15,000 troops — could create more problems." Drawbacks include a possible perception that "among many Iraqis that the United States is a clumsy and violent occupying power."

Columnist Challenges GOP To Increase Troop Levels. Frank Rich in his column in the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) suggests "a thought experiment. Let's pretend everything Mr. Bush said is actually true and then hold him to his word. If the safety of America really depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad, then our safety is in grave peril because we are losing that battle. The security crackdown announced with great fanfare by Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki in June is failing." So "if what the president says is true about the stakes in Baghdad, it's tantamount to treason if Bill Frist, Rick Santorum and John Boehner fail to rally their party's Congressional majority to stave off defeat there. We can't emulate our fathers and grandfathers and whip today's Nazis and Communists with 145,000 troops. Roosevelt and Truman would have regarded those troop levels as defeatism."

CPA Selection Process Allegedly Valued GOP Loyalty Over Relevant Skills. Both the Washington Post and New York Times ran front page stories on alleged US mistakes in Iraq. A 4,461-word excerpt from the new book Life In the Emerald City appears on the front page of the Washington Post (9/17, 748K). In it, Washington Post reporter Rajiv Chandrasekaran argues that Jim O'Beirne ("a political appointee who screens prospective political appointees for Defense Department posts") oversaw a selection process for the CPA that favored Republican loyalties rather than skills relevant for administering Iraq. Chandrasekaran writes, "Many of those chosen by O'Beirne's office to work for the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran Iraq's government from April 2003 to June 2004, lacked vital skills and experience. A 24-year-old who had never worked in finance -- but had applied for a White House job -- was sent to reopen Baghdad's stock exchange. ... The decision to send the loyal and the willing instead of the best and the brightest is now regarded by many people involved in the 3 1/2 -year effort to stabilize and rebuild Iraq as one of the Bush administration's gravest errors. ... By the time Bremer departed in June 2004, Iraq was in a precarious state."

An accompanying chart shows photos of some politically connected, high-level CPA appointees. A positive book review in the Washington Post Book World (9/17) says that the book "documents the way that an avalanche of unjustifiable mistakes transformed a difficult mission into an impossible one."

Jonathan Chait Blasts Handling Of Iraq War. In the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), op-ed columnist Jonathan Chait writes, "The more we learn about the war's conduct, the more we learn that the administration didn't just make the normal sorts of mistakes that inevitably occur in wartime; it was almost criminally negligent. The Bush administration literally refused to do any planning for the occupation. They invaded before all the available troops were in place, staffed the Coalition Provisional Authority with underqualified hacks vetted solely on the basis of ideological loyalty and rashly disbanded the Iraqi army, which could have provided some early order."

Iraqis Struggle To Root Out Rogue Police State. The New York Times (9/17, Wong, von Zielbauer, 1.21M) reports in a 2,330-word front page story, "Shiite militiamen and criminals entrenched throughout Iraq's police and internal security forces are blocking recent efforts by some Iraqi leaders and the American military to root them out, a step critical to winning the trust of skeptical Sunni Arabs and quelling the sectarian conflict, Iraqi and Western officials say." One Western diplomat said that "more than 1,200 policemen and other employees had been convicted years ago of murder, rape and other violent crimes"; in addition, the Shiite interior minister "has limited power to remove politically connected subordinates and enact changes" because he is independent of "powerful Shiite political leaders."

Iraqi Deputy PM Says Iraq Has Plan. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (9/17, 748K), Iraqi Deputy PM Barham Salih writes, "We must change the dynamic of violence. The Iraqi government has undertaken a searching analysis and is responding with a strategy on two fronts: national and international." Domestic planks "are national reconciliation, democratic federalism, political inclusion and a fair and rational oil policy," while the international strategy "involves a road map for economic development." Apparently mindful of growing US impatience with enactment of reform, he states, "We Iraqis must recognize that it is up to us to resolve our problems. Outsiders cannot deliver for us."

Iraqi Legislators Have Steep Learning Curve. In a Week In Review piece for the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), reporters Richard Oppel and Abdul Razzaq al-Saiedi write that a "rookie mistake" by Abdul Aziz Al-Hakim, head of a powerful Shiite coalition, "shows how steep the learning curve may be for Iraq's legislators -- even the most wily -- as they observe democratic procedures." His proposal to have the Shiite-dominated southern provinces "form one huge autonomous state, beneath which would lie billions of barrels of oil," foundered for both surprising and unsurprising reasons. Sunnis predictably rejected it for fear of being left "with little oil," but "other Shiite parties, some analysts say, are hesitant to back so grand a vision because such a huge autonomous region could one day fall under the sway of one party," namely, Hakim's.

Sunnis Criticize Baghdad Security Plan As Deaths Mount. The New York Times (9/17, Oppel, 1.21M) reports, "Dozens more bodies have been discovered in Baghdad in the past two days, bringing the four-day total to at least 165 and prompting some Sunni Arab leaders to raise new questions about the recent security operation intended take back Baghdad." Iraqi police reported finding 35 bodies on Friday and at least 21 on Saturday.

The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Roug, 918K) reports, "Police said Saturday that they had recovered 48 bodies throughout Baghdad, bringing the toll from clandestine killings since Monday to about 190 people." Concerning the plan to build a trench around the capital, the Times says, "The deadliest threat is not explosives or large-scale attacks by Sunni-led insurgents but rather secret executions."

Explosions Kill 17 In Baghdad; Maliki Pleads For Unity. The Wall Street Journal/AP (9/17) reports, "After a one-day lull, bloodshed surged again in the capital Saturday, with at least 17 people dead in attacks and 27 probable victims of sectarian killings found dumped in the streets as Iraq's prime minister launched a fresh appeal for reconciliation." The AP says of Maliki's plan, "No major Sunni Arab insurgent group has publicly agreed to join the plan, and many Shiite militias are controlled by legislators themselves." The latest effort to protect Baghdad, Operation Together Forward, "has made little headway, with the city's death toll surpassing 1,500 in July and triggering fears among U.S. commanders that civil war could break out."

Suicide Bomber Kills 18 In Kirkuk. AFP (9/17) reports, "A suicide truck bomber firing a machine gun with one hand exploded his vehicle near a police centre, killing at least 18 people and wounding 65 in Iraq's northern oil city of Kirkuk, police said." Violence had earlier been kept to a minimum, "but in the past few months there has been a sharp increase in the number of explosions and car bombs," which US forces have attributed to groups with Al Qaeda links.

Sectarian Violence Has Cut US Casualties. The Washington Times/London Sunday Telegraph (9/17, Hussein) reports, "The sectarian violence that has brought Iraq to the verge of civil war has had one unexpected benefit: a marked fall in the number of American military casualties in Baghdad. American combat deaths in the capital are down 50 percent from the same three-month period last year and some terrorists say the United States has succeeded in deflecting attention from its own troops."

Senate Intelligence Report On Iraq Dismissed As Inaccurate. Stephen Hayes in a 5,060 word article in the upcoming issue of the Weekly Standard (9/25) disputes the conclusion of the Senate Intelligence report finding that Saddam Hussein resisted "cooperating with al Qaeda or other Islamist groups." The Standard argues, "Saddam Hussein's regime has a long and well-documented history of cooperating with Islamists, including al Qaeda and its affiliates." Citing various instances of such alleged cooperation, the Standard says, "The authors seem determined to write it out of the history. ... The Senate report fails to provide any ... contextual balance to the denials of detained Iraqi officials."

Similarly in an op-ed for the Washington Times (9/17, 88K), journalist Deroy Murdock calls the Senate report finding no connection between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda "seriously flawed." The "report relies on unreliable witnesses, ignores potential and actual evidence of Saddam's philanthropy of terror, and yet quietly acknowledges he, in fact, worked with terrorists."

US, Afghan Troops Launch Offensive. The AP (9/17, Abrashi) reports, "Thousands of American and Afghan troops unleashed a new offensive against Taliban militants in eastern Afghanistan on Saturday in an effort to expand the government's reach into the volatile Pakistani border region." The AP describes the operation as involving "7,000 U.S. and Afghan soldiers in the central and eastern provinces of Paktika, Khost, Ghazni, Paktya and Logar." The NATO commander for Afghanistan "said Saturday he expects the military campaign against the Taliban to last another three to five years." In addition, "two separate insurgent attacks on a military base in Khost province killed a U.S.-led coalition soldier and wounded another on Friday, the military said. A number of Afghan troops also were wounded." In other news, "a bomb blast south of the Afghan capital killed three security guards and wounded another on Saturday."

The Washington Post (9/17, A18, Constable, 748K) reports, "Three Afghan aid workers were killed Saturday when their vehicle hit a bomb on a highway just south of the capital, while 7,000 Afghan and U.S. troops launched an operation against Taliban insurgents in five eastern and central provinces," thus leading with the bomb blast, unlike the AP article.

Troops Work To Build Afghans' Trust. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/17, Maykluth, 399K) reports, "U.S. conventional military forces, trained to employ shock-and-awe power, have retooled for a more sophisticated mission" in Afghanistan. Among their tenets is avoidance of excessive force, like killing "the wrong people" and antagonizing locals for "months - years." Gestures like road building, which facilitates fighting insurgents, have improved relations with locals. The Inquirer calls eastern Afghanistan the "forgotten front in a forgotten war," where "during six months ... the 1-32 has taken more casualties than it did during its yearlong deployment to Iraq."

Assassinated Paktia Governor Is Remembered. In an Outlook piece for the Washington Post (9/17, 748K), pundit Barnett Rubin remembers Paktia Governor Hakim Taniwal, who was killed by a suicide bomber. Taniwal argued that anti-Taliban military operations "would have little long-lasting effect without popular support and economic development." He believed that the Pakistani government "helped" the Taliban, but he nonetheless "advocated settling Afghanistan's historic conflict with Pakistan over the Pashtun territories across the frontier known as the Durand Line, which Afghanistan has never recognized as a border, even under the Taliban."

Ten Peace Prize Winners Criticize Bush Decision To Topple Hussein. The Washington Times (9/17, Richardson, 88K) reports that at a gathering of Nobel peace prize winners some criticized the Bush Administration's war against terrorism. They "opened the three-day event by excoriating the White House for its invasion of Iraq and subsequent increases in military spending." They "also issued a statement identifying 10 'barriers to global peace.'" But "absent from the list was global terrorism." 1980 peace prize winner Adolfo Perez Esquivel "compared the nearly 3,000 persons killed on September 11 with the tens of thousands of children who die every day of hunger. 'I call that economic terrorism,' he said."

DOJ:

DOJ Gives Top Award To Enron Task Force. The Houston Chronicle (9/17) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this week bestowed his office's top annual award to federal prosecutors, FBI agents and paralegals who have served on the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, including those involved in this year's fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling." The Chronicle continues, "The recipients of the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service included Sean Berkowitz, Kathryn Ruemmler, John Hueston and Cliff Stricklin, the lead prosecutors in the four-month trial of Lay and Skilling." The Chronicle adds, "Other team members who received the award were prosecutors Robb Adkinds and Andrew Stolper and appellate specialists Douglas Wilson and John Drennan. … The award was also given to previous task force attorneys and leaders, including its first director, Leslie Caldwell; her successor as director, Andrew Weissmann; and former task force prosecutors Samuel Buell, Matthew Friedrich, Lisa Monaco, Benton Campbell and Linda Lacewell."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Gives Long Sentence To Alabama Man For Continued Misconduct. The Selma (AL) Times-Journal (9/17, Inge) reports, "A Selma (AL) man who federal authorities say 'continued criminal conduct' will get a longer sentence than recommended." The Times-Journal continues, "DeWayne Lewis, 34, pleaded guilty to a felon in possession of a handgun in May 2006 and faced a sentencing range of 63 to 78 months in prison, under the federal advisory sentencing guidelines. … In the plea agreement, prosecutors had recommended the low end of the guidelines, court officials said. … However, after Lewis testified in his own behalf at the sentencing hearing this week, senior U.S. District Judge Charles R. Butler ruled that Lewis had perjured himself during his testimony and therefore 'lacked acceptance of responsibility for his actions.'" The Times-Journal adds, "While on release awaiting sentencing, Lewis tested positive for cocaine use. … In addition, Lewis was a passenger in a vehicle stopped by the Selma Police Department when a gun was found next to where Lewis was seated. … Judge Butler then sentenced Lewis to the maximum term of 78 months in federal prison, to be followed by three years of supervised probation, according to information obtained from the U.S. Justice Department. … Deborah J. Rhodes, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Alabama, said the charges resulted from a joint investigation conducted by the ATF&E, The SPD and the Dallas County Sheriff's Office."

Rodriguez Jury To Begin Deliberating Death Penalty Request. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (9/17, Kolpack) reports, "The trial of Alfonso Rodriguez Jr. is entering its final stage, and jurors may begin deliberating this week over whether he should be the first person sentenced to death in North Dakota in nearly 100 years." The Pioneer-Press continues, "The verdict by the federal court jury of seven women and five men must be unanimous for Rodriguez, 53, of Crookston, Minn., to be sentenced to death instead of life in prison. He was convicted late last month of kidnapping resulting in the death of University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin. … 'I think this part is much harder to predict than when he was found guilty,' said Joseph Daly, a Hamline University law professor who has participated in death penalty cases and has been following the Rodriguez case. 'In North Dakota, jurors are not used to dealing with death penalty cases.'" The Pioneer-Press adds, "North Dakota does not have the death penalty but it is allowed in federal cases. During a trip to Fargo last year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government is justified in seeking capital punishment in some cases in states that have outlawed the penalty. … 'I believe the fact the state doesn't have the death penalty doesn't mean that the people of the state would not impose the ultimate sanction when the right circumstances dictate that that happen,' Gonzales said. … Prosecutors point to the fact that jurors, in deciding earlier that Rodriguez was eligible for the death penalty, found that Sjodin, 22, of Pequot Lakes, Minn., was killed in an 'especially heinous, cruel and depraved manner.'"

FBI Criticizes Over Secrecy In Cleveland Agent Sex Scandal. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (9/17, Prine) reported, "It's a steamy story of sex, lies and videotape, told in an obscure federal court case the FBI doesn't want you to hear about. But the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review uncovered the hidden details of 'Dale J. Herr vs. the Department of Justice' at the normally staid U.S. Merit Systems Protection Board." The Tribune-Review notes Herr "concedes in court documents that in 2002 he videotaped his sexual exploits with three women -- two co-workers and one from outside the agency," which eventually led to his dismissal from the bureau. "Although one of the taped women continued a romantic relationship with Herr after the brouhaha," Special Agent Jeffrey B. Killeen "persuaded administrative law judges to remove her name from documents because she was a 'victim.' Killeen also got judges to erase mention of the Cleveland field office and the identities of anyone who gave testimony. … 'Decisions like that are never made lightly,' said Patrick W. Kelley, FBI's deputy general counsel. … 'We have to keep in mind that there may be victims, and we have a duty to protect them from an unwarranted invasion of their privacy. To do that, we must look even at singularly identifying details in cases. We do this to ensure that more damage isn't done to the victims.'" However, "Contacted by the Trib, nearly a dozen top civil libertarians said FBI and board actions in the Herr matter raise questions about when it's appropriate to hide agent misconduct. At issue: Did the FBI push so hard to protect alleged victims, or did the agency fear embarrassment from a salacious story?"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Racial Violence Against New Mexico Navajo Nation Members Again Under Federal Review. The New York Times (9/17, Frosch, 1.21M) reports that in 1974 in Farmington, N.M., "the bodies of three Navajo men were found in nearby Chokecherry Canyon, burned and bludgeoned." The report adds, "The three White high school students charged in their killings were sent not to prison but to reform school. The violence and mild sentences incited marches by Navajos through Farmington's streets and exposed tensions between them and the town's largely white residents." According to the report, the United States Commission on Civil Rights eventually investigated and found widespread mistreatment and prejudice against Navajos. Now, more than three decades later, Navajo leaders here are again calling for federal intervention."

Report Gauges Toll Of Minnesota Human Trafficking. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Medcalf, Padilla) reports, "About 120 social-service groups in Minnesota that responded to a survey estimated that they had worked with more than 500 sex trafficking victims and 55 labor trafficking victims over the past three years." The Star Tribune continues, "The exploitation in Minnesota of victims lured into forced labor and sex should be addressed on an 'organized, statewide' level, according to a Minnesota Department of Public Safety report on human trafficking." The Star Tribune adds, "About 120 social-service groups in Minnesota that responded to a survey estimated that they had worked with more than 500 sex trafficking victims and 55 labor trafficking victims over the past three years. Some victims had been trafficked from Minneapolis, St. Paul, Roseville and the Mall of America, according to the report. .. Without statewide data on trafficking-related arrests, the numbers don't represent the fullness of the crime, according to the report, which was prepared for the Legislature. … Someone is trafficked when 'forced, defrauded or coerced into service regardless of movement,' but sometimes the offense involves transporting people across borders, domestic and international."

Missouri Woman Seeks DOJ Ruling On Monkey In Restaurants. The AP (9/17) reports, "A woman from southwestern Missouri has asked the Springfield-Greene County Health Department to allow her to take her pet monkey into restaurants as a service animal." The AP continues, "The woman, Debby Rose, of Springfield, says Richard, her bonnet macaque monkey, provides emotional support that allows her to overcome an anxiety disorder and go out in public places. Rose said the federal Americans With Disabilities Act should allow the practice." The AP adds, "Health department officials met Friday with a local service agency, the Southwest Center for Independent Living, which is acting as an agent for Rose. The health department told the agency that Rose must produce some kind of federal ruling or certification that the monkey is a service animal under the ADA before it will consider allowing her to take the monkey into public places, said Kevin Gipson, director of health. … Family members said Rose's anxiety was disabling. Without her monkey, she's less able to manage normal tasks, such as grocery shopping and dining out, because of severe anxiety. … Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman from the Justice Department in Washington, said that although the law was somewhat vague regarding emotional-support animals, they were covered. … 'It's kind of a fine line, but the law errs on the side of protecting individuals that are disabled,' she said."

Voting Reform Laws May Increase Likelihood Of Multi-State Election Machine Breakdown. The Washington Post (9/17, A1, Balz, Goldfarb, 748K), in a front-page story, reports, "An overhaul in how states and localities record votes and administer elections since the Florida recount battle six years ago has created conditions that could trigger a repeat -- this time on a national scale -- of last week's Election Day debacle in the Maryland suburbs, election experts said. In the Nov. 7 election, more than 80 percent of voters will use electronic voting machines, and a third of all precincts this year are using the technology for the first time. The changes are part of a national wave, prompted by the federal Help America Vote Act of 2002 and numerous revisions of state laws. … But in Maryland last Tuesday, a combination of human blunders and technological glitches caused long lines and delays in vote-counting. The problems, which followed ones earlier this year in Ohio, Illinois and several other states, have contributed to doubts among some experts about whether the new systems are reliable and whether election officials are adequately prepared to use them. In a polarized political climate, in which elections are routinely marked by litigation and allegations of incompetent administration or outright tampering, some worry that voting problems could cast a Florida-style shadow over this fall's midterm elections."

Maryland Problems Cause Some To Demand Paper Records. The Washington Post (9/17, A4, Barr, 748K) reports, "The primary day debacle in Montgomery and Prince George's counties will add momentum to regional efforts to ensure that election systems create a paper record of each vote, according to some elected officials and activists critical of paperless balloting. They say the crisis at the polls in Florida during the 2000 presidential race, which prompted many states to switch to electronic voting, forced the adoption of overly complex systems that now must be simplified. An aide to Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich…said heightened concerns about electronic voting in last week's primary would strengthen calls for a return to a paper-based system."

Voter ID Laws Tested In primary Elections. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (9/17, Lambrecht, Sichko, 300K) reports, "In the Arizona primary election last week, some Navajo Indians who don't drive and have no use for U.S. government-issued photo IDs didn't vote because of a new state law requiring identification to vote. … But in Macon, Ga., which tested Georgia's controversial photo identification law for the first time last week, only one voter of more than 200 who turned out for a school board special election lacked a picture ID — even though he had driven to the polling place." Missouri "— where a judge last week struck down a new state photo ID law — is not alone in grappling with new voting requirements. More courtroom maneuvering is expected over the Missouri law, which requires voters to produce a valid Missouri drivers license, nondrivers ID, U.S. passport or military ID. In at least eight states, political activists are squaring off over new rules requiring photo IDs as well as proof of citizenship and other identification for voter registration. In most cases, Republicans are supporting the restrictions, and Democratic-leaning groups are fighting them."

Milwaukee Manual Recount Finds Vote Total Was Flawed. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (9/17, Nunnally, 259K) reports, "Milwaukee officials announced Saturday that after a three-day manual count of ballots, Tuesday's primary election brought 46,500 voters to the polls in Milwaukee, not 80,000 as the city previously reported. City Election Commission chief Susan Edman said the ward-by-ward review of turnout confirmed the city's suspicion that a computer programming error by her office caused the misreporting.

Conservatives Using Rights Argument To Promote Causes Globally. In an op/ed in The New York Times Magazine (9/17), The New Republic's Joshua Kurlantzick writes, "Around the world, the N.R.A. is finding that a rights-based approach translates into many languages. … Going global also can provide a defense against the influence of international law, which judges like Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer have increasingly introduced into American courts." According to Kurlantzick, "Conservatives now realize that by co-opting the language of rights, traditionally employed by the political left, they can export their own ideas of universal rights, whether that means the White House's democratization program or a universal right to bear arms."

ANTITRUST:

Florida AG Reviewing Hospital Deal. The Fort Myers (FL) News-Press (9/17, Reed) reports, "The (Florida) state attorney general is looking into Lee Memorial Health System's acquisition of Southwest Florida Regional Medical Center and Gulf Coast Hospital. … 'We are aware of this potential merger, or purchase, and we're in the process of reviewing the situation,' spokeswoman JoAnn Carrin said." The News-Press continues, "In the 1990s, the attorney general had filed an amicus brief on Lee Memorial's behalf during the system's bid to acquire Cape Coral Hospital. At that time, the Federal Trade Commission was challenging Lee Memorial, saying the purchase would have given Lee Memorial too much control of the market. … District and appeals courts rejected the FTC argument and ruled Lee's status as a public hospital exempted it from antitrust action and the FTC did not have jurisdiction over the matter. The FTC dropped its complaint because Health Management Associates, or HMA, purchased it." The News-Press adds, "Cape Coral Hospital ultimately merged with Lee Memorial in June 1996. At the time of that merger, the state was seeking to block Hospital Corporation of America from taking over Cape Hospital because it would have too much power. .. 'The theory of antitrust is to protect the public,' said Charles Bigelow, a retired attorney who used to work for Lee Memorial and is familiar with its status as a public agency. 'If you apply antitrust to a public hospital, you're protecting the public from itself.'"

Administration Disputes Court's Claim On Environmental Impact Of Alaskan Oil Drilling. Bloomberg (9/16, Efstathiou) reports, "The Bush administration said a Sept. 27 sale of oil drilling leases in Alaska should go forward and rejected a court's objections that environmental effects have not been properly addressed. The U.S. Interior Department said in a court filing yesterday that the impact of expanded drilling on air, water, wetlands and wildlife had been properly considered in the plan to expand drilling in the National Petroleum Reserve." According to the report, "Earlier this month, U.S. District Judge James Singleton in Anchorage ruled that an environmental impact statement prepared by the agency failed 'to adequately address the cumulative effects' of drilling. … Singleton's preliminary decision threatened plans to proceed with the lease sale and drew praise from groups including the National Audubon Society." According to the report, "The sale includes 400,000 acres around Teshekpuk Lake, an area environmental groups consider a critical Arctic wildlife habitat."

Gulf Oil Deposit Discovery Adds Fuel To Offshore Drilling Debate. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/17, Gibson, 265K) reports, "Discovery of a vast oil deposit deep under the Gulf of Mexico has put additional pressure on Congress as it considers legislation on whether to allow offshore drilling closer to the Florida coast. The undersea oil field 270 miles southwest of New Orleans, which could expand U.S. reserves by as much as 50 percent, provides new arguments for both sides of a contentious debate over legislation to expand offshore drilling." According to the report, "Proponents say the discovery shows the great potential for tapping the Outer Continental Shelf closer to shore to boost energy supplies. Opponents contend it proves energy companies have plenty of tracts to explore without moving into more environmentally sensitive areas near Florida, California and other states dependent on clean beaches and tourism."

Natural Selection Foods Spinach Scrutinized As Potential Source Of E. Coli Outbreak. The New York Times (9/17, Preston, Marshall, 1.21M) reports,

"Packaged spinach salad disappeared from store shelves across the country Saturday, as investigators searched for the source of bacterial contamination that has now sickened more than 100 people. Officials said Saturday that the number of people affected by the E. coli outbreak now stood at 102, up from 94 the day before." According to the report, "Dr. David Acheson, director of food safety at the Food and Drug Administration, reported no additional deaths beyond one that had occurred in Wisconsin. At this point, Dr. Acheson said, federal officials do not know how or when the spinach was contaminated."

Kempthorne Said To Take Interior IG's Allegations "Very Seriously." Time (9/16, Waller, 4.03M) reports, "Complaints are beginning to pile up against the U.S. Interior Department. … The problems surfacing are serious: managerial incompetence, bureaucratic snafus that are costing taxpayers billions of dollars, and a pervasive forgive-and-forget attitude toward senior department officials who cross ethical lines." Time goes on to report on "In scorching testimony before a House Government Reform subcommittee the no-nonsense" Interior IG Earl Devaney "charged that during his seven years as Interior's IG his revelations of misdeeds and foul-ups have been routinely 'disregarded by the department.' … Rather than heads rolling for infractions, the Cabinet agency has become a fault-free zone, Devaney claims. 'Short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of Interior,' says the former Secret Service agent." Time notes, "A case Devaney found particularly troubling was that of Steven Griles, Interior's deputy secretary in George W. Bush's first term. Devaney in 2004 referred 25 possible ethics violations by Griles to the Office of Government Ethics outside of Interior. That office cleared Griles of 23 of the violations but referred the remaining two to then-Secretary Gale Norton for a decision. Devaney says Norton refused, over his objections, to take any action against her deputy. … Meanwhile, Dirk Kempthorne, who replaced Norton as Interior Secretary last July, insists he's taking Devaney's 'allegations concerning issues dating back to 1998 very seriously.'"

Environmentalists Target Evangelicals With Global Warming Film. The Kansas City Star (9/17, Montgomery, 278K) reports, "Before watching the end of the world, hundreds of movie viewers bowed their heads. 'Guard us against the historical arrogance of our own species,' a Methodist minister prayed recently. … Then lights dimmed for the Midwest premiere of 'The Great Warming.' The documentary on the man-made dangers of global warming is being released for church groups to review before the Nov. 7 elections. While its plot is an easy sell to this invited crowd — more left than right, plenty of hybrid cars parked outside — the film raises spiritual questions that could carve up evangelical voting blocs in new ways. Is protecting Earth a moral value, an act of stewardship? Seeking to nudge more social conservatives into the ecological fold, bumper stickers are asking, 'What Would Jesus Drive?'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alabama Guns Travel Across The Country. The Birmingham News (AL) (9/17, Robinson) reports, "Guns, bought easily and legally in Alabama and other states, are landing in the hands of criminals elsewhere, drawing the ire of leaders who have sued to stop the flow and pledged to fight what they say is a deadly export." The News continues, "Alabama's role as a Top 10 supply state for 'crime guns' - weapons purchased legally here but transferred illegally to others and sometimes used in crimes - is undisputed." The News adds, "New York City police say that 5 percent of the guns recovered at crimes in the first half of 2005 were last sold at retail in Alabama. … 'Alabama ranks, along with some other Southern states and some Midwestern states, in being a supply state because of its traditionally more lenient lifestyle and gun laws,' said Jim Cavanaugh, who supervises ATF operations in portions of the South. 'Guns are more readily available, more easily traded, plentiful. It's real.'" The News notes, "Guns trafficked out of Alabama have turned up during all kinds of investigations in other locations - robberies, assaults, sex crimes, drug crimes and at least 10 homicides - in the past several years, according to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … Special Agent Eric Kehn said Alabama guns have shown up from coast to coast: from Landover, Md., to Los Angeles; from Chicago to cities throughout Florida. … New York City has sued in Georgia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Virginia - and pledged to sue wherever needed - alleging a handful of gun dealers have created a public nuisance and are negligent in selling weapons that eventually land in the hands of criminals."

Gun-Ownership Case Heads To Wyoming Courtroom. The AP (9/17, Neary) reports, "Arguments are scheduled next month in a case in which Wyoming is seeking a federal court ruling affirming its authority to help some people convicted of misdemeanor domestic violence regain their right to own a firearm." The AP continues, "Federal law prohibits people with such convictions from owning guns." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Alan Johnson is scheduled to hear arguments in the case Oct. 6 in Cheyenne. … The state alleges that the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives acted illegally when it threatened to disallow about 11,000 concealed weapons permits the state issued as a substitute for federal background checks for firearms purchases. … The federal agency threatened to take that step unless the state repealed a 2004 law that allows people to expunge a first conviction for misdemeanor domestic violence." The AP notes, "Wyoming Attorney General Pat Crank says the current lawsuit comes down to an issue of states' rights. The National Rifle Association and the Gun Owners Foundation in Washington, D.C., have both filed briefs supporting the state's position. … Federal officials, however, say the issue is more narrow. They contend the state law fails to meet the legal standard for expungement. … Although the law allows people to petition in court to expunge a first misdemeanor conviction, it specifies that the record of that first conviction remains on the books for purposes of enhancing penalties for any subsequent crime. … 'The nuts and bolts of the government's position is that an expungement of a conviction wipes the slates clean, and that an expungement erases a conviction,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Carol A. Statkus, one of the lawyers representing the ATF. 'The Wyoming statute that's at issue in this case doesn't do that.'"

Risk Of Steroids, Growth Hormones Not Fully Explained To Young Athletes. In an op/ed in The Washington Post (9/17, B7, 748K), former Major League Baseball Commissioner Fay Vincent writes that "If, as seems likely, many of this generation have been taking such things as steroids and human growth hormones, they have been doing so with the benign neglect of their coaches and school officials." Vincent adds, "It is inconceivable that the people who are around these kids a lot don't know, or at least suspect, that something is going on. And yet we are doing little to educate young athletes to the risks of using such chemicals."

IMMIGRATION:

Federal Detention Facility Contractors Detained For Fake Immigration Documents. The Miami Herald (9/17) reports, "Immigration officers have detained 15 foreign nationals and accused them of using fake documents while working for a company doing roofing contract work at a federal detention facility in South Miami-Dade, ICE said Friday." The Herald continues, "Barbara Gonzalez, the agency's spokeswoman in Miami, said the 15 men were detained Sept. 7 after officers from the bureau of prisons at the Federal Correctional Institution stopped three of them because they suspected their immigration documents were fraudulent." The Herald adds, "Gonzalez said the officers contacted ICE, which dispatched investigators. Gonzalez said the three detained initially were scheduled to work at the facility with a roofing contractor. .. . 'Further information developed by ICE agents revealed that 15 individuals working as contractors were illegal aliens,' Gonzalez said. 'They had fraudulent immigration documents.' … Gonzalez said 13 of the detained men came from Mexico and the other two came from Guatemala. Twelve of the men had fraudulent green cards, and three had fraudulent Social Security cards, she said. … All were transported to the Krome detention center in West Miami-Dade and put in deportation proceedings, Gonzalez said." The Herald notes, "Disclosure of the Miami detentions came three days after two alleged leaders of a nationwide 'employee-leasing conspiracy,' allegedly involving hundreds of undocumented foreign nationals, pleaded guilty in Fort Lauderdale before U.S. District Judge Kenneth Marra, who sentenced a third defendant in the case."

Day Laborers Sue Village After Work Site Closed. The New York Times (9/17, Santos, 1.21M) reports, "The 36-year-old Mexican man has lived in Mamaroneck for eight years, trekking each morning to Columbus Park near the village center to wait for contractors who might pay him $10 an hour at best. But the village closed the hiring site in the park in February, and after that, he testified in court here last week, the police often chased away the employers with tickets, and the workers with fear. … The man…is one of six anonymous day laborers whose federal lawsuit against the Village of Mamaroneck could set a new national standard for the way local governments deal with the fast-growing influx of day laborers in their communities. For a week, Judge Colleen McMahon in Federal District Court heard testimony in a nonjury trial from the laborers, the police, contractors, merchants and village officials. Lawyers in the case said they hoped a decision would be reached by mid-October. The case accuses village officials of harassing the workers as part of a 'deliberate and coordinated' campaign to drive them off the streets, and rests on the workers' 14th Amendment claim that they are discriminated against because they are Hispanic."

National Guard Troops Assigned To Mexican Border Charged With "Beer Fueled" Gunplay. The Houston Chronicle (9/17, Gonzalez, 535K) reports that National Guard troops assigned "to help the U.S. Border Patrol with administrative and other tasks, allowing scores of patrol agents to resume law enforcement duties" allegedly spent "their off-duty time with beer-fueled joyriding and reckless gunfire. … Three soldiers from North Texas, at least one of whom had served in Iraq, were arrested the evening of Sept. 6 on felony deadly-conduct charges after several shots were fired from their private vehicle as it passed a family cookout in a modest Maverick County subdivision, officials said. Several adults and children 'hit the dirt' fearing a drive-by attack, Sheriff Tomas S. Herrera said, but no one was targeted or injured by the gunshots and no property damage was reported.

Maryland Guard Assigned To Border Duty. The Baltimore Sun (9/17, Dolan, 262K) reports 120 volunteers from the Maryland National Guard "have been dispatched to the Sonoran Desert as part of a stopgap interdiction measure announced in May by President Bush. Critics have questioned whether sending up to 6,500 part-time soldiers to watch the southern border is wise for a National Guard still saddled with commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan. They asked whether the Guard should be engaged in a seemingly extracurricular homeland security mission when its leaders struggle to recruit more soldiers and retain the guardsmen in their ranks today. … Watching the flow of people crossing the border every day, some of the Marylanders admit, has been eye-opening and disturbing, causing some to question the nation's immigration policies. Several guardsmen here are still waiting to become citizens and sympathize with those seeking to come to America."

Trucking Companies Reportedly Hire Illegals Without Proper Training. The Dallas Morning News (9/17, Jones, Becka, Lafleur, McGonigle, 500K) reports trucking companies in Texas "hire illegal immigrants who struggle to read road signs and communicate in English with police and emergency personnel." The News adds, "U.S.-Mexico trade has more than doubled since the North American Free Trade Agreement was implemented in 1994, according to federal data. About 68 percent of truck traffic from Mexico enters the U.S. at the Texas border."

TAX:

Battle Over Minimum Wage Boost Threatens Popular Tax Deductions. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Havemann, 918K) reports, "Just about every lawmaker in Congress favors extending a batch of popular tax benefits approved during President Bush's first years in office and authorized through 2005. But in a case study of the tortuous process that can surround even the most highly regarded proposal on Capitol Hill, extension of the tax benefits appears to face an uphill road as Congress nears adjournment. The benefits, claimed by more than 10 million taxpayers last year, give those who live in states without income taxes a deduction for their state sales taxes. They allow a deduction for some college tuition. Teachers may deduct the costs of buying supplies for their classrooms. And a research and development tax credit — hugely popular in the business community — is also part of the package. But so far, these and 43 other tax benefits have become ensnared in a partisan battle over a minimum-wage increase, which Democrats and some moderate Republicans want, and a sharp reduction in the estate tax, dear to the hearts of conservative Republicans."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pentagon Travel System Is Called Wasteful. The ABC News website (9/16, Cochran) reports that the "defense travel system," through which DOD buys plane tickets, is called "a disaster -- four years behind schedule and $200 million over budget." The system's contractor, Northrop Grumman, defends it, while Sen. Tom Coburn (R-OK) and the Citizens Against Government Waste denounce it.

Bonuses To Centers For Disease Control Officials Questioned. The New York Times (9/17, Harris, 1.21M) reports, "Top officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention received premium bonuses in recent years at the expense of scientists and others who perform much of the agency's scientific work, agency records show. Those inside the office of the centers' director, Dr. Julie L. Gerberding, have benefited the most, the records show." According to the report, "From 2002 through mid-2006, William H. Gimson III, the agency's chief operating officer, received bonuses totaling $147,863, which included seven cash awards of more than $2,500. Mr. Gimson's bonuses were about twice the amount granted to any other C.D.C. employee, the agency's records show." According to the report, "The increase in bonuses to these officials was part of a decision by the Bush administration to make transformation of the management of the centers a top priority, said Glen Nowak, chief of media relations at the centers. 'If we want to retain people, we need to recognize them,'" Nowak said, adding, "'We are operating in a highly competitive environment.'"

CDC 'Business Focus' Under Fire By Agency's Employees. The AP (9/17) reports, "The employees at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention who get bonuses most frequently are not scientists, but instead are accountants, budget analysts, computer experts and other administrative managers, according to a published report Sunday. The data appear to reinforce the findings of an internal CDC survey last year that found one of the top concerns among the agency's employees was a 'loss of public health focus/mission in exchange for inappropriate business focus.' According to the report, "The 72 CDC employees who received five or more awards of at least $2,500 from 2000 through July 21 work primarily in non-science jobs, according an analysis by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution of agency data obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. Some of those employees got $30,000, $50,000 and, in one case, more than $140,000 in cumulative bonuses during the period, the paper reported."

GOP Blamed For Rising Medicare Premiums In Democrat's Radio Address. The AP (9/17, Miga) reports, "Democrats say failed Republican policies are behind rising Medicare premiums that are leaving millions of older Americans scrambling for basic health care. Democrat Chris Murphy, a Connecticut state senator who is challenging 12-term Republican Rep. Nancy Johnson, criticized the GOP for failing to embrace the reforms needed to give seniors a break from increased health care costs. … 'My opponent, Nancy Johnson, deserves part of the blame,' said Murphy. 'She wrote the confusing Medicare law in 2003. She is also one of many Republicans who opposes allowing Medicare to negotiate for lower drug prices — a Democratic idea, and more importantly, a good idea.'"

Wealthier Medicare Recipients To Pay Higher Premiums. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K) reports, "High-income retirees may be in for an unpleasant surprise this winter. It involves the monthly premiums that older Americans pay for Medicare Part B, which helps pay the cost of doctor visits, diagnostic tests and other routine care. The premiums, which are automatically deducted from Social Security checks, are currently $88 a month. In January, everyone's premiums will go up to adjust for healthcare inflation, but higher-income recipients will see even larger hikes. As a result, a single retiree with an annual income of $80,000 or less (and a married person earning less than $160,000), could pay $98 a month next year, according to estimates, while a single person earning $81,000 would pay $110 a month. And under the same scenario a single person earning $200,000 would pay $170 a month — or 73% more than lower-income Medicare recipients."

AARP Launches Ad Campaign Calling For Senate Action On Rx Drug Re-Importation. The Miami Herald (9/17, 310K) in its "News Brief" section reports, "The AARP is launching a $500,000 ad campaign today in 14 states pushing for Senate action on legislation that would let consumers buy U.S.-made prescription drugs from Canada and other countries." AARP legislative policy director David Certner "said the campaign focuses on the home states of senators who have shown some openness to letting people buy U.S.-made medicine shipped abroad."

House Deliberates Granting The District Of Columbia Voting Rights. The Washington Post (9/17, B8, 748K) reports, "The House is considering a bill, crafted by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), to give the District a representative with full voting rights. The bill would add two seats to the House, one for the District and one for the state next in line to expand its congressional delegation based on population — currently Utah. A House subcommittee held a hearing on the matter on Thursday."

Legal Scholars Endorse Effort To Grant Voting Rights To D.C. Residents. In an op/ed in The Washington Post (9/17, B8, 748K) Pepperdine Law School Dean Kenneth

Starr and retired chief judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit Patricia M. Wald write, "More than 40 years ago, the Supreme Court declared that 'no right is more precious in a free country than that of having a voice in the election of those who make the laws under which, as good citizens, we must live.' And yet, for more than 200 years the citizens of the District have been denied this right because they have no voting representation in Congress." According to Starr and Wald, "To its credit, Congress is taking steps to begin correcting this longstanding injustice. Specifically, the House Government Reform Committee has approved, and the House Judiciary Committee is considering, a bill that would give D.C residents the right to full voting representation in the House." According to Starr and Wald, "While conferring this right is surely the right thing to do, a legitimate question has been raised concerning Congress's authority to confer the right by simple legislation, rather than through constitutional amendment. We have carefully considered this question and believe for three reasons the bill is within Congress's authority: It is consistent with fundamental constitutional principles; it is consistent with the language of Congress's constitutional power; and it is consistent with the governing legal precedents."

Atlantis Crew Sleeps In, Takes Half Day Off After Busy Week. The AP (9/17, Borenstein) reports, "With their hardest tasks behind them, space shuttle Atlantis' six astronauts got time to relax Saturday after almost a week of nonstop work adding a new 17 1/2-ton addition with wing-like solar power panels to the international space station. NASA even let the crew sleep an extra hour before waking them with Jimmy Buffett's beach song 'Twelve Volt Man.' 'We said good morning to them, then a little housekeeping and then left them alone, gave them a chance to enjoy their time on orbit and wind down from what has been a very, very busy series of days on the flight,' said flight director Paul Dye." Saturday was the last full day at the space station for Atlantis' crew. Besides relaxing and enjoying the view from 220 miles above Earth, they still had to unload supplies for the space station, including 90 pounds of oxygen."

Space Junk Can Be Deadly. The New York Times (9/17, Schwartz, 1.21M) reports, "In space, junk can kill. When two bolts slipped away from spacewalking astronauts last week, astronauts and controllers expressed concern that the small objects might have floated into the moving parts of the $372 million truss that had just been added to the station" NASA "recognizes that the thousands of pieces of debris in orbit are potential hazards. The concerns tend to focus on the risk of collision with objects moving at high speed, however; the relative velocity of something that has simply drifted away is low. Still, NASA mission planners require tethers for tools and objects during spacewalks. … John McCullough, the lead flight director for the station, said last week that on Russian spacewalks, 'they throw things away all the time.'"

High Court's Move To Provide Same-Day Transcripts Of Oral Arguments Applauded. The Washington Post (9/17, B6, 748K) opines in an editorial, "When the Supreme Court opens its term next month, it will finally begin making transcripts of its oral arguments available — free, online and on the day of the arguments. That this represents a breakthrough shows how dramatically behind the times the justices are." However, according to the Post, "It is a breakthrough, nonetheless, that will dramatically improve the public's access to court proceedings." According to the Post, "Timely transcripts are a half-measure. They imperfectly convey the atmospherics of an argument … but given the implacable hostility some of the justices feel toward cameras, the move is a huge step forward."

NYTimes Praises Skeptical Book About "Imaginary Weapons." The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) reviews "Imaginary Weapons" in the Week in Review, praising the book about "the triumph of technological fantasy at the Pentagon." Author Sharon Weinberger argues in her book "that fringe science has reached ever greater heights in military circles," encouraging expenditures such as "roughly $100 billion on missile defense -- which is serious money, levee-fixing money, cancer-curing money -- but has produced only an insubstantial shield."

Paulson Says Slowing Housing Market Won't Cause Economic Collapse. Bloomberg (9/16) reports, "U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, making his debut at a meeting of Group of Seven economy chiefs, told his counterparts they needn't worry about a housing-led collapse of the world's largest economy. … 'The residential housing market is cooling from record unsustainable growth rates, but growth in the U.S. economy is being supported by other components.,'" Paulson said in a statement after meeting G-7 finance ministers and central bank governors in Singapore today. According to the report, "Sales of U.S. existing homes have declined every month since G-7 officials last met in April, and the National Association of Realtors predicts house prices may decline in the remaining months of 2006, which would be the first year-over- year drops since 1993. The International Monetary Fund on Sept. 14 branded the slowing U.S. housing market a ``key risk" to global expansion.

Media's Effect On Housing Market Analyzed. In a Week In Review piece in The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) Vikas Bajaj writes, "To hear some people in the real estate industry tell it, one of the biggest problems with the housing market is what is being said about it in the news media. Agents and industry executives say reporters, editors and news anchors are making a cooling market sound worse than it is." According to the report, "While the number of sales may have dropped from 2005 (which was a record-setting year, the end of a five-year run) and more homes stay on the market longer, real estate professionals note that sale prices in much of the country are still higher than they were a year ago." According to the report, "Richard A. Smith, vice chairman and president of the Realogy Corporation, the nation's largest residential real estate broker, said there was a 'constant flood of media that is so negative' that it was discouraging many potential buyers and sellers." The report adds, "The news media have always helped shape public perception of markets, whether for houses, stocks or tulips. But exactly how much the press influences mass consumer behavior is subject to debate."

Consumer Confidence Still High Despite Cooling Housing Market. In an economic view column The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), Eduardo Porter writes, "There is an Aesop fable about a man — Greek, of course — who sees a swallow fluttering about on an unusually warm winter day. Leaping to the conclusion that summer has arrived, the man sells his only coat to buy himself a good time. Some economists say you merely need to replace the Greek with an American, and the coat with a house or condominium to understand the force powering the American economy during the recent housing boom." According to the report, "In this updated version of the fable, Americans were intoxicated by the leaps in the value of their real estate. Assuming the good times were here to stay, they were unable to resist temptation, impulsively calling the mortgage broker to get another loan to pay for the plasma TV set, the Caribbean vacation and the three-burner barbecue grill." Porter writes, "In Aesop's world, winter set in again, the swallow died and the coatless man blamed the bird for his misfortune, … yet in American morality tales, it seems, spendthrifts aren't always punished." According to Porter, "Winter has surely engulfed the housing market. But to the befuddlement of many economists, who had been expecting consumers to rein in their spending when the price of their homes stopped rising, America's happy consumers have so far eluded the payback."

Benefits, Risks Of Boom In Mortgage Lending Analyzed. The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) writes in an editorial, "The housing boom would never have lasted as long as it did if mortgage lenders had to worry about being paid back in full. But instead of relying on borrowers to repay, most lenders quickly sell the loans, generating cash to make more mortgages." According to the Times, "The process has encouraged homeownership and created wealth. But there is a downside, too, which demands attention. As the boom thundered on, the pool of available credit grew larger than the pool of creditworthy borrowers, resulting in an explosion of risky mortgages with features like no money down, interest-only payments and super-low teaser rates." The Times adds, "In a market so vast and dynamic, everyone knows that if mortgage defaults should rise, damage could reverberate throughout the financial system. … Many homeowners are at a dangerous juncture." The Times opines, "Interest rates on adjustable mortgages are rising as home values are weakening, precluding for many the chance to refinance. Economists calculate that $750 billion of outstanding mortgage debt is now at measurable risk of default — about 7 percent of the total."

Fed Rate Hike Pause Brings New Interest In Bond Market. The Washington Post/AP (9/17, F4, Paradise) reports, "With some investors wringing their hands about inflation and the Federal Reserve's efforts to keep it in check, those with bond fund holdings could be forgiven for wanting to take their money and run. But while some market observers see volatility ahead, few are ready to call it quits." According to the report, "Bonds have faced a more difficult environment in the past two years as the Federal Reserve raised interest rates 17 consecutive times before pausing last month. While the rate increases hurt bond funds, leaving some investors wary, sentiment changed in late June after Fed comments led investors to believe the rate hikes had come to an end."

Guaranteed Pensions On The Decline. The Washington Post (9/17, F1, Day, 748K) reports that the freezing of pension plans "is part of a long-running trend, as otherwise healthy companies — not only Verizon Communications Inc., but also International Business Machines Corp. and, most recently, DuPont Co. — freeze, terminate or alter the terms of their employees' retirement packages. Most of these companies increased other retirement offerings, which don't include fixed payouts. Today, about 22 million workers, 19 percent of active private-sector employees, have traditional pension plans, compared with 39 percent three decades ago, according to federal government statistics." The report adds, "Financial experts say workers fortunate enough to still have traditional pensions should not rely on them too much for retirement, as the long-term prospects of such plans are increasingly in doubt. While a new law signed last month by President Bush aims to shore up the private pension system by forcing companies to fund their plans more fully, some retirement consultants say the added expense may the trend of companies limiting their plans for existing employees or dropping them for new hires."

Private-Industry Pensions In Jeopardy. The Kansas City Star (9/17, Meyer, 278K) reports, "More than 40 million Americans in the nation's nongovernmental work force are either covered by traditional pension plans or expect to be, authorities estimate. Potentially, three things will happen to the lifetime income streams that these workers and current retirees are expecting after they leave the work force." The report adds, "And two of those — a pension plan being frozen or one being terminated — aren't pretty. Congress passed, and President Bush signed, legislation last month to strengthen traditional pensions with mandates for employers to increase funding, faster repair requirements for underfunded plans, and some special provisions for troubled airlines with potentially whopping pension problems." According to the report, "The new law also significantly improved many features of 401(k) plans and other similar products that increasingly have supplanted traditional pensions over the last two decades. Although surviving pension plans will be stronger, many observers bet that employers will turn even more to 401(k) plans and shift an unprecedented share of the retirement funding load onto workers and their families."

Employers Replacing Pensions With 410 (K)s. The Boston Globe (9/17, Gavin, 425K) reports that IBM factory worker Larry Millette "is among hundreds of thousands of workers whose dreams of long, comfortable retirements are getting upended as U.S. corporations shed both the costs and responsibilities of traditional pensions. Faced with intense competition in a global economy, and huge obligations as baby boomers retire, many of the nation's biggest companies are rewriting the social contract that for 60 or more years has bound them to workers." According to the report, "Since last year, at least a dozen corporations with nearly 1 million US employees either froze pension benefits for current workers, eliminated pension plans for new ones, or both. Today, just over one-third of Fortune 100 companies still offer traditional pensions to new employees, down from one-half in 2002 and 89 percent in 1985, according to Watson Wyatt Worldwide Inc., an Arlington, Va., consulting firm." According to the report, "Now companies are replacing traditional pensions with saving plans such as 401(k)s, which can cut companies' costs by as much as half. … Choosing investments, navigating the ups and downs of financial markets, and putting aside enough money to last through retirement become the problems of workers."

Bush Featured Prominently In Democrats' Ads, But Nearly Absent From GOP's. The New York Times (9/17, Nagourney, 1.21M), in a front-page story, reports President Bush "is emerging as the marquee name in this fall's Congressional elections — courtesy not of his Republican Party but of the Democrats. A review of dozens of campaign commercials finds that Mr. Bush has become the star of the Democrats' advertisement war this fall. … Not surprisingly, given that Mr. Bush's job approval rating continues to hover around 40 percent, it is hard to spot the president in any of the Republican advertisements that were reviewed. In what may be taken as an indication of changing Republican tastes, Senator John McCain of Arizona is popping up everywhere." According to the Times, "The decision by Democrats to invest in advertising directly attacking the war in Iraq, the administration's war on terrorism and the once overwhelmingly popular president is a marked turn from how they handled these issues in 2002 and 2004. … 'In certain districts he's exactly who we want to pivot off,' said Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat leading the effort to win the House. 'I tell all the candidates: Him and his agenda are on the ballot this year.'" The New York Times

(9/17, Pear, 1.21M) includes the transcript of a commercial being run by Democrat Patricia Madrid who claims her opponent, Rep. Heather Wilson, "is too close to President Bush on Iraq and other issues."

Shays Says Bush Has "No Credibility" Regarding Iraq. The Washington Post's David Broder (9/17) writes on Rep. Chris Shays' "doubts about what he terms 'the noble mission' that brought the United States to Iraq." Shays "had no qualms about the current president's decision to invade Iraq, because he believed Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. And even now he expresses scorn for those who say they regret their votes to authorize this war because the weapons were not there. 'I would never back away from my vote,' he said. On the other hand… 'The president has no credibility,' Shays said, because of that intelligence blunder and because management of the war has been awful. Notable as he found the Iraqis' political achievement in writing and ratifying a constitution and electing a government in Baghdad, he said: 'Since January, there has been no progress' toward reconciling Shiite-Sunni conflicts and transferring the responsibility for policing the country to the growing army of Iraqis."

Cardin And O'Malley Try To Tie Ehrlich And Steele To Bush. The Washington Post (9/17, A1, Mosk, Wagner, 748K) reports, "The campaigns are for high political office in Maryland, but the Democratic candidates' toughest attacks are focused on a man from Texas: George W. Bush. Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, who is challenging incumbent Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., calls his opponent 'the George Bush Mini-Me of Maryland,' and he has plastered the same photo on three recent campaign mailers. It shows Ehrlich and the president arm in arm. Benjamin L. Cardin (D), the 10-term congressman from Baltimore who is taking on Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in the race for an open U.S. Senate seat, mentions his opponent on the stump. But he saves a battery of attacks for Bush and urges voters to elect Cardin because 'George Bush is leading this nation in the wrong direction.' The Democratic effort to nationalize the two high-profile Maryland campaigns is unmistakable, the latest sign that party leaders believe anger at the president might be the decisive emotion that drives voters to the polls in November."

Democrats Disagree On What To Do In Iraq. In a Week in Review piece for the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), reporter John Broder writes that Democrats "are trying each of these approaches in a cacophony of frustration and sorrow, reflecting divisions in the party at the national level. If it is hard to see a Democratic plan to end the war, it's because there isn't one." Democrats Eric Massa, Jim Webb, Sen. Joseph Biden, Patricia Madrid and Sen. John Kerry express their views on Iraq should they win office or higher office.

GOP Candidates Given Conflicting Advice Regarding Bush's Campaign Role. In an op-ed appearing in a special Washington Post (9/17, B1, 748K) Outlook section titled "The Advice Issue (REPUBLICAN EDITION)," MSNBC host and former Rep. Joe Scarborough writes, "I can't help but feel sorry for my old Republican friends in Congress who are fighting for their political lives. After all, it must be tough explaining to voters at their local Baptist church's Keep Congress Conservative Day that it was their party that took a $155 billion surplus and turned it into a record-setting $400 billion deficit. How exactly does one convince the teeming masses that Republicans deserve to stay in power despite botching a war, doubling the national debt, keeping company with Jack Abramoff, fumbling the response to Hurricane Katrina, expanding the government at record rates, raising cronyism to an art form, playing poker with Duke Cunningham, isolating America and repeatedly electing Tom DeLay as their House majority leader? How does a God-fearing Reagan Republican explain all that away? Easy. Blame George W. Bush."

In an another op-ed for the Post (9/17, B1), in the same section, Stuart Stevens, partner in the Stevens and Schriefer Group, "a Republican media firm that advised George W. Bush's presidential campaigns," writes, "Most Democrats and the vast majority of what passes for the intelligentsia in this country simply don't understand the appeal of President Bush, much the way Republicans never got that Clinton guy. So now that the president's public approval numbers have fallen from historic highs, there seems to be great salivating at the notion that the country is finally getting what has been so obvious to them for so long and that a national day of reckoning is nigh. This view of Bush transformed from Leader of the Free World into Election Jeremiah is so wrong that it should be laughable. Except that a lot of Republicans seem to believe it's true. They're certainly behaving that way on the campaign trail, acting as though they're sure that a spy camera photo of a candidate caught with the president will be a death sentence in November. And that's a problem -- not for the president but for the candidates and the GOP."

The Post (9/17, B5) also runs a collection of brief bits of advice for Republican candidates from Bill Kristol and Ann

Coulter, among many others. Coulter writes, "Republican candidates should talk about the Democrats. The Democrats want to pull out of Iraq, shut down Guantanamo, open the nation's borders, abandon the Patriot Act and the NSA spying program and extend full constitutional protections to people like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the 9/11 attacks. … If this nation returns to the Democratic national security policy known in military circles as 'unconditional surrender,' two years of the Democrats could get us all killed."

Schwartz Claims "Quasi-Theocrats" Are "Infiltrating" The GOP's "Power Structure." In yet another op-ed for the Washington Post (9/17, B5, 748K), this one titled "Don't Lose Like Me," Rep. Joe Schwarz writes, "Even though more than half of all American voters consider themselves centrists, the Republican and Democratic parties are finding themselves controlled to an ever-greater extent by their more extreme elements. On the Republican side, the 'religious right,' the quasi-theocrats, are infiltrating the party power structure quite effectively. … It wasn't President Bush who proved to be the kiss of death to my candidacy for a second term in the House. The president's poll numbers may not be very good in many places, but he's still well-liked in my neck of the woods -- south-central Michigan. So when I geared up to run again this year, I was pleased to have his endorsement. My loss had nothing to do with his popularity, or national issues such as the war in Iraq. What did me in was voter apathy, and moral absolutist groups supported by a vitriolic negative-ad campaign funded by organizations on the far right."

Bush Said To Be Losing Support Among Southern Women. The AP (9/17, McCaffrey) reports President Bush's "once-solid relationship with Southern women is on the rocks. … In recent years, Southern women have been some of Bush's biggest fans, defying the traditional gender gap in which women have preferred Democrats to Republicans." However, "Now, anger over the Iraq war and frustration with the country's direction have taken a toll on the president's popularity and stirred dissatisfaction with the Republican-held Congress. Republicans on the ballot this November have reason to worry. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that three out of five Southern women plan to vote for a Democrat. With control of the Senate and House in the balance, such a seismic shift could have dire consequences for the GOP." The AP adds, "The movement of some Southern women away from the Republican Party tracks with national poll results showing that women have become more disillusioned with the war and were more likely than men to list the conflict as the important issue facing the country."

GOP Candidates Benefit From Bush's Improved Poll Numbers, 9/11 Anniversary. The Houston Chronicle (9/17, Roth, 535K) reports, "A bleak landscape for Republicans in the upcoming congressional elections appeared to brighten ever so slightly last week. The president's aggressive campaign to emphasize terrorism and tie it to the conflict in Iraq has helped nudge upward his still-low approval ratings. Experts say the ratings are an important gauge of how the president's party will fare in the congressional elections. The polls also showed a slight improvement in the public view of his handling of Iraq, an issue Democrats are hoping to use to make big gains. … Thomas Mann, a congressional expert at the liberal-leaning Brookings Institution, said he is skeptical Republicans could sustain momentum generated by the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11. 'My view is it will be a one-week phenomenon,' he said."

Presidential Candidates Expected To Opt Out Of Public Financing System In 2008. The AP (9/17, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Strategists from both parties estimate the White House race in 2008 could cost each nominee $500 million — far more than the Presidential Election Campaign Fund can afford. As a result, this next presidential campaign could mark the first time in 30 years that the Democratic and Republican nominees turn down the fund's millions in both the primary and the general elections. … If the major party candidates decline the general election funds in two years, they in effect would kill one of the chief post-Watergate overhauls in campaign law. The fund, which is expected to have about $200 million by the end of 2007, still would help pay for party presidential nominating conventions and assist primary candidates who do not raise large amounts of money."

Potential Gore-Clinton Primary Race Analyzed. The Houston Chronicle (9/17, Holland, 535K) reports, "Al Gore's statement that he wouldn't rule out running for president raises the possibility of a Democratic duel between the former vice president" and Sen. Hillary Clinton. Pollster John Zogby, "sees 'a battle royal shaping up.' … Gore is 'in a very second tier after Hillary, who is in a league by herself,' Zogby says. … On the other hand, Gore has 'two aces in the hole,' Zogby said. Unlike Clinton, he opposed the Iraq war from the start. And he is known as an expert on the environment."

Obama Seen As Hampered By Unusually High Expectations. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (9/17, McDermott, 300K) reports, "For a politician, is there such a thing as too much popularity? If there's any cloud over U.S. Sen. Barack Obama's seemingly charmed political life, it may be that one. With national political pundits now using words such as 'messiah' in connection with the Chicago Democrat - and one former campaign opponent calling on him to run for president - some say he could ultimately be rising so fast and high in the American consciousness that he may end up with nowhere to go but down. … One rule of thumb in politics is to keep expectations low so that any mistake the politician makes looks smaller while any accomplishment looks bigger. For Obama, sitting on a runaway train of gushing publicity, that kind of 'expectation control' has become impossible." Obama "(whose office reiterated last week that he isn't running for president in 2008) hardly needs his own startling popularity impressed upon him. He has quipped about it himself, joking to reporters at a dinner in Washington in March, for example: 'I want to thank you for all the generous advance coverage you've given me in anticipation of a successful career. When I actually do something, we'll let you know.'"

Obama Advised To Seek Presidency In 2008. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (9/17) writes, "Prominent Illinois Democrats are advising Sen. Barack Obama, now finishing his second year in the Senate, to consider making a run for the 2008 Presidential nomination. One such Democratic stalwart is telling the 45-year-old Obama to run only if prospective front-runner Sen. Hillary Clinton does not. But others are advising the popular freshman senator to go for it even if Clinton is a candidate. These boosters calculate that Obama, the son of a black father and a white mother, could break the Republican Presidential hold on the South by maximizing the African-American vote in states such as South Carolina, Georgia and Mississippi."

McCaskill Seeks "Phased Pullout" Of US Troops In Iraq. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (9/17, Shesgreen, 300K) reports, "Every which way they turn, Sen. Jim Talent and state Auditor Claire McCaskill face voters' unease and anger about the war in Iraq. … But Missourians looking for a dramatic new direction on Iraq from the two candidates competing for the U.S. Senate seat may not be happy with what either Talent or McCaskill has to say." Talent "was among the staunchest proponents of the war and remains unwavering, like many other Republicans, in his belief that setting any timetable for withdrawal would be a terrible mistake." McCaskill "says the war was a mistake and is now a quagmire that has compromised America's strength and bred terrorism in new corners of the world. But she has not bowed to the most fiery anti-war wing of her party…or even to some Democratic senators who have called for withdrawing all U.S. troops by the middle of next year. McCaskill advocates a two-year phased pullout, to begin this year, with American troops eventually replaced by a multinational force - time enough, she says, to allow the Iraqi government to achieve stability."

Lieberman Advocates Bipartisan Commitment To War On Terror. The Hartford Courant (9/17, Pazniokas, 195K) reports, "Using apocalyptic imagery of civilization lost, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman blamed politics Friday for undermining the war on terror and leaving the U.S. vulnerable to 'barbarians at our gates.' … His 25-minute address repeatedly called for bipartisanship in Washington, reinforcing the central theme of his re-election campaign as an independent since losing the Democratic primary in August to his main rival, Ned Lamont." Lieberman "faulted the Bush administration for alienating potential allies in the war on terror, though he gave no examples of an administration miscue. He never mentioned the war in Iraq, a topic he intends to address with another policy speech."

The New York Times (9/17, Medina, 1.21M) reports, "It was Mr. Lieberman's first major speech since he was defeated in the Democratic primary last month, and aides said it was intended to be a policy update rather than a political statement." Lieberman "criticized both major parties, highlighting his odd political position now. 'It is wrong for some on the right to imply that some Democrats don't care if the terrorists succeed, or that debating the merits of the president's policies on the war on terrorism emboldens our enemies,' Mr. Lieberman said. That kind of attack on people's motives 'divides and weakens us as a nation,' he said. But Mr. Lieberman, who is trying to strike a careful balance as he seeks Republican and unaffiliated votes in November, also criticized some of the president's detractors. 'It is wrong for some on the left who go beyond dissent and demonize the president and impugn the motives of all those who support him,' Mr. Lieberman said. 'Like it or not, we are in this war against terror, and we are in it together.'"

Dynamics Of Kean-Menendez Race Follow Familiar New Jersey Pattern. The New York Times' Peter Applebome(9/17) reports "all the major political newsletters" are "now calling the race between State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican, and Senator Robert Menendez, the Democrat, a toss-up. And, whether or not control of the Senate ends up hinging on the answer, it's clear that this is yet another toxic soufflé of New Jersey politics that will revolve around this question: Who seems scarier — the Republicans in Washington or the Democrats in New Jersey? … The betting for most is still that things eventually revert to form. New Jersey has not elected a Republican to the Senate since Clifford Case 34 years ago. Polls show the Iraq war wildly unpopular in New Jersey and President Bush getting a favorable approval rating from about a third of state voters. And in tough races, the Democrats almost always manage to turn out big enough numbers in North Jersey cities to push the sick and frail over the finish line."

Allen Likely To Benefit From Gay Marriage Ban On Virginia Ballot. The Washington Times (9/17, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Virginia's constitutional amendment on marriage will attract conservative voters who otherwise would have stayed home in frustration with national Republicans, grass-roots activists say. The bump in turnout in November likely will benefit U.S. Sen. George Allen, a Republican who until recently appeared a lock for re-election and poised for a 2008 White House bid." The Times notes Allen "favors amending the state constitution, but his challenger, Democrat James H. Webb Jr., opposes the constitutional change as broad and discriminatory. Democrats say Republicans should not be so confident that the measure will pass with a large margin. They say its placement on the ballot -- once considered a gift from Republican state legislators so Mr. Allen could get a landslide win -- is stirring opposition in the more liberal areas of the state. A recent Mason-Dixon poll showed the amendment winning but losing support."

Virginia Voters Urged To Reject Gay Marriage Ban Amendment. The Washington Post (9/17, B6, 748K) opines in an editorial, "Since 1998, 20 states have adopted constitutional amendments banning gay marriage. But not all of them have been drafted so expansively, and so carelessly, as the measure that will appear on Virginia's ballot in November, which would recognize no 'union, partnership or other legal status to which is assigned the rights, benefits, obligations, qualities or effects of marriage.'" According to the Post, "The amendment is muddle-headed and absurdly broad, duplicates what is already in state law and carries the germ of a thousand unintended consequences. Virginia voters should reject it."

Both Candidates Now Utilizing Sophisticated Blogging Efforts. The Washington Post (9/17, A1, Shear, Craig, 748K), in a front-page story, reports, "Virginia's U.S. Senate race has catapulted bloggers into the middle of electioneering and controversy as campaign supporters use their online forums to connect with voters, raise money and spread gossip. Liberal bloggers…fanned the flames last month after" Allen "aimed a derogatory remark at a young Webb volunteer. That hype has helped Webb close a double-digit Allen lead in public polls and was a blow to the Republican senator's possible presidential bid in 2008. The lack of an effective response from conservative bloggers has prompted Allen to hire a Virginia blogger as his 'new media coordinator' to goose GOP supporters into action. And four of Virginia's most popular conservative bloggers launched http://www.allens-a-team.com last week to counter what they call liberal attacks. Together, the Webb and Allen campaigns are transforming the image of the independent blogger, clicking away on his own dime from his basement. And they are pushing the boundaries of federal campaign finance laws as blogs that once were personal diaries have come to resemble full-blown campaign operations that don't have to be reported as expenses."

Chafee Primary Win Sets Back Democratic Hopes To Retake Senate. The Washington Times (9/17, Fagan, 88K) reports, "Senate Democrats last week lost a key chance in their battle to retake the Senate, when top Republicans helped one of their most liberal members, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, defeat a more conservative challenger who both sides thought would lose to Democrats in November. … Democrats have to gain six seats in order to retake the Senate." According to the report, "Senate Democrats strongly disagree that Mr. Chafee's win was a setback for them. They argue that they can still win the seat because Mr. Chafee was weakened by the bitter primary and polls show a tight race between him and Democratic nominee Sheldon Whitehouse, a former state attorney general." However, according to the report, "The hill is now a bit steeper for Democrats than it would have been had the more conservative Stephen Laffey won the Republican primary in the Democratic state."

Former President Clinton Lends Fundraising Prowess To Democratic Senate Candidate. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Marcotty, 398K) reports that in Minnesota, "Former President Bill Clinton, the Democrats' favorite Democrat, stood with U.S. Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar before a crowd of more than 1,400 people Saturday night to shed some of his rainmaking power on her and her political party. Clinton raised cheers at the fundraising dinner held at the RiverCentre in St. Paul when he said that Klobuchar 'may be the very best we have in the United States.'" According to the report, Clinton's "presence in Minnesota, and that of President Bush at a Republican fundraiser in August, illustrates the importance that both parties place on this Senate race. 'It's the most competitive race in the country,' said Mark Drake, communications director for the Republican Party in Minnesota." According the report, "Questions were raised about whether Bush would help or hurt Minnesota Republican candidates during his fundraising swing here. But that's not an issue for Clinton or the candidates he supports in Minnesota, experts said."

Religion Playing Larger Role In Contemporary Politics. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/17, O'toole, 241K) reports, "Bob Casey returned to his law school, Catholic University, last week, to deliver a message on how his faith informs his public life. This Wednesday, Dr. James Dobson, the popular and influential evangelical broadcaster, will appear at the Mellon Arena." According to the report, "Sen. Rick Santorum, whose reelection is being challenged by Mr. Casey, won't be there and won't be endorsed formally at the gathering, but the selection of Pittsburgh as a site for pre-election Stand for the Family rallies shows how highly the conservative Republican is valued by Dr. Dobson and his colleagues." The report adds, "The two events highlight the importance of religion in this race and in the broader national struggle between parties eager to appeal to 'the values voter,' that many analysts saw as a decisive factor in the 2004 presidential race. Since that election, Democrats nationally have struggled to find a natural voice on religious issues."

Franken Emerging As Fundraising "Powerhouse" In Minnesota. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Hotakainen, 398K) reports, "A new Democratic powerhouse is emerging in Minnesota this campaign season: comedian Al Franken. His political-action committee, which is called Midwest Values, has raised more than $800,000 that he's spreading to Democratic candidates in Minnesota and across the country. … But Franken, a bestselling author and radio talk-show host who grew up in St. Louis Park, could be the ultimate beneficiary if he cashes in his chits and runs for the Senate in 2008 against Minnesota Republican Sen. Norm Coleman. Franken, who moved from New York to Minneapolis this year, said he might form an exploratory committee for that race early next year. He is raising campaign money from a variety of sources -- from the entertainment industry on both coasts, his stand-up comedy shows and elsewhere."

GOP Congressmen Come To Louisiana To Boost Party Hopeful Craig Romero. The Baton Rouge Advocate (9/17, Courreges) reports, "The Louisiana Republican Party's two hottest political acts traveled to Houma Saturday to declare their support for Republican Louisiana 3rd Congressional District challenger Craig Romero. U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, and U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-Metairie, held a news conference with state Sen. Romero, R-New Iberia, in front of the Terrebonne Parish Courthouse where they praised Romero's values and work ethic." According to the report, "Romero is the best-known and best-funded of three challengers attempting to unseat first-term incumbent U.S. Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, in the Nov. 7 election. The other two are Franklin Libertarian James Lee Blake Jr. and LaPlace Democrat Olangee "OJ" Breech."

Muslim Candidate's Ties To CAIR Chief Questioned. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Schmickle, 398K) reports that last week, Minnesota Republicans put terror support in the spotlight after Nihad Awad flew to Minneapolis to attend a fundraiser for state Rep. Keith Ellison in August. According to the report, Awad is "a former Minnesotan and executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) in Washington, one of the nation's most prominent Muslim groups. … Many conservatives and Jewish groups say that CAIR is rooted in the Hamas movement and that its leaders also secretly support Hezbollah in Lebanon," groups considered to be terrorist organizations by the U.S. According to the report, "If he wins, Ellison will be the first Muslim elected to Congress. He called Awad an 'acquaintance,' saying he has known the CAIR leader for many years but not well enough to be able to 'account for everything he has ever done, everybody he knows or everything he has ever said.'" The report adds, however, "After Awad attended the Ellison fundraiser on Aug. 25, conservative blogs, some Jewish groups and some Democrats objected."

Patrick Has 21-Point Lead In Democrats' Massachusetts Gubernatorial Primary. The Boston Globe (9/17, Phillips, 425K) reports, "Heading into the final days of the campaign, Deval Patrick has opened up a commanding lead in the Democratic race for governor, far outpacing his closest challenger, Christopher Gabrieli, and leaving Thomas F. Reilly a distant third, according to a new poll conducted for The Boston Globe and CBS4-TV. Forty-six percent of those surveyed supported Patrick, 25 percent backed Gabrieli, and 18 percent were for Reilly in the poll of 523 likely voters in Tuesday's primary election. Only 6 percent said they were undecided, while 4 percent expressed support for other candidates in next Tuesday's election. The survey was taken Sept. 12-15 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percent."

Poll Shows Pawlenty And Hatch Tied At 42. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Olson, 398K) reports Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty and Attorney General Mike Hatch "are entering the fall campaign facing an electorate evenly divided on their candidacies for governor, according to the latest Star Tribune Minnesota Poll. Among the 820 likely voters surveyed statewide Wednesday through Friday, just after the state's primary election, DFLer Hatch and Republican Pawlenty are in a dead heat, each with 42 percent support. Independence Party candidate Peter Hutchinson has the support of 7 percent. With less than two months before the Nov. 7 general election, Hatch and Pawlenty appear to have locked down their partisan bases and are battling for a smaller pool of independent and undecided voters."

Rendell Well Ahead Of Swan Despite Unfulfilled Campaign Pledges. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/17, Barnes, 241K) reports, "In his first four years in office, Gov. Ed Rendell pushed hard to increase the state income tax, signed the infamous legislative pay raise, failed to enact middle-class property tax relief and oversaw state budgets that regularly exceeded the inflation rate. So his bid for re-election has to be in trouble, right? Well, no. For months, the Democratic incumbent, who was mayor of Philadelphia in the 1990s, has led his Republican challenger, former Steeler Lynn Swann, by double digits in every poll. 'I call him 'Teflon Ed' because nothing bad seems to stick to him," said Clay Richards, director of the Quinnipiac Poll, which put Mr. Rendell up by 19 points recently."

Taylor And Perdue Offer Dueling Tax Cut Proposals. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/17, Galloway, 399K) reports, "Tax cuts became the language of the race for governor on Saturday, as Democratic nominee Mark Taylor vowed to eliminate the state property tax on more than 2.5 million Georgia homeowners. Lifting the .25 mills now assessed by the state would force a $76 million cut in the state's annual budget, and would average $30 a year per homeowner — the amount varying according to the value of each house. 'There's one tax-cutter running for governor, and you're looking at him. The big guy likes big tax cuts,' Taylor told several hundred screaming delegates attending the annual state Democratic Party convention in College Park. … Only days earlier, Republican incumbent Sonny Perdue, before a similar gathering of his own partisans, promised to eliminate the state income tax on retirement income — from pension funds and investments — for Georgians older than 65. Perdue's cut would cost the state $142 million a year, and apply to between 250,000 and 400,000 people."

Will Sees Democrats' Views On Social Issues As The Key To The Rise Of The GOP. In his column for the Washington Post (9/17, B7, 748K) George Will discusses "Building Red America: The New Conservative Coalition and the Drive for Permanent Power," a new book from the New Republic's Thomas Edsall. According to Will, Edsall "explains how Americans differ concerning what he calls 'freedom from the need to maintain the marital or procreative bond.'" Will then quotes from Edsall: "To social conservatives,' he writes, 'these developments have signaled an irretrievable and tragic loss. Their reaction has fueled, on the right, a powerful traditionalist movement and a groundswell of support for the Republican Party. To modernists, these developments constitute, at worst, the unfortunate costs of progress, and, at best -- and this is very much the view on the political left as well as of Democratic Party loyalists -- they constitute a triumph over unconscionable obstacles to the liberation and self-realization of much of the human race." Will concludes, "Looking for the real reason for the rise of 'Red America'? Read that paragraph again."

Ailing Automaker Ford Attempts A Turnaround In Bid To Revive Company. The Washington Times (9/17, Lengell, 88K) reports, "When he stepped down this month as Ford Motor Co.'s president and chief executive, Bill Ford Jr. acknowledged the ailing, 103-year-old automaker must reinvent itself to survive in an increasingly competitive industry. With the company announcing a deeper and accelerated restructuring plan Friday, it's obvious the auto giant's new chief executive, Alan Mulally, formerly executive vice president of Boeing, will lead a leaner, smaller and possibly more focused automaker. But will that be enough?" According to the report, J.D. Power and Associates automotive analyst Jeff Schuster says, "'Right now, with so many variables, I would have to say the jury's still out. I don't think Ford is going to disappear. ... But they will not recover that ground they've lost in the marketplace."

Former President Clinton Shares Memories Of Past Governor Ann Richards. The Dallas Morning News (9/17, Brooks, 500K) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton wiped away tears as he stood near his friend Ann Richards' flag-draped casket at the Texas Capitol on Saturday, describing a woman with 'big hair, big bright eyes, big blinding smile ... big heart and big dreams." According to the report, "A friend of Bill and Hillary Clinton for three decades, Ms. Richards, 73, died of esophageal cancer at her home in Austin on Wednesday. Mr. Clinton joined the Richards family Saturday in escorting the casket to the rotunda; Ms. Richards' body is lying in state there over the weekend."

The Washington Post/AP (9/17, A15, Castro) reports that at a memorial for former Texas Governor Ann Richards, former president Bill Clinton "delivered poignant and at times funny recollections of the woman he called "spontaneous, unedited, earthy, hilarious." According to the report, "During her one term as governor, from 1991 to 1995, she championed what she called the 'New Texas,' appointing more women and minorities to state posts than any of her predecessors. Clinton described the world that Richards wanted for her grandchildren as one 'where young girls grew up to be scientists, engineers, police officers and teachers … where the dreams and the spirit were as big as the sky in her beloved home.'"

Teachers Urged To Provide Open Forum For Ideas. In an op/ed in The New York Times Magazine (9/17), Pennsylvania State University's Michael Berube writes, "So far as I know, my department, like many university departments of English, consists of wall-to-wall Democrats. If my faculty colleagues have any good words to say about George Bush's fiscal or foreign policies, they're keeping them to themselves." Berube adds, "Every so often, someone on the academic left does Horowitz and company the favor of saying something foolish or simply outrageous about 9/11 or Iraq, and the grist meets the mill once again." According to Berube, "Every responsible teacher should think of the classroom as a relatively safe space, free of intimidation or coercion. But in return, every responsible student should realize that the classroom is only relatively safe, because arguing about ideas isn't risk-free."

Paulson Ask Other Countries To Limit Iranian Access To Banks. The New York Times (9/17, Weisman, 1.21M) reports, "The United States pressed the top finance officials of the world's leading industrial nations on Saturday to crack down on what Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. said was the exploitation of their banking systems by at least 30 Iranian front companies involved in illicit activities." He said "that the front companies were identified by American intelligence agencies as funneling money to terrororist groups using banks in Europe and elsewhere, many of them 'blue chip banks,'" adding "that many leading trading companies in Iran with legitimate business operations were also involved in the illicit activities, and that it behooved any legitimate bank to realize that it was risky to continue doing even legitimate business with the companies." These "comments appeared to reflect the emerging Bush administration strategy on Iran as efforts to impose sanctions by the United Nations Security Council have faltered." Additionally, "Last week, in what administration officials call a major escalation in the effort to squeeze Iran economically, the Treasury Department announced that Bank Saderat, a major bank in Iran, would no longer have even indirect access to the United States financial system."

The Washington Post (9/17, A23, Goodman, 748K) adds that Paulson "used his first meeting of world finance chiefs on Saturday as a venue to press the Bush administration's mission to isolate Iran and choke its nuclear aspirations." However, he "portrayed the initiative as 'an education job,' giving his counterparts the ability to act voluntarily," and, "In a statement issued after the meeting, the G-7 finance ministers lent general support."

The Wall Street Journal (9/17, Phillips, 2.03M) leads, "Frustrated in its efforts to secure U.N. sanctions on Iran, the Bush administration is trying to convince individual governments and banks to sever financial relationships that allegedly allow Tehran to finance its nuclear ambitions and foreign terrorist groups." Paulson told reporters "he has dispatched aides to Europe and the Persian Gulf in recent days, where he has instructed them to lay out the U.S. case that Iran has been using dozens of front companies to fool banks into facilitating illicit financial transactions."

Bloomberg (9/17, Carmichael) also covers this story.

US Said To Have Limited Options For Dealing With Iran. The New York Times (9/17, Cooper, Sciolino, 1.21M) reports, "After intense talks about Iran's nuclear program, the United States and other major world powers face two unappealing choices as the United Nations General Assembly opens this week: introduce a resolution in the Security Council for sanctions against Tehran that may not be tough enough to make a difference, or delay any punitive measures, rendering their diplomacy on Iran meaningless." Therefore "the Bush administration, along with Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany, have quietly shifted their strategy" and "offered a major concession. They are embarking on a two-track approach that allows the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, to conduct open-ended negotiations with Iran on the conditions for a suspension while the Security Council weighs punitive measures." This "is a fundamental shift and an admission of how few options President Bush and his European allies have."

In an analysis piece, the AP (9/17, Gearan) adds, "When President Bush addresses world leaders at the United Nations this week, he will have fewer options and lower expectations on almost every major foreign policy front than a year ago." While "Bush and his foreign policy advisers have tried with some success to dispel the caricature of Bush abroad as a Texas cowboy riding alone and herding the U.S. into an unpopular war in Iraq," that "war, now in its fourth year, devours resources and energy for other global objectives and feeds mistrust about U.S. intentions, experts say."

EU To Meet With Iran Without US. The AP (9/17, Riechmann) reports, "European diplomats are considering a meeting with Iran on the sidelines of next week's U.N. General Assembly in hopes of de-escalating the standoff over Tehran's nuclear program — but the United States won't be getting an invitation. The Bush administration, which is pushing for U.N. sanctions against Iran, has said it will join European-led negotiations with Iran only if it stops its uranium enrichment work first," and a US official said "The Bush administration has little confidence that 'Iran will come through to meet the conditions' of verifiably suspending its enrichment work."

Abbas To Meet With Rice, Bush On Sidelines Of UN. The New York Times/AP (9/17) reports, "Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, will meet with President Bush in New York on Wednesday, on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly," and "will be preceded by talks on Monday between Mr. Abbas and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Palestinian official Saeb Erekat "said the discussion would touch on a wide range of issues, including the coalition government that Mr. Abbas is trying to form with the Hamas political movement and the fate of an Israeli soldier seized by Hamas-allied militants in Gaza in June." A separate AP (9/17, El Deeb) article adds that Abbas "will likely seek to promote his planned coalition with Hamas," but "the White House would not confirm the meeting and it was not clear whether Bush's final schedule in New York had been set."

Lebanon Conflict Spurred Israelis' Questioning Of Leaders. The Washington Post (9/17, A1, Wilson, 748K) reports, "Frustration over the outcome of the war in Lebanon has spurred many Israelis to question the abilities of a new class of political professionals who are stepping into roles long held by the men and women who founded the Jewish state" as "the uncertain aftermath of the first war to be managed by a prime minister from outside Israel's founding generation…has sharpened debate over whether the best of the new generation are entering public life." Ehud Olmert "and others of his political generation embody a leadership shift that highlights the Jewish state's changing values and demographics," as the "original socialist character has evolved into a more free-market economy and less centralized government." As a result, "Israel's mainstream political leadership now consists mostly of pragmatic men and women who have made politics their profession -- a sharp contrast to the ideological volunteers, shaped by persecution, who founded Israel nearly six decades ago." Now, "opinion polls show that a large majority of Israelis believe the previous leaders were better than the current ones, while one in five Israelis does not think any of the senior party leaders is suitable to be prime minister."

Nonaligned Movement Gathering Approved Anti-US, Israel Document. The AP (9/17, Rodriguez) reports, "Representatives of 118 Nonaligned Movement nations condemned Israel's attacks on Lebanon and supported a peaceful resolution to the U.S.-Iran nuclear" in a 92-page declaration that "also broadly condemned terrorism. But it said movements for self-determination and battles against foreign occupiers should not be considered terrorism." These "final statements, many of which contain veiled criticisms of the U.S., were approved by unanimous consent after another round of speeches Saturday night by leaders of the movement." At the meeting were "the leaders of Iran, Venezuela, North Korea, Zimbabwe among other leading U.S. adversaries. Raul joined them in saying a bellicose America had made the world more dangerous." The US "said it would have no comment on any of the proceedings."

Lebanese Government Struggles With Complexity Of Rebuilding. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Stack, 918K) reports that analysts say the rush to rebuild Lebanon "has gotten tangled up with a high-stakes sectarian competition, as Sunni Arab governments in the region race against Shiite-ruled Iran and its ally Hezbollah to prove political clout and capture grass-roots loyalty" in "a stark reminder of the panic that has gripped the region as the power of Iran has swelled." Now "Persian Gulf states, including Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, have come forward with immense donations" and "the Lebanese government, dominated by Sunnis and Christians, has struggled to counteract the perception that Hezbollah is chiefly responsible for the aid and reconstruction efforts." Meanwhile, "Hezbollah's political leaders dismiss government aid efforts as corruption-riddled traps that snare money long before it reaches the needy. They sometimes speak of the government as a foreign force."

Vatican Issues Statement Expressing Pope's Regrets That Remarks Were Found Offensive. The New York Times (9/17, Fisher, 1.21M) reports, "A top Vatican official said Saturday that Pope Benedict XVI 'deeply regretted' that a speech he made this week 'sounded offensive to the sensibility of Muslim believers.' … The Vatican statement stopped short of the direct personal apology from Benedict that many Muslims have been demanding. Still, the statement tried to tamp down rising anger among Muslims about the speech, in which Benedict quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as calling Islam ;evil and inhuman.'"

The Washington Post/AP (9/17, A18, D'emilio) reports, "The new Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, said the pope's position on Islam is unmistakably in line with Vatican teaching that says the church 'esteems' Muslims. Benedict 'thus sincerely regrets that certain passages of his address could have sounded offensive to the sensitivities of the Muslim faithful and should have been interpreted in a manner that in no way corresponds to his intentions,'" The statement "failed to satisfy critics."

The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Wilkinson, 918K) reports, "Hostility to the pope's speech -- a dense lecture in which he quoted a medieval Byzantine emperor as saying, 'Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman' -- has plunged Benedict's 17-month-old papacy into its most difficult diplomatic crisis."

Five Churches Firebombed Over Pope's Remarks. McClatchy Newspapers (9/17, El Naggar) reports, "Gunmen firebombed five churches in the Palestinian territories Saturday over remarks by Pope Benedict XVI this week that outraged Muslims and prompted the Vatican to issue a mildly worded apology." McClatchy adds, "Palestinian gunmen targeted five churches in Gaza and the West Bank with firebombs, causing charred doors and bullet holes in walls, but no one was injured."

Sudanese President Rejects UN Intervention In Darfur. The AP (9/17, Rodriguez) reports that Sudanese president Omar al-Bashir "again rejected the deployment of U.N. peacekeeping troops in the war-torn Darfur region during a meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Saturday." He said, "Justice is and remains our objective but through diplomatic, political and other means," which is "why we reject this position."

Sudanese VP Favors UN Intervention. The AP (9/17, Osman) reports that First Vice President Salva Kiir Mayardit, "one of two vice presidents in Sudan's power-sharing government, "said in remarks published Saturday that he would accept the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers in the country's war-torn Darfur region." He added that "the Sudanese government was incapable of protecting civilians in Darfur, and called on the U.N. to intervene." The AFP (9/17, Ali Saeed) leads that "Kiir said a UN peacekeeping force is vital for the protection of civilians in Darfur." Kiir's southern former rebel movement (SPLM) forms part of a national unity government as part of a January 2005 peace deal with Beshir's regime, and "the SPLM's stance on the presence of international troops could threaten the implementation of peace accords, an analyst said."

Reporter Remembers Visiting Colleague In Sudanese Jail. Craig Timberg, the Johannesburg bureau chief of the Washington Post, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (9/17, B3, 748K) describes his visits to Paul Salopek, a two-time Pulitzer Prize winner for the Chicago Tribune, who was detained in Sudan after entering without a visa. He was charged with the "visa violation…espionage and writing 'false news.'" Salopek had entered because he was "distraught over what could happen to civilians once all the outside witnesses left Darfur, as the government seemed determined to make happen." Timberg mentions Salopek's interactions with his guards and his resignation to serve time if he had to. He also mentions "the small contingent of U.S. diplomatic and military officials who had made it their mission to keep Salopek as safe and comfortable as possible."

North Korea's No 2 Leader Blames US For Lack Of Peace. The AP (9/17, Arrington) reports, "North Korea's No. 2 leader blamed the lack of world peace on the United States Saturday at the Nonaligned Summit, saying that because of its failure to respect the sovereignty of other nations, 'the international order is destroyed.'" Parliament leader Kim Yong Nam presented "the latest anti-American statement at a meeting that has brought together some of the staunchest U.S. foes, including the presidents of Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe." He "also defended the North's nuclear program amid concerns the communist country may be preparing to carry out an atomic weapons test," adding, "The DPRK will never go back to the talks under U.S. sanctions."

NAM Backs Iran On Nukes. The Washington Times (9/17, 88K) reports, "Developing countries yesterday wrapped up a multinational summit with North Korea charging that U.S. threats drove it to acquire deterrent atomic weapons and Iran winning solid support for its nuclear ambitions. Iran, Venezuela and Cuba joined North Korea in leading efforts to forge an anti-U.S. alliance. Summit leaders, in a statement on Iran, 'reaffirmed the basic and inalienable right of all states to develop research, production and use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.'" Still, "governments with friendly ties to Washington, among them India, Pakistan, Chile, Peru and Colombia, sought to steer the summit away from confrontation and finger-pointing at the United States."

Group Airs Film Examining Life In North Korea. The Washington Times (9/17, Kim, 88K) reports, "Liberty in North Korea, a 2-year-old organization with a global reach, has found success drawing attention to human rights atrocities in the isolated communist state. Its latest effort featured an airing of the movie 'Seoul Train' at the American University in Northwest last week. The film opens with a small North Korean boy wandering around a market, searching the ground for bits of food to eat. … The 1995 documentary by filmmakers Jim Butterworth, Lisa Sleeth and Aaron Lubarsky depicts the life-and-death struggle faced by North Koreans who attempt to flee their homeland through China."

North Korean, South Korean Members Of Family Reunite Over Satellite. In the New York Times Magazine (9/17), Mary Chi-Whi Kim writes, "Last December, after 55 years, members of our South Korean family reunited with northern relatives for two hours via satellite. It was one of hundreds of such virtual reunions that the Red Cross has organized for families who have been separated since the 1953 armistice split the country in half."

As US Approves More Missions, UN Stretched By Peacekeeping. The Washington Post (9/17, A17, Lynch, 748K) reports, "The United Nations is set to field its largest peacekeeping enterprise in its 61-year history, with more than 100,000 troops and police to be deployed by year's end in missions around the world," but "The unprecedented growth in peacekeeping operations is placing strains on the United Nations' capacity to respond to
